In the same letter to President Carter, Karamanlis noted that the U.S. Government supported "Turkish positions and demands" on the reintegration issues, "a fact which neither his own government nor any other Greek Government can accept." The Greek prime minister added that because of its activities, the U.S. Government "had upset the Haig-Davos agreement" of July 1978 despite the fact that it was aware of the position of public opinion in Greece "both on the left and the right."

U.S. help in resolving problems which had arisen regarding return to NATO was requested for the second time at the end of last January during a meeting Foreign Ministry Secretary General V. Theodhoropoulos and U.S. Ambassador in Greece Robert McCloskey.

Specifically, the Greek diplomat asked the U.S. ambassador "for some new proof of the solidarity that should exist within the alliance" so that Greece's return to NATO might become possible. Theodhoropoulos cited the "support" Greece had shown to the Western alliance during the period following the events in Afghanistan and asked for similar "support" from the U.S. Government on the issues which currently directly occupy the Greek Government. Theodhoropoulos expressed bitterness about the fact that, as opposed to Greece which had supported "all Western initiatives," the alliance "had never implemented the idea of solidarity toward Greece." On the contrary, "both regarding the Cyprus problem and especially after the lifting of the embargo, the United States helped Turkey and the Turkish Army by all means. [paragraph continues]

"You should not disregard that public opinion in Greece, both on the left and the right, no longer has any faith in the alliance's solidarity," the Foreign Ministry secretary general said to McCloskey. Theodhoropoulos then warned the U.S. ambassador "unless there is some new proof of this solidarity in the sense of protecting Greek positions and interests, it will be very difficult for the Greek Government to continue talks for Greece's return to the NATO military wing."

The Greek Government's efforts to secure the support of the U.S. Government on the issue of NATO reintegration have not produced any results. On the contrary, as was proven after the submission of the Rogers plan on 11 February, NATO not only did not take into consideration Greek objections, but actually completely adopted Turkish viewpoints concerning the solution of the problem in the southeast wing of NATO.

PAPANDREOU, RALLIS EXCHANGE STATEMENTS ON NATO DISCLOSURE

AT171720 Athens TA NEA in Greek 17 Mar 80 pp 1, 9 AT

[Text] The revelation of the "Rogers plan" has now created a major political issue as the leader of the official opposition has noted to TA NEA that negotiations with NATO "have as their objective determining the extent of concessions in the Aegean national area, and consequently have created a bad precedent for our rights."

Papandreou has stated that the government must immediately suspend negotiations with NATO because otherwise "it will be shouldering responsibilities that I would not like to define at this moment, but in any case the charge which will weigh on it will be at least treason."

Previously the leader of the official opposition had made statements to all the newspapers in which he had stressed that the revelations of TO VIMA had created "an enormous political issue for the prime minister and the government of New Democracy."

The leader of the official opposition asked the prime minister to brief "the Chamber of Deputies and the Greek people fully and substantively," to immediately suspend "the nationally unacceptable haggling with NATO and Turkey and to declare that Greece this time will withdraw from NATO finally and irrevocably."

As was revealed with the exclusive publication of the secret Rogers plan in yesterday's TO VIMA, "the settlement of bilateral Greek-Turkish differences" has been put forth as a prerequisite for Greece's return to the NATO military wing. In fact, until the "differences" have been "resolved," Greece's negotiations with NATO now fall officially within the framework of Greek-Turkish differences.

In statements by its spokesman, the government confirmed the authenticity of the Rogers plan, but added that it has rejected it.

However, leader of the official opposition Andreas Papandreou replies substantively to this with exclusive statements to TA NEA in which he stresses that from within successive negotiations the government "has been led to nationally unacceptable concessions."

Specifically, A. Papandreou's statements to TA NEA are as follows:

"Indeed, the Greek Government rejected the Rogers plan. However, it is an indisputable fact that from within successive negotiations the government has been led to two nationally unacceptable concessions.

"1. It has accepted the reduction of the national airspace to 6 miles instead of 10.

"2. It abandoned the so-called 'Norwegian formula'--the special relationship it had originally sought--according to which Greek Armed Forces in peacetime would remain under national control, to pass to the now classic form of integration into the alliance.

"Thus the critical question is how can negotiations be permitted to continue, negotiations which have as their objective determining the extent of concessions in the Aegean national area.

"The responsibilities of the government and of Prime Minister Karamanlis personally are enormous, as these have created a dangerous precedent at the expense of the country's sovereign rights. Furthermore, it should be stressed that at least twice--recently in 1979--a person of high standing in the government offered guarantees to the Americans that, regardless of the final result of negotiations with NATO, they would retain their bases in Greece.

"This was done at a time when the government was assuring the people that the status of U.S. bases in Greece was linked to the course of negotiations on reintegration into NATO.

"Now the government's national duty is to immediately suspend negotiations with NATO and to proceed with the briefing of the national representatives and the people. Otherwise, if it continues the negotiations, it will shoulder responsibilities which at this moment I would not like to define. In any case, however, the charge which will weigh on it will be at least treason."

In addition, the statements of the leader of the official opposition to all the newspapers are the following:

"The revelation in Sunday's TO VIMA of the negotiations between Greece and NATO for our country's return to its military wing has created an enormous political issue for the prime minister and the New Democracy government.

"It is clear that: First, after the 'final and irrevocable' withdrawal from the military wing of NATO in 1974, the Greek Government--not NATO--sought reintegration.

"Second, despite all the prime minister's vascillation concerning 'the restriction of Greek national sovereignty' which the form of our participation in military NATO prior to 1974 entailed, and despite the fact that 49 percent of Cyprus continues to be under Turkish occupation, the government finally abandoned the Norwegian formula and accepted that part of the Greek Armed Forces come under the NATO command even 'in peacetime.'

"Third, something that is critical and nationally unacceptable: It accepted the reduction of the national airspace from 10 to 6 miles (Verona meeting). That is, it offered to the alliance and Turkey Greek national territory on the alter of reintegration--without the knowledge of the people and the Chamber of Deputies. Is this how the government knows how to protect national interests?

"Fourth, it has continued haggling for 5 years, the objective being to determine the extent of the concessions of the nation's sovereign rights on the altar of the return to military NATO.

"Fifth, a government official of high standing has assured the United States that 'regardless of what happened to reintegration, facilities for U.S. forces in Greece would continue.' This guarantee blatantly conflicts with older statements by the prime minister that U.S. bases in Greece are directly linked to Greek participation in military NATO.

"The government and especially the prime minister are exposed to the nation and the people.

"The prime minister has two immediate and elementary duties.

"First, to fully and substantively brief the Chamber and the Greek people, specifically to explain whether solutions are being planned to weaken the current FIR status in the Aegean, and also whether during the recent Turkish Air Force exercise Turkey briefed the Greek Government on already exercised rights in implementation of the above plans within the framework of negotiations with NATO.

"Second, immediately suspend nationally unacceptable haggling with NATO and Turkey and state that Greece is withdrawing from NATO 'finally and irrevocably' this time."

Late last night Foreign Minister G. Rallis made the following statement in reply to A. Papandreou:

"In his statements about negotiations with NATO and faithful to his tactics, the PASOK chairman confuses facts and inaccuracies in such a way that an uninformed person will not understand what is happening and possibly will worry. He forgets the basic fact that while the government did not conceal that it desires reintegration into the Atlantic alliance to serve important national interests, it did not accept any of the solutions that were proposed.

"The PASOK chairman continues to follow a politically unacceptable tactic: Although he knows exactly what certain points are, he exploits the government's inability to cite them publicly because it does not want to harm national positions.

"The government for 5 and ½ years has proved that it knows how to fully protect national interests, and for this reason it rejected the proposals of General Rogers without waiting for the PASOK chairman's advice."

DHROSOS CONSIDERS MISTRUST KEY PROBLEM IN REINTEGRATION

[The "Political Issues" column by G.N. Dhrosos: "Mistrust Is the Key to Everything"]

[Text] The issue of whether Greece returns to the NATO military wing recently has very frequently occupied the newspaper columns, as well as the country's political leadership. Correctly so, because many things which basically concern our country at present and in the future will depend on whatever solution is given--if it is ever given--to the issue.

As is also natural, because all the relevent negotiations are secret the pertinent newspaper reports are usually based on rumors, conclusions which are reasonable or imaginative. Two basic points must be clarified so that the conclusions which are drawn every time are as close to the truth as possible. One point is why we wish to return to the Western military alliance, and the other is why we have so far rejected all the plans and their amendments and persist on the original agreement between Davos and Haig, which essentially brings things back to their old status. Today we shall try to explain this second point, of course in its very general aspects.

All the relevant plans--which if not Turkish-inspired in any case have Turkish approval--are such that they establish on the part of NATO, or from the defense point of view if you prefer, a "new order of things" in the Aegean. The phrase belongs to the Turkish foreign minister and is correct. However, it is precisely this new order which we do not want. [paragraph continues]

We persist in the old, that is, on that order, which existed in 1974 when we withdrew. We do not want to lose any of the things we had then and we do not want to pay a price for our return.

On the contrary, the Turks want to take advantage of the situation and gain something from this affair. To be fair, we must admit that the things the Turks are currently asking were asked about 10 years ago. However, at the time we were inside NATO, we had the right of veto and we could maintain the existing status. Now we are outside, the Turks are inside and are in a position to impede our return.

What the Turks want which is, one way or another, included in the plans that are proposed to us, is their participation in the operational control of the Aegean. The kind of control and the details are not of significance. The participation is of significance, and in any case will mean the loss of some rights which we had exclusively. That is, we must lose some of the things we had in 1974.

The basic Turkish argument is that they occupy one side of the Aegean and consequently it is not right that they should be barred from operational control in the air and sea of this area. The basic Greek argument is that the Aegean is an international sea but interspersed with Greek islands. Consequently, the responsibility for the defense of the area should belong exclusively to Greece.

Greek fears consist of the fact that any Turkish participation in the operational control of the Aegean will sooner or later lead the Turks to the expression of demands for participation in other things: for example, in the Continental Shelf and so forth.

NATO is dealing with the issue primarily as a technical-military issue, and secondarily as a political issue. We would say that the exact opposite is the case, that the issue is, for us at least, primarily political.

If another power occupied the area that is currently occupied by Turkey--France or Italy, for example--the solution would be very easy and many concessions on our part would be permissible. However, in this instance there is necessarily much mistrust on our part, which is at least absolutely justified because at times, even officially, undisguised or veiled Turkish designs have been expressed on at least certain Greek islands in the Aegean, and because we have in mind the Turkish tactic of backtracking and striving for a gradual and long-term achievement of goals that currently are veiled but in the future will be undisguised.

Thus the key to the entire affair lies here: in the deep mistrust which we have for our neighbors for the east.

For this reason we claim that the issue is primarily political and secondarily technical. The careful texts of NATO cannot shake our mistrust. There are definite actions and statements by the Turkish side which necessarily make us distrustful. Of course, all these reservations cannot be shaken by skillful decisions regarding Turkish participation in the operational control of the Aegean. Specific acts and guarantees are needed which are not easy to obtain. For this reason and despite our wish to return to NATO, we have thus far rejected all the proposals and amendments which have been submitted to us. The secure way for our return is for the Turks to abandon their insidious ways and accept the existing status of operational control. After all, all these things can be discussed comfortably and on equal terms, that is, without blackmail, after our return to the military wing of the Western alliance.

NATIONAL SECURITY COUNCIL MEETS, REVIEWS DOMESTIC SITUATION

[Text] The National Security Council has announced that the domination of the state and its democratic authority and the laws of the republic will definitely be insured, and the tranquility and security in the country will again be fully secured. A statement was issued at the end of the National Security Council meeting, which was held under the chairmanship of President Fahri Koruturk and which lasted approximately 6 hours. The statement noted that developments in internal events during the past month and the issue of nationwide smuggling were generally assessed during the meeting.

The statement said, in accordance with this assessment, that the National Security Council has reached the following conclusions: The effective struggle against all kinds of illegal actions, anarchy, terrorism, secessionism and robberies will be continued mercilessly.

Members of certain clandestine organizations were caught in groups and delivered to judiciary organs during operations which have been conducted recently and which are still being conducted.

It is the primary duty of the state to render ineffective all forms of anarchy and threats directed against the state, the republic, the unity and solidarity of the nation, the integrity and indivisibility of the country and the life, property and security of the citizens. The domination of the state and its democratic authority and the laws of the republic will definitely be secured in this struggle.

The statement, which was issued by the National Security Council Secreteriat, continued: There is no doubt that all citizens, who are aware of the threats directed against their country and state and who have adopted the free democratic system, will--as always--assist the state's forces in attaining this target [the free democratic system]. Certain groups, who aim to destroy the Turkish Republic, are, on the one hand, trying to divide our citizens and topple each other, and on the other hand, resorting to provocations and schemes aimed at weakening our economy, decreasing our production and distrupting labor peace. Our people, and especially our workers, should be alert in the face of such illegal schemes and provocations.

The terrible murders, which have recently been directed against the security forces, the soldiers and the policemen, which deeply grieve us, will certainly be stopped and these criminals will be dealt with in the most severe and merciless manner.

The National Security Council also reviewed the measures taken so far to prevent the widespread smuggling incidents, which aid anarchy and terrorism, and has made the necessary recommendations to the government regarding the new administrative, economic, legal and security measures to be taken in this matter.

Prime Minister Suleyman Demirel, Chief of the General Staff Gen Kenan Evren, ministers who are members of the council, the ground and naval forces commanders and the general secretary of the council attended the meeting, which was held at the Cankaya Mansion.

MAJOR PARTIES MEET TO DISCUSS PRESIDENTIAL ELECTION

[Text] It has been announced that RPP Secretary General Mustafa Ustundag and Justice Party Secretary General Nahit Mentese held a meeting on the election of a president and on the work of the National Assembly.

Speaking to a TPT correspondent, Ustundag said that he held a meeting with Mentese in connection with the election of a president. Pointing out that the meeting, which was held on 12 March, was convened upon the request of RPP Leader Bulent Ecevit, Ustundag said: Our meeting with honorable Mentese was a preliminary preparation. Our aim is to arrange a meeting between the two leaders. Declaring that he met Mentese once, Ustundag said that he contacted Mentese on the telephone prior to the meeting in connection with the same subject. Ustundag also noted that the contacts on this subject will continue.

Mentese also said that he held a meeting with Ustundag. In reply to a question by a TRT correspondent, Mentese said: We discussed the election of a new president and the work of the National Assembly following honourable Ustundag's request. We did not mention any names during the discussion. We will continue to hold these meetings, which consist of preliminary preparations, with the RPP and with other party groups which are represented at parliament. We want a president to be elected as soon as possible.

ECEVIT SAYS RPP READY FOR DIALOG ON PRESIDENTIAL ELECTIONS

[Text] RPP leader Bulent Ecevit has said that it would be beneficial if all the political parties and parliamentary groups, mainly the two major parties, could start a dialog among themselves and look for a solution before the presidential elections begin in Turkey.

Addressing the joint meeting of the RPP Senate and National Assembly groups, Ecevit pointed out that it was very important for the presidential elections to be held speedily and in a manner satisfactory to the entire parliament and public opinion at a time when Turkey was going through a serious crisis. Recalling that he had sent a message to Justice Party leader Demirel earlier telling him that the RPP was ready for a dialog on this issue, Ecevit noted that the issue had been discussed between the secretaries general of the two parties.

Ecevit stated that no specific reply had been received from the Justice Party so far. He expressed the hope that the views of the Justice Party regarding the issue would be expressed soon. He added that after the Justice Party's stand was disclosed, the RPP would assess the situation and discuss the issue with the group members. Ecevit said: I believe that it would be damaging to the candidates we might nominate to discuss names or to work on the presidential election issue before we know the possibilities of any interparty dialog, and before we know whether or not it can be established.

Ecevit then suggested that unless a specific and positive reply is received from the Justice Party by Saturday, when the presidential election is to be held, the RPP joint Senate and National Assembly group would meet at 1000 on the same day.

TERCUMAN: CONSTITUTION, ELECTORAL LAW SHOULD BE AMENDED

NC170955 Istanbul TERCUMAN in Turkish 13 Mar 80 pp 1, 10 NC

[Article by Nazli Ilicak: "Legitimate Governments Plus Army Equals Power"]

[Excerpts] First let me pose my questions: What is 27 May?... An army intervention. What is 12 March?... An army intervention. Is another intervention possible? Yes, it is.

Such speculations are now being discussed behind the political scenes. Even the form of such an intervention is discussed: Is another letter of warning from the force commanders on the way? [paragraph continues]

What will it confirm? What will Demirel's and Ecevit's attitude be? More important than all this, who will be the target of the warning? Will it blame the government, the opposition or parliament?

Two short-term measures can be taken toward countering a military intervention: The election of the new president should not be protracted, and the Demirel government should remain in office until a decision for early elections is taken.

Another long-term measure should be the amendment of certain provisions in the Constitution and the electoral law so as to strengthen the executive organs and make the political regime operational. The Justice Party approves of neither the Constitution nor the electoral law.

Whenever an argument over the Constitution arises in Turkey, a military intervention comes to mind immediately. For the constitutional law in Turkey has always been introduced under the auspices of the armed forces.

Military intervention has not always confined itself to drafting or amending the Constitution. On many occasions the army has directly or indirectly seized the administration and dabbled in politics. Both the Ottoman Empire and our young republic have suffered setbacks as a result.

The task of protecting and supporting the republic can be carried out only when the army is on the side of the legitimate government. Contrary acts are bound to lead to more serious crises and to provoke wide repercussions for the people. Eventually, democracy which we try to preserve, receives serious wounds.

The will of the nation has become evident in the 14 October elections. The Demirel administration has been set up in answer to the call of the nation. The Turkish Armed Forces are obliged to follow the same path. Today's formula is: legitimate government plus armed forces equals power.

NAP OFFICIAL ACCUSES COMMUNISTS OF DISRUPTING STATE

[Text] Nationalist Action Party Deputy Secretary General Omer Cakiroglu has pointed out that in the program "What Does Terrorism Want?" broadcast on television, the extreme right was portrayed as the enemy of the state and activists aiming at destroying the state were attributed to it. He added that this had caused concern and reaction in the nation.

In a written statement, Cakiroglu alleged that it was only the communists who wanted to destroy the state, divide the nation and change the political system in Turkey. He added that nothing would be gained by protraying the nationalists as extreme rightists and involved in such activities.

PCP REPUDIATES CARVALHO CALL FOR ARMED STRUGGLE

LD181512 Lisbon in Portuguese to Europe 1230 GMT 18 Mar 80 LD

[Text] The Portuguese Communist Party [PCP] has attacked Otelo Saraiva de Carvalho for the statements he made in Evora during the weekend to the effect that only armed struggle could lead to the rural workers' victory over the rightwing government. In the PCP's view, Otelo Saraiva de Carvalho is clearly playing into the right's hands by adopting a defeatist and demobilizing outlook on the situation concerning agrarian reform while at the same time trying to push the workers into forms of struggle that, to say the least, cannot but be regarded as provocative.

DAILY TELEGRAPH: OLYMPICS BOYCOTT VOTE NOT DECISIVE

[Editorial: "A Question of Conscience"]

[Text] It is impossible to pretend that the Commons vote on British participation in the Olympics was the decisive, clear-cut, moral pronouncement which ideally it should have been. It revealed, indeed, overwhelming support in the Conservative Party for the stand that Mrs Thatcher has taken, and it also revealed that a substantial section of the Labour Party (the section which is not encumbered by active or latent sympathy with the Soviet Union) did not so much favour British participation as disapprove of the tactics the government had adopted. However, the House was not engaged in legislating, for which a majority of one is notoriously enough, but in the much more delicate and perilous business of offering moral leadership. Something like a unanimous vote would no doubt have carried great authority even with athletes. As it is, the first signs are that the sporting world is not yet trembling.

It is, unfortunately, equally clear that the government has not succeeded in getting over to the public the precise nature of its concern about the Olympics. It is not trying to maim a sporting occasion for the sake of making a political point: its object is to prevent a sporting occasion from being ruthlessly used to promote the cause of Russia's expansionist and aggressive foreign policy.

Plainly, the government must maintain its stance, but in the process it must be careful not to give the impression of nagging or indulging in petty, dishonest or mean-spirited coercion. It was emphatically right yesterday to make clear that the money voluntarily subscribed by servicemen and their families to the British Olympic team will be duly passed on. Beyond this, there is nothing to do but hope that sportsmen here and elsewhere will realise that going to Moscow now, after so many governments have made clear their support for a boycott, will be interpreted by the Russians and advertised to the world as a proclamation of support for the Soviet cause.

COMMON MARKET CONCERNED OVER THATCHER STAND ON BUDGET

LD191105 London THE DAILY TELEGRAPH in English 19 Mar 80 pp 1, 36 LD

[Alan Osborn dispatch: "Brussels Consternation"]

[Text] Brussels--Mrs Thatcher's statement that Britain might withhold part of her VAT payment to the Common Market unless the British contribution to the EEC budget was reduced caused some consternation in Brussels when it became known during a meeting of EEC foreign ministers. The Italian foreign minister and president of the EEC Council, Signore Ruffini, said: "I hope Mrs Thatcher does not do this because it would cause very serious problems for the Community."

Much of the speculation in Brussels was over how, if at all, yesterday's statement differed from other recent pronouncements on the subject and the general consensus was that it marked a slight toughening of the British position. In her BBC Panorama interview earlier in the month, for instance, the prime minister had said that withholding part of Britain's VAT contributions to the EEC might have to be considered, "but I am very loth to do that"--a comment that perhaps significantly did not reappear yesterday.

If Britain did go ahead and cut its contributions unilaterally there is no doubt that massive political, legal and financial confusion would follow. There is no precedent for this kind of action--indeed it has never been even threatened or considered by any country before. But even some strong pro-Europeans believe that this is now the best option open to Mrs Thatcher for it could have the effect of galvanising the rest of the Community into prompt and effective action to meet the British demands.

The alternative would be piecemeal, inadequate, face-saving remedies that, while they may put an end to the dispute for the time being, might do little or nothing to stem the growing tide of anti-Market feeling in Britain. It is also believed by some observers that Britain need not necessarily lay itself open to charges of breaking community law by withholding part of the contribution, though this is by no means a universal view.

As the chances for final settlement of Britain's Common Market budget problem at the next EEC summit on March 31 receded still further, the foreign secretary, Lord Carrington, gloomily warned yesterday that the consequences of failure "would obviously be very grave." Although Lord Carrington insisted at a press conference after the EEC Council meeting that solving the problem would get harder the more it was delayed, he appeared to be implicitly accepting that there will be no final settlement at the summit.

"I won't stick my neck out and say we will have agreement," he said.

It would be "infinitely rreferable" if this happened. But the foreign secretary concluded by noting that those who talked of "last chances," expecially in politics, "are always being proved wrong." There was no discussion of the details of the British claim in Brussels yesterday.

The central facts--that while Britain is the third poorest EEC member it is required to shoulder by far the largest share of financing the Common Market--are familiar and not in dispute.

Lord Carrington did not spell out by how much the government wanted the 1,100 million pounds sterling bill out, but he stressed the need for a solution that was "fair and defensible" and which lasted for as long as the problem existed. This has been the official British opposition all along. What was more interesting yesterday was the foreign secretary's reaction to the French demand that the budget problem be placed in the context of Community problems generally, which was France's way of saying that it should be linked to the issues of farm prices, fisheries and lamb.

In drawing up the agenda for the summit meeting ministers decided to lump these four subjects together, implying some sort of linkage between them. Asked about this, Lord Carrington said the government took the view that these issues "are to be treated on their merits." He declined to explain further. "It means what is says. Next question," he said.

The impression in Brussels now is that the Thatcher government has at last recognised that it will get little further with its demands for a reduction in payments unless it makes concessions in other areas. Yesterday's agreement for the subjects to be discussed under the same heading at the summit is thus seen as a British climb-down and a tactical victory for France. But the French were less successful when they tried to seal off the summit from any further last-minute proposals to deal with the budget problem.

Most foreign ministers agreed with Lord Carrington that it was common sense to allow in every idea which could lead to a solution, and the French deputy foreign minister, Mr Bernard-Reymond, was isolated 8 to 1. This is a relatively minor matter, for the Brussels Commission has already produced an ambitious, if vague, scheme for channelling more EEC money to Britain and the most it is likely to do between now and the summit is to present a refinemement of this plan.

But in the eyes of many in Brussels, the French are determined to seize every opportunity for cutting short the debate on the budget at the summit.

Although the Thatcher government has so far stood firm against any linkage of the budget to other EEC problems--believing itself in the words of Sir Geoffrey Howe to have an "overhwelmingly strong" case--the belief is now growing that if and when the problem is solved it will have to be in the form of one huge package. This is not probable at the Brussels summit this month; the meeting in June in Venice is a better bet. On the other hand, the French will be keen for an early decision on farm prices--one of their "conditions."

So far the Brussels Commission has proposed an average increase of 2.4 per cent in prices to farmers this year. Britain's farm minister, Mr Walker, believes a freeze is necessary while the French want increases of over five per cent. There are no more EEC ministerial meetings to consider the budget problem before the summit, but farm ministers will meet in Brussels next week.

GROMYKO PRESENCE AT TREATY CELEBRATION NOT YET CERTAIN

[Special DIE PRESSE report: "Will Gromyko, Too, Attend State Treaty Anniversary?"]

[Text] Vienna--The three foreign ministers Vance (United States), Lord Carrington (Great Britain), and Francois-Poncet (France) have already made commitments to attend the celebration of the 25th anniversary of the Austrian State Treaty on 15 May in Vienna. This was stated on Tuesday [18 March] by Chancellor Kreisky. He added that only Foreign Minister Gromyko has not yet agreed to come.

CHANCELLOR KREISKY JUSTIFIES PLO RECOGNITION

DW200816 Stuttgart Suedeutscher Rundfunk Network in German 1110 GMT 19 Mar 80 DW

[Excerpts from Klaus Metzler interview with Austrian Chancellor Bruno Kreisky in Vienna--recorded]

[Text] [Question] You made the PLO acceptable the other day, having recognized it diplomatically. Why?

[Answer] In my speech to the United Nations in New York in the fall Isaid clearly and plainly that we recognize the PLO as the representative of the Palestinian people. And what we have actually done was only the implementation of that statement, namely giving the local PLO representative here, who was here because he had already been accredited with the international organizations, the Atomic Energy Agency, the UNIDO and others, an opportunity to deal with the Austrian authorities in his capacity as the PLO representative as well.

[Question] May I conclude from what you have said that you consider the PLO socially acceptable, that you think this was an act of political farsightedness and political need?

[Answer] It has been among society for a long time already, and you know that a PLO representative has had a seat and a vote in the United Nations for years. So it has been recognized by nearly all states of the world for quite some time now, except the United States and the European democracies. It is high time for this lack of understanding for problems of the Palestinian people to be eliminated.

[Question] In doing this you have again caused trouble for yourself, particularly in Tel Aviv where they are again furious at Bruno Kreisky. Does this worry you?

[Answer] It is funny. The press reports from Tel Aviv are much more restrained because they assumed that this had happened long ago. And the reports of German papers mostly deal with. ...[interviewer interrupts]

[Question] What do you think ought to be done now by those involved, the Israelis and the Palestinians, the Americans and certainly also by the Egyptians? Autonomy talks are continuing. What could and what should the West do now?

[Answer] I can only repeat what I recently told your colleagues from the German paper DIE ZEIT: If one wants to maintain self-respect and demand that the Soviet troops release a country they have occupied, one can do that only if one demands simultaneously that foreign soldiers, namely Israeli soldiers, leave Palestinian soil as envisaged by the UN resolution.

Pahr: No U.S. Inquiry

[Georg Possanner report on interview of Foreign Minister Pahr on 18 March]

[Text] "We never received any inquiry," Foreign Minister Pahr declared on Tuesday [18 March] in a talk with DIE PRESSE, denying reports that the U.S. Government asked for an explanation of the recognition by Austria of the PLO. Such reports are "canards," he said. "Actually, we do not owe anyone an explanation, but we are willing to give out information." Incidentally, he added, Austria recognized the PLO as long ago as in October last year, through the chancellor's speech before the United Nations and his own speech at the UN General Assembly. Pahr said he believed that the PLO had altered its policy and that "it is realistic enough to recognize the existence of Israel."

In reply to the question why the recognition of the PLO was announced only 2 months after the arrival of 'Arafat's letter, Pahr declared: "We are under no obligation to announce everything immediately, urbi et orbi." He added that he had made the announcement "in passing," in the course of an interview during which he had been asked what Austria's next move would be after French President Giscard d'Estaing's statements on the Palestinian problem. Asked whether he was of the opinion that the PLO's National Charter did not aim at Israel's destruction, Pahr declared "I do not want to interpret the Charter." The recognition of the PLO does certainly not mean a recognition of its charter as well, Pahr declared, adding: "The Charter is an internal affair of the PLO: That is quite a different matter."

PLO'S HUSAYN REJECTS ISREALI 'LIES' ABOUT PLO GOALS

AU181301 Vienna VOLKSSTIMME in German 18 Mar 80 p 2 AU

[Unattributed report: "PLO Representative Dr Husayn Declares: 'We Don't Want To Destroy Israel'"]

[Text] Vienna--Dr Ghazi Husayn, the PLO representative in Vienna recognized by the Austrian Government, declares in a release that the PLO wanted to destroy Israel is a Zionist lie. The PLO Charter, he states, does not say anything like that. Israel is using that assertion as a pretext for "committing terrorism against the Palestinian people, for driving them out of the country and for stealing their land." The PLO Charter speaks of liberation, return, the right to self-determination and sovereignty. The goal is to establish a Palestinian state on Palestinian soil. The PLO distinguishes between Jews and Zionism. It condemns the persecution of Jews and directs its struggle against the "racist, expansionist and aggressive character of Zionism." The recognition of the PLO by Austria is a courageous, justified and constructive step toward genuine peace in the Middle East, Husayn says. With his recognition of the PLO, Chancellor Kreisky wanted to forestall a holocaust of the Palestinian people. In conclusion, Husayn appeals to the West European countries, especially to the FRG, at last to live up to their moral and political responsibility vis-a-vis the Palestinian people.

NICARAGUAN DELEGATION VISITS SEEKING TECHNICAL AID

Meets With Pahr

AU181321 Vienna WIENER ZEITUNG in German 18 Mar 80 p 2 AU

The foreign minister emphasized that the democratic states are obliged to support the new democracy in Nicaragua in every respect--in the cultural and political as well as the economic field.

Sergio Ramirez reported on the forthcoming great literacy campaign and affirmed Nicaragua's interest in establishing, with the aid of Asutrian technology, among other things a national paper industry and production plants for fuel alcohol. The Austrian achievements in this field are outstanding, he said, but in view of its economic difficulties caused by the civil war, Nicaragua is to a large extent dependent on loans for financing such projects.

Sergio Ramirez Interview

AU191330 Vienna ARBEITER-ZEITUNG in German 19 Mar 80 p 4 AU

[Brigitte Kirchhoff and Georg Hoffmann-Ostenhof report on interview with Sergio Ramirez, head of a Nicaraguan Government delegation currently visiting Austria and one of the five members of the governing Sandinist junta, in Vienna, date not specified]

[Text] Vienna (AZ)--Money--that is what the new Nicaragua needs most. That was stated in a talk with ARBEITER-ZEITUNG by Sergio Ramirez, one of the five members of the governing Sandinist Junta, who is touring Europe to seek technical and financial aid for his country, which less than a year ago succeeded in liberating itself from Somoza and his dictatorship.

"We have no domestic capital that would permit us to survive the difficult economic situation of the postwar era without foreign aid," 39-year-old Ramirez declares. So far, only the Americans want to set conditions for [aid to] the emaciated country--for example, that no Cuban teachers must teach at schools built with their money. "That is infantile," Ramirez says. So far, Nicaragua has succeeded in raising 250 million dollars, primarily from West Germany, Holland, Sweden, and also from the United States and from international institutions such as the World Bank.

The main task for the junta in the immediate future are investments in agriculture. Some 60 percent of the latifundios are owned by Somoza and his clan. They were converted into state cooperatives, and now it is necessary to boost the production of cotton and of basic foodstuffs to insure the supply of the people. On Sundays, everyone turns out to pick cotton--"including Cabinet members."

Next Saturday the literacy campaign is slated to begin. Twenty-thousand "campaigners"--students, college students and teachers--will swarm all over the country to teach the people how to read and write within 4 months. "That is a real army now taking up pencil and paper. We hope in that way to be able to reduce illiteracy from 52 to 8 percent. This will completely alter the country's profile," Ramirez declares proudly. Prior to his joining the struggle of the Sandinists, he was a widely renowned writer.

The second main task is to reconstruct the public health service, which has been in an extremely poor state up to now. It is planned to provide for the enrollment of 500 medical students at Managua University annually. This year, 500 new students have already enrolled. "Thus we could have enough physicians for our country in 5 years' time." Meanwhile, the country appreciates the help of foreign physicians. Austrian physicians are also helping there.

Elections will be held when the current junta resigns. When is that going to be? "We don't know when, but it will be soon." To hold elections now would be "illogical": If elections were held next Sunday, the Sandinists would get 99 percent of the votes, "but we do not have any institutions for elections." The holding of elections will cost five times as much as the literacy campaign, he says.

In the elections, several parties will be able to run, ranging from Communists through Social Democrats to the Conservatives, who are very weak.

It is not yet clear exactly which form of democratic representation is aimed at. However, a maximum participation of the people is to be insured. What is the social nature of the society sought by the Nicaraguan junta? Ramirez says in reply to a question about the future of the middle classes, "We are building a new society where even factory directors can lead their lives and rich people too. Experience will show whether or not this is feasible. We cannot make any predictions. But at least we are ready to guarantee that."

Economic Needs Outlined

[Philippe Gudenus report on interview of Sergio Ramirez Mercado, member of the 5-man Nicaraguan Junta for National Reconstruction, in Vienna--no date given]

[Excerpts] Vienna--"Nicaragua now has a mixed economy system," Sergio Ramirez Mercado, one of the five members of the Junta for National Reconstruction, told DIE PRESSE. After the complete destruction of the country in the civil war last summer, it is compelled to take aid wherever it can get it. Hence one delegation, headed by the radical guerrilla leaders Moises Hassan and Henry Ruiz, is visiting Moscow and the East bloc countries, while Ramirez, the Sandinist Bayardo Arce and Finance Minister Cuadra visited Brussels, the Hague and Bonn and are now in Vienna.

They are specifically interested in Austrian aid in fuel alcohol production from sugar cane, and in cellulose production from their coniferous woods on the northern Atlantic coast. Last year's crops have been lost and the first concern of the new leadership is to insure an adequate food supply. At the moment nearly half of all foodstuffs have to be imported. The next step is to be the resumption of agricultural exports--cotton, coffee, beef and sugar--but gradually the country's monocultures are to give way to more diversified agriculture.

"Mixed economy" means that one-third of the arable land, the former Somoza estates, has been nationalized and that those estates are now run as cooperatives. However, there are still large private enterprises, such as a 10,000 hectare sugar plantation near San Antonio, Ramirez declares.

BRIEFS

YUGOSLAVIA ASSETS AGREEMENT--On 19 March Austrian Foreign Minister Willibald Pahr and SFRY Deputy Finance Minister Bozidar Radunovic signed in Vienna a treaty between the Republic of Austria and the SFRY providing for the settlement of certain property questions. "Under the provisions of this treaty the SFRY will pay a lump sum indemnity of 2.4 million schillings for certain property, rights and interests (assets) of Austrian natural citizens which were nationalized in 1948. The treaty requires parliamentary approval, and will go into effect after the exchange of the ratification instruments. The distribution of the above-mentioned amount will require an Austrian indemnification law." Radunovic and the Yugoslav Finance Ministry officials accompanying him also visited Vice Chancellor and Finance Minister Androsch, and had consultations at the Austrian Finance and Foreign ministries. SCHMIDT CALLS FOR SUMMIT WITH HONECKER

[Text] Bonn--In his state of the nation address to the Bundestag in Bonn today Federal Chancellor Helmut Schmidt spoke of generally positive results of 10 years of the social-liberal policy for Germany. It could be rightly be claimed that its policy for Germany had since 1969 achieved concrete positive results for the people in the divided country, and safeguarded and strengthened the cohesion of Germans. The chancellor expressed the wish to hold the postponed meeting in the GDR with SED leader Erich Honecker "as soon as possible."

"The relationship between both states has on the whole improved, although we cannot talk of good relations or normality," said Schmidt. A lot remained to be done. "As long as there is a wall, and as long as there is the use of force along the frontier through Germany, we cannot be satisfied." The causes for tensions between the two German states continued to exist. However, this could not be otherwise, given the differences in the politifal systems as well as the lack of basic political freedoms and lack of freedom of movement in the GDR.

The chancellor warned strongly against wanting to change the "present state of Germany brought about by Hitler's policy" by a policy of more hardness or constant accusations, or undo the consequences of the war. He said that such attempts would cause additional threats. Should detente be replaced by a fresh confrontation, nobody would suffer more than the Germans, especially those in the GDR.

In the foreign policy section of his government declaration the chancellor underlined: "the demand for a withdrawal of the Soviet troops from Afghanistan is the first priority." The Soviet incursion led to a serious international crisis, which affected East-West relations in Europe. "We hope, together with our allies, to limit the harm in Europe." According to Schmidt the Western alliance has in the meantime "achieved decisive progress" with its reply to the Soviet expansion.

As focal points of a "European action" within the framework of a common Western policy, Schmidt emphasized, among other things, the proposal made by the EC for a nonalined and neutral Afghanistan, the aim of a comprehensive partnership with the countries of the Third World to strengthen their economic and political independence, and endeavors to revive a European-Arab dialog. The EC and its member-states have proven in the present world-political situation that they are serious that a united Europe should assume its responsibility in the world and should contribute in accordance with its traditions and task.

In the matter of a boycott of the Moscow Olympics, Schmidt repeated Bonn's demand to Moscow to establish the conditions under which all states could take part at the games. "These conditions are not being met today, because the occupation and fighting in Afghanistan continues undiminished." Hinting at the probability of a Western boycott, Schmidt said that if peace is not reestablished in Afghanistan, a "common consequence" is unavoidable.

The chancellor warned the Soviet Union that the conditions of untroubled cooperation could not be established by "attempting to divide the members of the Western alliance or even the members of this Federal Government from each other." On the attacks in the Soviet press against him and Foreign Minister Hans-Dietrich Genscher, he said that their policies are idential, as are those of all members of the government.

In connection with the economic measures taken by the United States against the Soviet Union, the chancellor said that economic relations with the Soviet Union would in keeping to the agreements be shaped such that the German economy did not gain any advantages from the measures taken by the alliance partners. "Together with our allies we shall take care that our economic relations do not strengthen Soviet armaments or military potential." He underlined at the same time that the government would continue to consider trade and economic cooperation with Eastern Europe as important elements of Bonn's policy for European stability.

In his third government declaration on foreign matters within 3 months, Schmidt emphasized again that the Federal Republic's security rests with the alliance of the free nations of Western Europe and North America, and that the United States led as "first among equals." He gave assurances that the Federal Republic would continue to make its contribution towards the alliance's defense capability and to safeguard the military balance.

The chancellor expressly declared himself in favor of "both parts" of NATO's decision last December on new U.S. nuclear medium-range weapons and the simultaneous offer to the USSR of negotiations on a limitation of these weapons. It is exclusively a question of restoring an equilibrium which had been upset. No one in the Western alliance is seeking superiority or one-sided advantages. Bonn and its partners in the alliance are agreed that NATO's offer of arms control to the USSR remained on the table. Schmidt stressed: "It is the responsibility of the USSR to restore the equilibrium which has been upset by withdrawing troops from Afghanistan so that the laboriously opened paths of cooperation will remain open and world peace be preserved."

Schmidt criticized remarks by the CDU-CSU candidate for the chancellorship, Franz Josef Strauss, about the joint statements issued at the chancellor's summit meetings in Paris in February and in Washington at the beginning of March. By belittling the German-French statement as "bordering on the foolish" and by trying to brush aside the German-U.S. statement as a product of the election campaign--and this on U.S. soil--Strauss harmed the interests of the Federal Republic and insulted the heads of government and state who were parties to these statements.

In analyzing the results of the SPD-FDB coalition's "10 Year Policy for Germany," the chancellor compared them with the improvements achieved by former Federal Chancellor Willy Brandt when he submitted the 20-point program during the Kassel meeting with GDR Premier Willi Stoph in 1970. Much of this 20-point "audacious program" had today been realized. With its purposeful policy for Germany the coalition had eased the situation of the people and lessened the harshness of the division, kept the German question open and stressed the aim of German unity also vis-a-vis the treaty partners. The burdens of the past had also been diminished in the past 10 years in the relationship with the nations of Western Europe within the framework of treaties and cooperation.

Schmidt continued that another result of this policy had been that it enabled the Federal Republic to play its role in the process of detente since the end of the sixties. It had prevented the Germans from entering into a period of isolation because of their special situation as a divided nation. It has become possible to expand the Federal Republic's world-political freedom of action considerably.

On the future of the German nation, the chancellor noted "soberly" that the political constellations offered at the present time no possiblities toward overcoming the German division. It would serve little purpose to present now reunification plans or to argue what German unity could look like. But the Federal Republic's declared aim in the "letter on German unity" that peace in Europe was the precondition for Germans finding their way together had undiminished validity.

Strauss Criticizes Address

[Excerpts] Bonn--CDU/CSU chancellor candidate Franz Josef Strauss said in his direct reply that Schmidt's 1-hour-long government statement had been less a report on the state of the nation than a "kind of internal party pacification action." He had largely repeated known facts and arguments and given a report on the "nonexisting" state within the SPD. The chancellor's report was remarkable "for what it failed to say." Strauss charged that for tactical reasons the federal chancellor had spoken during his U.S. visit of "16 million German hostages in the GDR." This was a "dangerous slip of the tongue." The CSU chairman declared: "I speak here of 16 million accusers of an unjust system."

Strauss criticized Schmidt's statement on the intra-German situation and charged him with having described the human rights question in too-rosy terms. What Schmidt had described as the result of the new ostpolitik was the minimum, which should be the norm between civilized states. In this connection Strauss recalled that the "shoot to kill" order had been reiterated in the GDR, and that frontier installations had been expanded even more. Strauss sharply attacked the SPD's attitude on NATO's arms decision, especially floor leader Herbert Wehner's stance, after the papers had reported over the weekend that Wehner was solidly against deployment of atomic weapons in the Federal Republic. It is now being said that Wehner and Schmidt were on a common course. "Stop playing hide and seek," said Strauss.

On behalf of the CDU/CSU, the chancellor candidate gave the assurance that the party welcomed every initiative for a just and effective arms limitation. But the union was not prepared to consider arms limitation as an end in itself. To the USSR, arms limitation is only a means in its strategy to make its military supremacy felt in the sphere of disarmament talks. At the end of his 1-hour reply, Strauss charged the chancellor with having failed to give a realistic assessment of the situation and describing clearly what sacrifices and burdens the Federal Republic had to bear. Only such a starting position would have made it possible "to utilize the Afghanistan problem to achieve a move toward freedom throughout the world at long last."

The CSU chairman warned against viewing the Afghanistan invasion as an "adventure" or as a "childish prank." The Soviet Union linked its steps with the preparation for control over the Arab oil countries, an approach to the Indian Ocean, the intimidation of India, massive influence on the nonalined countries, the start of a "geopolitical redistribution or new distribution," and, finally, the attempt to separate European interests from those of the United States. To say all this would have been worthy of a head of government," said Strauss. It must be made clear to Moscow that there is a point beyond which it cannot go. Peace in Afghanistan cannot be neutrality in the sense of the country's further dependence on the USSR, but must incorporate elements of neutrality, integrity, sovereignty and the people's full right to self-determination. It was "almost childish" to say only that a Soviet withdrawal from Afghanistan was expected. "Afghanistan is a turning point, for better or for worse," said Strauss.

DEFENSE MINISTER VOWS: NO GERMAN SOLDIERS ON GULF

DW171330 Hamburg BILD in German 15 Mar 80 pp 1-12 DW

[Richard Voelkel interview with Federal Defense Minister Hans Apel]

[Text] Bonn, 15 March--BILD: Soviet in Afghanistan and hostages in Tehran--does the danger exist of a military conflict between the United States and the USSR?

Apel: I am convinced that in the future, the United States will continue to behave as admirably as it has to date. But in the event the Soviet Union reaches beyond the area of domination it is currently holding, the danger of a world conflagration would be very great.

BILD: U.S. senators demand that Bundeswehr soldiers be sent to the Persian Gulf...

Apel: On this point I am perfectly agreed with my colleague Brown: There will not be any Bundeswehr soldiers outside the NATO area and, hence, not on the Persian Gulf. An extension of the NATO mandate to the Persian Gulf also is out of the question.

BILD: Will military service be extended beyond 15 months?

Apel: No. The high birth-rate age groups will cover the personnel needs of the Bundeswehr for the next 3 to 4 years. We will have to think about an extension of the military service period when the low birth-rate age groups are scheduled to serve in the Bundeswehr: At the end of the eighties.

BILD: The aid to Turkey costs a lot of money. Will the tax cuts have to be reduced?

Apel: For 1980 we will receive up to DM1 billion more for defense spending. This also includes the important military assistance to Turkey. This increase in expenditures for our security in no way justifies any questioning of the tax package.

BILD: Will the soldier's pay be increased?

Apel: I will propose to the federal cabinet an increase in the soldier's pay by DM1 per day effective January 1981. This will cost as much as DM100 million.

BILD: Reportedly you are suffering from office-fatigue. Do you, after an election victory, no longer want to stay on as defense minister?

Apel: This is up to the voters to decide, and above all up to the chancellor. For my part, I would gladly remain defense minister.

BILD: But reports also have it that you want to succeed Wehner as the chief of the Bundestag group and enter into the 1984 election campaign as the SPD chancellor candidate...

Apel: I would not even think of that. We have a chairman of the Bundestag group whom we will continue to need in the next legislative period. Besides, there is no such thing as a crown prince in a democracy. I shall do my duty wherever I am assigned.

INDIA, FRG TO WORK FOR NONALINED AFGHANISTAN

BK181115 Delhi General Overseas Service in English 1000 GMT 18 Mar 80 BK

[Text] India and the Federal Republic of Germany have decided to reinvigorate their joint economic commission. An understanding to this effect has been reached during the 1-day visit of External Affairs Minister Mr Narasimha Rao to Bonn.

The commission was set up about 3 years ago to deal with issues of West German investments in India, the transfer of technology, cooperation in third country ventures and economic cooperation in general. Mr Narasimha Rao said last night in Bonn that India felt encouraged by the interest shown by West German industrial houses and business enterprises in cooperation with Indian industries.

At a banquet given in his honor by the foreign minister of the FRG, Mr Genscher, Mr Rao said that the Indian Government will find ways and means of channelizing their interest into priority sectors of the economy.

India and West Germany have also agreed to keep in close touch with each other to avoid misinterpretation of policies of the two countries on major international issues. An understanding to this effect was also reached during Mr Rao's talks in Bonn.

Discussions with Chancellor Schmidt and Foreign Minister Mr Genscher has resulted in an agreement on the need to work for an independent and nonalined Afghanistan without outside interference and without military intervention. Both India and the FRG agreed to defuse the tension in the region and avoid a confrontation between the great powers.

GENSCHER SEES COMMON INTERESTS BETWEEN WEST EUROPE, U.S.

[Text] Bonn--In the opinion of Federal Foreign Minister Hans-Dietrich Genscher, the NATO decisions on nuclear counterarming in the alliance and a disarmament offer to the Eastern bloc must be adhered to absolutely in the interest of West Europe's alliance solidarity with the United States.

Without dealing directly with the remarks made by SPD Parliamentary Group Chairman Herbert Wehner, who at the weekend came out against the stationing of medium-range nuclear weapons in the Federal Republic, Genscher today told the FDP presidium that no hopes must be aroused in Moscow "of the Europeans and Americans drifting apart." This would adversely affect the bases of a realistic policy of detente. It was therefore also important "for the December decisions by the Western defense alliance to be consistently implemented in all their parts," stressed the FDP chairman.

Genscher said that the Bundestag debate this Thursday on the government statement on the state of the nation will also be concerned with clearly presenting the common interests of Europeans and Americans. The interests of the German nation, which is compelled against its will to exist in two states, can be effectively represented only on the basis of Western unity as expressed in the European Community and in the Western alliance.

GDR FREES 30 POLITICAL PRISONERS, DEPORTS THEM TO FRG

[Text] Hamburg--The GDR last Wednesday released 30 political prisoners ahead of schedule and deported them to the Federal Republic. According to a report in the Berlin paper DER TAGESSPIEGEL this weekend, they have arrived at the Giessen emergency reception camp. Those released are said to be mainly young prisoners from Karl-Marx-Stadt Prison, reports the paper, citing Bonn sources. The Federal Ministry for Intra-German relations told DPA today that it intended to neither confirm nor deny reports to this effect.

INDIA, PAKISTAN, BANGLADESH REASSURED ON AFGHANISTAN MOVES

LD201035 Paris LE FIGARO in French 18 Mar 80 p 5 LD

[Henri de Kergorlay report: "Indian Subcontinent Comes to Paris"]

[Text] France has recently assured the three foreign ministers of India, Pakistan and Bangladesh that it will continue to press the Soviet Union to withdraw its forces from Afghanistan.

This is essentially what Jean Francois-Poncet stated during recent talks with his Indian, Pakistani and Bangladeshi colleagues. Chance timing meant that all three arrived in Paris at the end of last week. Shamsul Haq (Bangladesh) was received at the Quai d'Orsay yesterday morning after his colleagues Aga Shahi (Pakistan) and Narasimha Rao (India) had spent several hours there over the weekend.

The French foreign minister explained to his three interlocutors the European Community's proposal for a neutral Afghanistan which would thus be kept out of superpower rivalry.

Faced with the threat which has been hanging over the region since Moscow's military intervention, India, Pakistan and Bangladesh seemed somewhat disarrayed. India is concerned by the size of the Soviet involvement and the extent of the occupation. Kremlin representatives had stressed that the Russian divisions would settle for insuring security within the country without taking a direct part in the fighting.

Pakistan's Caution

The nature of this intervention has been altered by the fact that troops have been used against the rebels and have already left 3,000 dead. In such a situation India believes more than ever that its best role is to play the nonalined card.

For their part the Pakistani leaders feel particularly vulnerable. Right now, resorting to the United States seems more dangerous than useful to them. They consider Washington's offer of $400 million in aid inappropriate. It threatens to arouse Soviet reprisals without, at the same time, creating an effective defense.

And nothing in Carter's remarks leads one to suppose that the Americans are prepared for even greater involvement regarding Pakistan. Under these conditions Islamabad has decided to treat offers of U.S. aid with the greatest caution. Chinese support would seem even more risky.

So France's moral support and its commitment to contribute all it can to the reestablishment of security in the region is a comfort, however slight.

GOVERNMENT OPPOSES UK'S EEC BUDGET STAND

LD191402 Paris Domestic Service in French 1300 GMT 19 Mar 80 LD

[Summary] At 1300 we were unable to make contact with (Dominique Souchier) who is at the Elysee to report on the Council of Ministers session for us. With some delay, here is what (Dominique Souchier) reported on the numerous dossiers examined this morning. Notably on what was said 12 days before the thorny, to say the least, Brussels summit.

[Begin (Souchier) recording] "I shall sum up the communique which has just been published.

1. The French Government reaffirms the importance which it attaches to Community solidarity. In other words, for the French Government the Community should not mean mercenary accounting [comptes d'epicier]. Each country should not calculate what it receives in relation to what it gives. From this point of view, this therefore represents a no to the British demand for a just return. Moreover, the government notes that if this principle of a just return were to be adopted, it could not be adopted for only one country.

2. The government reaffirms its attachment to the basis of the Common Agricultural Policy and adds that it should be imposed on all, including Great Britain.

But, and this is the third point, the French Government is not completely closing the door on negotiations since it accepts that the problem of surpluses [excedents] should be studied--which is a step in Great Britain's direction. It also states that it is prepared, and I quote, to examine the demands presented by countries which might find themselves in exceptional difficulties as a result of their financial contributions. I have just quoted word for word from the communique which (?laid down) a certain number of conditions. The government is saying no to calling the Community's foundations into question, but onthe other hand is saying yes to negotiations with Great Britain. [end recording]

Among other decisions taken by the Council of Ministers was one stating that there would be no official commemoration of the anniversary of the 19 March 1962 agreements in Algeria.

NC191541 Paris AFP in English 1537 GMT 19 Mar 80 NC

[Text] Paris, March 19, (AFP)--France is prepared to examine Britain's requests over its difficulties in making contributions to the European Economic Community but stands firmly by the common agricultural policy, the French cabinet indicated here today.

A statement after the cabinet meeting said: "In conformity with the principle of solidarity in the community, France is prepared to examine requests made by countries experiencing exceptional difficulties arising out of their financial contribution."

However, the statement said, France remained committed to the principle that the Community should be funded by its own resources and by the "indivisible" nature of the basis of the Common Agricultural Policy. The cabinet said it was ready to "seek ways of working out how producers could take responsibility for surplus products," but noted that family farms should not be penalised to the advantage of large producers, and particularly those who supplied themselves with imported goods."

GENERAL STAFFS LEANING TO MOBILE ICBM OVER CRUISE OPTION

LD191325 Paris LE MONDE in French 16-17 Mar 80 pp 1, 10 LD

[Jacques Isnard article: "The General Staffs Favor a Mobile Nuclear Missile and Neutron Bombs"]

[Text] The May total of 110 operational strategic nuclear warheads with a total capacity of 75 megatons gives France, paradoxically, with Britain, among all the nuclear countries, the greatest number of nuclear weapons in proportion to the number of relatively more vulnerable fixed systems.

When the submarine Le Tonnant--the fifth in the Redoutable series--becomes operational in a few weeks, France will have 8.2 percent of its nuclear load buried in fixed silos in Haute-Province with the remaining weapons (91.8 percent) being mobile either airborne or submerged, on board Mirage 4 bombers or submarines. The United States (with, it is true, 9,200 strategic warheads in all) has a quarter of its nuclear force tied up in ICBM's in fixed silos, and the Soviet Union (with a total of 6,200 missiles) has about three-fourths ofits nuclear force in the form of surface-to-surface missiles in silos.

Foreseeable progress in the detection and accuracy of missiles fired by an enemy which strikes first is now forcing the nuclear powers to use an increasing part of their deterrent for protection against any deliberate aggression. These peacetime preventive measures can be passive, such as strengthening the protection of underground silos and bomber hangars, or active, such as the prior deployment of a retaliatory capacity, an increase in payload to saturate the eventual target, or a greater surface mobility to make launchers less likely to be located.

The French General Staffs have retained the idea of a surface-to-surface missile mounted on a dual-tractor truck in preference to an airborne cruise missile. Studies of the two competing plans have been completed and presented for the head of state's approval, but now the case for the first of the two systems is gaining.

On U.S. recommendation at the end of last year, the European member countries of the Atlantic alliance--except France--accepted with some reservation the principle of the eventual deployment on their territory of surface-fired cruise missiles with nuclear warheads, under exclusive U.S. control. One might have thought that, under the control of tis own industrial process and for its specific military needs independent of NATO, France would benefit from accepting this technological choice in order, in turn, to complete its own arsenal.

In reality, logic makes one think instead that, faced with this potential threat, the Soviet Union will make its priority the improvement of its detection and interception capability adapted to combat a NATO "vehicle." We must thus expect progress which in the future will cast even greater doubt on the cruise missile's reliability and capacity to outwit enemy defenses: Similarly, this subsonic, very low-altitude weapon system will probably become more vulnerable.

Burdensome Solution

Several other financial, military and technical considerations must be added to this first analysis.

First, as the Americans admit, a great number of cruise missiles will have to be fired so as to saturate an enemy more effectively--the United States plans initially building some 4,000 to 5,000--and the French military budget probably would not be able to stand such an imposition. Next, the technicians will have to devote themselves to the design of a very compact, miniaturized missile, as unobtrusive as possible to radar detection, and this will demand major French expenditure on study and research. Similarly, the cruise missile requires an indispensable but costly technological "environment" based on the use of monitoring satellites with a high level of discrimination for cartographic recognition of the terrain covered, and on guidance satellites for rescheduling the "vehicle" on its programmed trajectory toward the target.

This leaves aside the fact that to launch such a missile would need an armored [as published] plane suitably equipped with ECM [Electronic Countermeasures] devices (and not an excessively slow transporter) and that, in this event, the Mirage 4000 would offer an undoubtedly suitable but certainly cumbersome solution. [paragraph continues]

Finally, by virtue of its subsonic speed, the flying time of a cruise missile--in the region of 3 and 1/2 hours between France and the Soviet Union, to take this example alone--is incompatible with the French doctrine of supposedly massive and immediate nuclear retaliation. It even poses a problem in coordinating its use with the other, supersonic deterrents like the Provence and submarine missiles.

The "Danone Plan"

For the French General Staffs, all these accumulated handicaps or inconveniences work in favor of the mobile or, more precisely, semimobile surface-to-surface ballistic missile. When the manufacturers concerned mention the military's choice, they speak humorously among themselves of the "Danone plan," after the firm which delivers its yogurts by tractor-trailer. The mobile missile, designated SX, will be mounted on a similar juggernaut. This does not mean that it will be permanently isolated as it treks along the highways of France. Nor will the heavier and clumsier Soviet SS-20, either. One can imagine a hybrid solution: Stockpiled at bases where it will be guarded, monitored and kept in a preoperational state in satisfactory logistical conditions, the SX will move out in periods of increased tension and will reach its firing points determined and arranged in times of crisis--as is already the case with the submarines, which approach their launch zone at the last moment.

Rotating Head

Working from the experience gained in perfecting the M-4, missile, with six nuclear warheads, intended for the sixth submarine, the Inflexible, in 1985, the technical experts are currently about to offer an SX with the same range (about 4,000 km), designed to be as light and as small as possible.

Specifically on account of the constraints of bulk imposed by wheeled transport, the General Staffs suggested that the SX be equipped with a single, so-called "Revolving" nuclear warhead, that is, one capable of independent movement at the end of its journey and thus able to escape a surface-to-air defense attacking it during the last stage of its flight. Atomic Energy Commission engineers have recently said, however, that bearing in mind their recent experiments in Polynesia on the minaturization of nuclear loads they believed that they could offer an SX with three warheads "maneuverable" in the final stage of flight.

This "revolving" warhead technique will be applied, moreover, in the new M-5 missile designed for submarines, which remain the basis of the French deterrent.

Thus, before the end of the century, the SX would complete a sea-going strategic force comprising a new class of submarines, both quieter and capable of diving to greater depths. The range of the M-5 missile would be increased to enable the vessel to patrol in waters both closer to France and, thus, better protected.

After the Pluton, the Hades

Officially the number of these new submarines has not been specified. But in all the great navies there is a quite close and constant correlation between the composition of the strategic, sea-going force and the remainder of the fleet, a correlation based on the tonnage of conventional support forces, the submarine manpower which cannot be needlessly increased without unbalancing the navy's overall personnel, the necessary infrastructure (bases, shipyards, communications and training centers), the productive capacity of the nuclear industry and the financial state of the country concerned.

In these circumstances it seems difficult for France to increase its submarine force beyond six by the year 2000, especially if each one is equipped to fire up to 96 different nuclear warheads against a possible enemy--as will be the case with the Inflexible after 1985.

Alongside this attempt to bring its strategic forces up to scratch, France will have to undertake the modernization of its tactical nuclear arsenal.

It is well known now that there is a successor to the land force's Pluton missile. Named Hades, in keeping with the French tradition which entrusts tactical nuclear firepower to an underworld god, the new missile will apparently have an increased range--about 200-250 km--compared with the Pluton (120 km at maximum, like the U.S. Lance missile). Thus the land forces will have a surface-to-surface missile mounted on wheels (and no longer on tracks): Its protection or rear dispersal area will be better safeguarded and it will be able to strike throughout the width and depth of the theater of operations, even against what the military calls the enemy's "second echelon," its reinforcement and support divisions, as well as the army's combat headquarters.

Like the SX, this super-Pluton will be set up on a wheel-driven, dual-tractor vehicle suited to all roads, on the model of tactical trucks.

Timely Effects

But within the tactical nuclear arsenal, the General Staffs' primary attention is focused on the neutron bomb, known for some 15 years for its enhanced radiation effect, achieved through a pure fission weapon which gives out greater heat and blast. Tests have been taking place in the United States since 1963, and the Atomic Energy Commission states that it is ready to design the "militarized" version of this device before 1985 if it is so instructed this year.

The technical experts emphasize that they will be able to build neutron bombs which, on the basis of a 1-kiloton yield, will have the same military effect as a 10-kiloton pure fission bomb, the same--more or less--as one of the Pluton-type missiles, or the Mirage or Jaguar planes currently in service with the French Armed Forces.

For their part, the General Staffs put forward the theory that, by its important related effects of heat and blast, the 1980 tactical weapon produces such destruction on the ground that its likely uses in an increasingly urbanized Europe are limited and probably nil when in contact with its own forces or those of its allies. The prevailing notion is thus to have a weapon which insures the most significant and timely military effect within the strategic and political context of the moment.

Risk of Deviation

If one is to believe French General Staff observers, the neutron bomb is to be used near its own forces or in the vicinity of friendly urban areas where the enemy is thickest on the ground, concentrating his forces for action and, thus, in a combat zone where the command can gather the most valuable military information. By throwing the enemy into confusion, as he cannot protect himself by going underground since--given that hostilities have started--he is forced to operate on the surface, the neutron bomb does not prevent exploitation of this advantage, since the counteroffensive can be conducted on a terrain which has not been reduced to a total shambles during combat.

It is now down to the political authorities and, in the final analysis, to the head of state to settle matters on the neutron bomb, which will not be a complete replacement for the present tactical nuclear arsenal. The General Staffs' wish is not, in fact, to have merely a range of neutron weapons at their disposal but to include among the stockpiles intended for missiles and tactical aircraft some payloads of this configuration for specific needs.

A development specifically banned in France, for reasons relating to the political control of eventual usage, is the idea of neutron weapons so miniaturized that they could be used as grenades, for example, as certain countries have envisaged.

The debate is essentially political. There is the risk of a slow and imperceptible deviation in the French deterrent doctrine, as soon as the neutron bomb accustoms people to the prospect of a battle of tactical exchanges--concepts which would no longer be related to the present theory of massive and immediate nuclear retaliation.

PCI STUDY DELEGATION TO VISIT UNDER INTERPARTY AGREEMENT

[Unattributed report: "A PCI Delegation in France"]

[Text] The PCF is receiving a PCI delegation this week as part of the arrangement for continuing exchanges between the two parties. The PCI delegation comprises Central Committee members Giovanni Berlinguer and Sergio Scarpa, Deputy Orlando Fabbri, Senator Bellinzona, Piedmont Regional Secretary [responsable] Renzo Ciaiolo and Sicilian Regional Secretary Luciano Lucenti. Our comrades are coming to make on-the-spot observations of the conditions of the PCF struggle in the health and environment fields. They will meet a PCF delegation led by Politburo member Mireille Bertrand and Central Committee members Andre Lefrere and David Wizenberg.

NEW AMBASSADORS APPOINTED TO EIRE, OMAN, SAO TOME

[Unattributed report on appointment of new French ambassadors: "Mr Philippe Rebeyrol to Athens, Mr Pierre Morizot to Oman"]

[Excerpts] The 15 March JOURNAL OFFICIEL publishes the appointment of Mr Philippe Rebeyrol as ambassador to Athens in place of Mr Jacques de Folin who has recently been named ambassador to Dublin.

The same JOURNAL OFFICIEL publishes the appointment of Mr Pierre Morizot as ambassador to the Sultanate of Oman in place of Mr Robert Oddos.

Finally, JOURNAL OFFICIEL publishes the appointment of Mr Jacques Posier as ambassador to Sao Tome and Principe in place of Mr Maurice Delauney. At the same time, Mr Posier will remain ambassador to Luanda (Angola) where he will continue to reside.

COSSIGA GOVERNMENT RESIGNS AFTER PARLIAMENTARY DEBATE

LD192152 Rome Domestic Service in Italian 2130 GMT 19 Mar 80 LD

[Text] The Cossiga government has resigned. The decision was taken in the course of a Cabinet meeting following a debate in the Chamber of Deputies on a government statement. Subsequently, Cossiga went to the Quirinale to inform the head of state of his decision.

The debate in the Chamber, in which some of the party leaders took part, did not contain any novelty as to the prospects for the formation of a new government.

Tomorrow, the president of the republic will begin the customary consultations and at the same time the parties will make clear their respective positions at meetings of the leading bodies, some which have already been convened. The Christian Democrat Directorate will meet tomorrow morning and the Socialist Party Central Committee in the afternoon.

Government Reviewed

AU200825 Rome ANSA in English 0800 GMT 20 Mar 80 AU

[Text] Rome, March 20 (ANSA)--Italy's Government crisis was formally opened with the resignation last night of the three-way administration of Christian Democrats, Social Democrats and Liberals led by Francesco Cossiga. The move came after both the Socialist and Republican Parties made it clear that they would no longer provide outside support to Cossiga's minority government.

After a brief Cabinet session, Cossiga went to the Quirinale Palace to submit his resignation to head of state Sandro Pertini.

The Cossiga government had been at the helm of the nation since August 1979 after a political crisis that lasted 126 days. It received a vote of confidence from the Parliament thanks to the abstention of the Socialists and the Republicans. The Communists had voted against. However, some weeks ago, the Socialist Party announced that it would withdraw its external support for the ruling three-way alliance.

The outgoing government is the 38th since the end of the Second World War. It lasted only seven and a half months. Nevertheless, the Cossiga team managed to pass 375 bills and 53 decrees. It also filled important posts in the state administration and in banks of national interest and reorganized the upper echelons of the military hierarchy.

On the negative side of the ledger was a strike of control tower personnel which was only solved thanks to the direct intervention of the head of state, alleged kickbacks with regard to an important oil deal with Saudi Arabia, the "Italcasse" scandal and the resignation of Minister Franco Evangelisti after his admission that he received political contributions from Rome builder Gaetano Caltagirone who fled the country to escape an arrest warrant.

Another blow to the solidity of the Cossiga government was the lack of support for the national energy plan which ran into stiff opposition from the Radicals and the Socialists on the matter of building nuclear power stations in Italy.

In the battle against terrorism, however, the Cossiga administration did approve measures which bolstered and modernized the forces of law and order in the land.

In any case, the fall of the present government was the outcome of polemics among the various parties, not so much as to the efficiency of the Cabinet, but as to the political formula on which to base a new, broader ruling alliance.

Observers saw the onset of the crisis as dating back to the beginning of January when within the Socialist Party the leftwing faction prevailed, favoring a government of national solidarity which included the Communists.

Around a month ago, the Christian Democrats, which have a relative majority, held their party congress in which signals of an imminent crisis were unmistakable. The outgoing DC Secretary Benigno Zaccagnini and the group led by former Premier Giulio Andreotti found themselves in a minority as the majority of the DC votes in favor of a document which ruled out the possibility of any ruling agreement with the Communists.

In the days that followed the congress, the new DC leadership (Secretary Flaminio Piccoli and President Arnaldo Forlani) sought to prolong the life of the Cossiga government, at least until the end of the spring administrative elections so as to avoid any leap into the dark (that is, a crisis without any immediate prospects of solution).

Finally Socialists and Republicans announced that they would call an end to their "truce" and would withdraw their parliamentary abstention support.

On the eve of the Cabinet's resignation last night, a flurry of consultations between party leaders took place with the Communists rejecting any "confrontation" with DC Secretary Piccoli, and the Republicans and Socialists calling for a clarification before the two houses.

MANNED SPACE OBSERVATION BALLOON PLANNED IF FUNDS AVAILABLE

[Text] Rome, March 19 (ANSA)--Italy will be able to send a manned observation balloon forty kilometers into space within the next two years if the project receives the necessary funds. According to the head of the National Research Council's (CNR) Spacial Activity Service (SAS), Marco Malavasi, the same spacelab that the Italian "Aeritalia" aircrafts corporation built for the European Space Agency might be hooked on to the stratospheric balloon.

The manned observation device would be designed to collect astronomical, physical and biological data from the upper air at "a much lower cost than space devices", Malavasi said.

The balloon would be launched from Sicily's Trapani Milo airbase and its span of observation time would run from twenty hours for transmediterranean flights to five-to-six days for transatlantic flights.

Malavasi explained that the CNR needed to complete its stratospheric balloon launching campaign, dubbed "Odissea '80", but did not have the funds to do so.

The joint Italian, French, Spanish and United States project will require a little less than one and a half million dollars to complete "and much less than half that amount has been granted", Malavasi said, warning that the launches will be cancelled if the funds do not arrive.

PREMIER REGRETS U.S. FAILURE TO CONSULT ALLIES

LD191141 Copenhagen BERLINGSKE TIDENDE in Danish 15 Mar 80 part I p 5 LD

[NORGES TELEGRAMBYRA report: "Anker Jorgensen Directs Criticism at United States"]

[Text] Oslo--"It was unfortunate that the United States reacted to the Soviet Union's invasion of Afghanistan without consulting its European allies," Prime Minister Anker Jorgensen said at the annual meeting of the European Movement in Oslo Thursday evening.

"The American Government ought to have contacted its NATO partners before the decisions to boycott the Summer Olympics in Moscow and to stop the export of grain to the Soviet Union. A prior contact of this sort would have made it easier to reach a common Western attitude," Anker Jorgensen declared.

The prime minister emphasized that the coolness which has entered the world's political climate after the intervention in Afghanistan must not be allowed to hinder East-West detente.

"It is clearly necessary to condemn the Soviet intervention in Afghanistan. We must react, but not overreact," Anker Jorgensen said.

DEFENSE CHIEF URGES INCREASED BUDGET

[Unattributed report: "Danish Defense Capability Stretched by No-Growth Budget"]

[Excerpts] Danish defense policy is now being discussed behind closed doors in Copenhagen by six political parties. Against the background of the Danish Government's plans to avoid a budget increase, General Knud Jorgensen, chief of Danish defense, says that an unaltered budget will lead to serious limitations in defense. It will mean for example a reduction in personnel of just under 5,000 men and reduction in all fighting forces in the three branches of the services of 33 percent." "It is obvious that such defense forces can only carry out their duties to a very limited extent," the defense chief said at a meeting of the Oslo Military Society yesterday evening."

General Jorgensen said that the Norwegian defense chief's contribution to the debate has definitely aroused attention. The Danish defense chief also said that the proposals for the defense structures in the eighties have helped to start a debate on security and defense policies of much greater dimensions than before in Denmark.

"The top chiefs in the defense forces have strongly emphasized both verbally and in writing that the defense budget must increase by at least 3 percent annually in real terms, if the defense forces are to carry out their duties."

"This debate has been accentuated by our political attitude to the modernization of tactical nuclear weapons in December 1979, the reduction in the defense budget for 1980 by 100 million Danish kroner, Denmark's extremely serious economic position, and finally by Afghanistan."

"Remembering that popular support for NATO and the defense forces is as great as ever, I remain optimistic that the discussions that are taking place now will reach a successful conclusion," defense chief Knud Jorgensen said. He added, however, that his optimism is somewhat guarded.

Defense chief Jorgensen expressed concern over the buildup of Soviet forces and over the uncertainty surrounding Soviet intentions for the future use of its newly won and growing power. Continued detente has been endangered, he stated.

DIRECTORS SENTENCED FOR SALE OF ARMS FACTORY TO ISRAEL

LD191155 Copenhagen AKTUELT in Danish 13 Mar 80 p 4 LD

[Lennart Weber report: "Danes Sentenced for Selling Arms Factory to Israelis"]

[Excerpt] Three directors were yesterday sentenced at Frederiksberg Court for illegally selling a Danish arms factory to Israel. Two of them were also sentenced for serious tax evasion.

The sale took place in 1975. The judgment establishes that Vejra's previous owners were fully aware that the sale broke the laws regarding military materiels, particularly the regulations stipulating that foreign citizens may not own shares in or make loans to Danish arms factories.

Those sentenced are 39-year-old Johan Schroder, director of Radiometer and board member of Topsoe, Jensen and Schroder; and 79-year-old civil engineer Jens Christian Jensen. Both were sentenced to 8 months conditional imprisonment.

The sentence was made conditional, partly because of Jensen's age and partly because of the time which has elapsed since the illegal sale.

Finally, Director Poul Borge Bilgart was fined 30,000 Danish kroner [DKr] for his collaboration in the sale.

The other two must both pay fines of 200,000 DKr, and must also repay a total of 223,000 DKr, the amount of their tax evasion. A profit of about 110,000 DKr on the exchange of currency was also confiscated.

In addition the three men sentenced must pay about 200,000 DKr in lawyers' fees.

HELSINKI SEEKS GUARANTEES FOR NONNUCLEAR COUNTRIES

LD191710 Helsinki Domestic Service in Finnish 1530 GMT 19 Mar 80 LD

[Text] Finland demands security guarantees for nonnuclear countries in the event of a nuclear attack or the threat of the use of nuclear weapons. Finnish representatives have handed to the UN Disarmament Committee, meeting in Geneva, a document in which Finland's views on the nuclear proliferation ban are explained. According to the document, the minimum goal must be the most binding possible guarantees that there will be no attack against nonnuclear countries and that they will not be threatened with nuclear weapons. The territory of airspace of nonnuclear countries must not be violated in the launching of such weapons at their targets, the Finnish statement says. In Finland's view the Nuclear Nonproliferation Treaty and the nuclear-free zones together with guarantees form an entity. At its Geneva session the UN Disarmament Committee will aim at an arrangement in which all nuclear weapon states bind themselves not to use nuclear weapons against countries which do not possess such weapons.

NORWAY

AFTENPOSTEN VIEWS SOVIET PRESSURE ON NORWAY

[Editorial: "Soviet Union Puts Pressure on Norway"]

[Text] For a whole month the Soviet mass media have been engaged in an incessant and ruthless propaganda campaign against the Norwegian authorities and official Norwegian foreign policy. The language has been harsher and the propaganda more lengthy than what has been usual up until now in the repeated Soviet attempts to put pressure on Norway. Not only have the Russians accused Norway of following a provocative policy--they have also not flinched from voicing groundless suspicions, by using what Foreign Minister Knut Frydenlund himself has called "false attacks." In this category come the allegations that the United States and Norway intend to stockpile nuclear weapons on Norwegian territory and hints that tactical nuclear weapons will be deployed in the NATO exercise "Anorak Express," which is taking place in northern Norway.

Since Frydenlund made a strongly worded reply to these attacks in the press to a group of leading Soviet press representatives in Oslo 2 weeks ago, we must see the continued salvos in the Soviet mass media as a demonstrative performance for the benefit of our foreign minister. And we must be clear that without exception the newspapers, radio, TV and press agencies in Moscow, and the Soviet authorities themselves are the first to point out, act as official mouthpieces for the party and government. Therefore, the campaign has been "willed" by the top men in the Kremlin.

The campaign's intent is not difficult to grasp: The Kremlin hopes to put such pressure on Norway that we will abandon the idea of advance stockpiling of any allied military materiel in Norway. This is materiel which will make it easier for us to receive support from outside in a crisis and will also make it possible in such a situation to wait a little longer before calling in reinforcements, because some of the necessary equipment will already be in place. This last point can have a moderating effect if a crisis is brewing.

Support from our allies has always been a central part of Norwegian defense planning. But what has happened in recent years is that the Soviet Union, unlike Norway, has expanded its navy in the north so much that we no longer can be guaranteed help from our allies by sea. Therefore, we must have heavier equipment stored within the country, so that the necessary personnel reinforcements can arrive quickly by aircraft.

In the past Norway has resisted similar Soviet press attempts, and we do not doubt that the authorities, with massive support from public opinion, will resist on this occasion too. To make this attitude completely clear to the Russians and to show that we will not give in to pressure on vital security issues, the Norwegian authorities in cooperation with our allies must produce clear and specific plans for the advance stockpiling of military materiels. Protracted and perhaps interminable discussions within the alliance can create an impression that the Russians, despite everything can manage to slow down decisions in the West.

The Kremlin's attempts to put pressure on Norway have now taken such clear shape and reached such a pitch that it is imperative for the Norwegian and allied authorities to do something specific about advance stockpiling. We do not doubt that the will to do this already exists, and we ought to show that we do not lack the capability.

DEFENSE MINISTER ADDRESSES CONSCRIPTS CONFERENCE

["Correspondent" report: "Conscripts' Conference: Kronmark Questions Union"]

[Excerpts] Orebro, 12 March--If the planned conscripts union is formed and fails, the country's conscripts can be sure that the Conscript Conference will start again.

This was the promise made by Defense Minister Erik Kronmark when he visited the Conscripts Conference in Orebro on Wednesday. He thinks that there must be channels between the soldiers and the Riksdag.

However, he questions the idea of a trade union, for two main reasons. First, a union organization must have methods for achieving their aims, and conscripts can never do this since they are bound by law to obey their superiors, and second, because the planned union would receive its funds from the National Youth Council.

However, the defense minister is prepared to work for increased influence for the conscripts. Full-time soldiers can always negotiate through the Industrial Codetermination Act, but today's conscripts have nothing to support them.

The defense minister was called "the greatest threat to the defense of Sweden" at the opening of the conference by the conscripts' chairman, Jan Spangberg.

"I simply refuse to reply to such outbursts. Someone planning to form a union ought to be mature enough to express himself in some other way."

The debate on the formation of a union was extremely heated on Wednesday. The committee appointed to look into the matter had already come to a decision: A union should not be formed: The committee's decision, which flies in the face of several previous conferences, caused a sensation. The final decision will most probably be, however, that the conscripts' union should be formed.

MRS THATCHER VIEWS TERM IN OFFICE, EEC ISSUES

DW191148 Bonn DIE WELT in German 19 Mar 80 pp 1, 9 DW

[Interview by Rainer Barzel, DIE WELT columnist and former FRG opposition leader, with British Prime Minister Margaret Thatcher in the series "Politicians Ask Politicians": "Thatcher: The One Who Threatens Germany Also Threatens Us. England Does Not Want an EC Crisis", date, place of interview not given]

[Text] WELT: Ten months ago you won the elections for the House of Commons. What do you think was the reason for your success?

Thatcher: We said what we believe most clearly. We made the voter see a clear difference between us and the socialists. In doing this we offered the people, who were prepared for a political change, a clear alternative. Our country had made a great step toward socialism, farther than you in the Federal Republic.

WELT: What is more difficult, becoming a prime minister, or being one?

Thatcher: I do not know, it was not easy to become prime minister. It is not merely a matter of being prime minister. One must do those things one was elected to. One must accept short-term and painful problems if one wants to achieve the right thing in the long run.

WELT: What is your conviction, the philosophy which you act on?

Thatcher: It is our philosophy that individual people are first of all responsible for their own action, that they have the duty to take care of themselves and their families. The government merely has the money of others, it ought to take action only in exceptions, in case of want, illness and unemployment, for example. If one expects help from the state, one expects this help from one's neighbors. George Bernhard Shaw, who was a socialist, once said: "Freedom entails responsibility, and therefore many people are afraid of it." Many expect help from the state, money as well. The state only has the money of one's neighbor, of others; therefore the state cannot always help and if at all then only temporarily, with subsidies. One cannot have freedom without using it in a responsible way.

WELT: You have been ruling for 10 months now. What do you consider your greatest success in this period? Have you been especially disappointed by something? What is your main problem? How do you want to solve it?

Thatcher: Most problems are manmade. Therefore, man's basic approach and stance are important. This approach is undergoing a change at present. We trust that in 2 or 3 years we will be out of the woods. The change in the spiritual approach of the people may not look like a great political success, but it is one. The most difficult thing in politics is to change the approach.

For the first time since World War II four liberties exist together: namely, the liberty from price controls, from wage controls, from interest controls and foreign currency controls. Enterprises can undertake things they could not do for a long time; and wages must be freely negotiated now. Basic approaches change, despite the steel strike. In a number of cases the workers refused to strike. These are changes in approach which are of a basic character.

Fewer firms are now coming forward with requests for subsidies. Basically additional money can only be achieved via increased productivity. The enormous change in the basic approach consists of the fact that the people are again prepared to accept responsibility, which some of them had almost forgotten.

We have cut taxes, so that people will again be prepared to make investments here and also to leave their money here. I am very much concerned about promoting prosperity, such as building owner-occupied houses. In this country one-third of the apartments are community-owned and this one-third is heavily subsidized. I want these tenants to buy the apartments--at a price that should be about 50 percent under the market value. I hope in this way to promote the creation of individual property through these houses, through lower taxes....

Inflation is high, unfortunately, interest rates therefore must also be high, probably for 2 more years. That makes it more difficult to take credits, and we curtain state expenditures ourselves so as not to be forced to take new credits. That is a difficult long-term task. We must lower inflation and public expenditures and encourage the people to take over more responsibility. In the long term a change of approach and the creation of incentives are most important.

WELT: Great Britain is a member of the European Community. You stress that you want to play an active and positive role there. What does this consist of?

Thatcher: We believe that the European Community is not merely an economic community. We consider it a merger of the members of free Europe who are learning to live together voluntarily--while the Soviet bloc is being held together by a steel ring. We want to show the world that living in freedom and democracy produces more human rights and welfare and that it is better to live together--to learn to do it without covering up the differences of opinion. Freedom and a constitutional state are the best way of life; that is, and I stress it explicitly, my passionate belief.

We are also a member of the alliance, we contribute fully and completely to the defense and security of Europe. We have stationed 55,000 soldiers in the Federal Republic of Germany. If the Federal Republic of Germany is in danger then we are in danger. If Berlin is in danger, then the rest of the free world is in danger. It is also for this reason that we guarantee the freedom of Berlin. Germany and we are very close to each other. We know that only together--particularly with the United States as a guarantor of freedom--can we fight for the defense of freedom. If something happened to Great Britain, more than a country would be lost, namely a bastion of freedom.

WELT: For what reasons do you criticize Great Britain's financial contribution to the European Community?

Thatcher: Our contribution is not fair. I am trying my best to put Great Britain's economy back on its feet. We will then produce more, but that takes time. At the moment Great Britain holds the seventh position with regard to per capita income of the Nine! That is below average. And yet in 1980 we will bear a higher net contribution than every other nation: DM4.25 billion net. The Federal Republic of Germany contributes a net DM2.6 billion. France's payments to and receipts from are nearly balanced. Thus we are paying more into the Community than we are paying for the Third World--and there we are not stingy indeed. If we were richer, we would pay more. This is our way of life. We simply cannot afford this EC contribution if we simultaneously have to cut expenditures at home, for instance, in housing construction, in the field of education, in the social field.

WELT: What if a Community crisis is thereby risked? And what do you say about the criticism that the Community bill is after all, not a bilateral matter of political economy in which input and output should be balanced?

Thatcher: If there is a crisis, then it will not have been caused by us but by those who expect the biggest contribution from us despite our situation. This is not fair, this is unjust. [paragraph continues]

We cannot go on like this. We are very much in favor of the Community. The Federal Republic of Germany, and also France, have a positive balance of trade with us. Both countries have a great sales market here in industrial respects. But we do not have this sales market for our agriculture, which works well. Our agriculture is operating quite efficiently--just as industries do in your country.

Most of the EC budget is eaten up by agriculture, for example, for the storage of large surpluses. We not only pay excessive prices for what we are eating but also, and beyond that, we make payments for what we do not want to, and cannot, eat. There should be less expenditure for agriculture than for commodities which we really need, for instance, for poorer regions, for the city centers, for Northern Ireland, for the opening of new coal deposits, for the industrial branches which are temporarily down flat.

We will do everything in our power to prevent a crisis from happening. Yet it is necessary to understand that things just cannot go on as they are--that we call on our people to tighten their belt while simultaneously making that large a contribution toward the prosperity of Europe. Let me recall a statement by the Six dating back to November 1970 and made to the United Kingdom: "Should unacceptable situations emerge in the present Community or in an enlarged Community, the survival of the Community would require the organs to find just solutions."

WELT: Are you bringing the British North Sea oil into the Community?

Thatcher: We are not yet autonomous in oil. We do extract qualitatively high-grade oil which we have to sell abroad in large quantitites just to purchase crude oil for our refineries with the proceeds--at world market prices which, hence, directly affect us as well. Our oil is of as high a grade as is that of Algeria, Libya and Nigeria. Fifty percent of our high-grade oil goes to Europe, quite a lot of it to Germany as well.

We are affiliated with both the Community and the International Energy Agency. Should a shortage occur, then a mechanism will be triggered under which we will have to give Europe preference in supplies. As far as the prices are concerned, we have never been price leaders. We follow the world market prices.

WELT: Your government showed a lot of energy and great imagination in your endeavor to solve the Rhodesia problem, and it has managed the widely admired miracle of "elections instead of civil war." How do you see it now? What effects will this have on the neighboring countries there and on Africa in general?

Thatcher: Rhodesia is a mircale which only the British could have worked. What we wanted was for the Rhodesians to exchange "the bullet for the ballot." And the guerrilla fighters were prepared to do that, they negotiated here and approved a constitution. In a country which had not been governed by London for 14 years we installed a governor who did not have any British troops but who prevailed owing to the strength of his personality and owing to the reputation of British fairness. They trust the British. The whole thing was to the advantage and benefit of the free world and for the Western way of life, meaning to trust commonsense in Africa. We were asked to stay for a while longer and to train the troops there. This was an act of trust. All this testifies to what Great Britain is doing for Europe, and also can do in the case of problems which have hitherto been insoluble.

WELT: Great Britain has rights and duties of its own with respect to Germany as a whole, especially for Berlin. What do you think about them, and when will you be visiting Berlin?

Thatcher: The freedom of Berlin is also our freedom. The queen on the occasion of her visit to Berlin renewed the guarantees. Freedom within NATO is indivisible. I shall be happy to visit Berlin.

WELT: Will you come to Berlin?

Thatcher: Yes, I shall come to Berlin.

WELT: The British Rhine Army is stationed in the Federal Republic of Germany. What do you think about its mission?

Thatcher: The Rhine Army is part of NATO and serves deterrence as well as, if necessary, defense. Our soldiers are among the best in NATO.

WELT: What can and will Great Britain, the former mandate power, do for the solution of the Middle East conflict?

Thatcher: We will not achieve anything good unless we manage to do things at the same time: have the Palestinians recognize Israel's right to exist within secure borders and have Israel recognize the right of the Palestinians to decide on their future themselves. This must happen simultaneously. Only in this way will a secure Middle East exist.

WELT: What will Great Britain, Europe, the world presumably look like in the year 2000? Will everything be more socialistic, safer, richer, more peaceful? Will Europe then take delight in its decadence or play a role? Will young men then still be strolling ambitiously and humorously from bus to city, wearing umbrella and bowler hat, with long strides, shoes too big and trousers too short? And what will become of "swinging London"?

Thatcher: Well, this much is sure: Great Britain will never become communist. We are comparably stable politically. This is an outstanding feature on our part. Nobody has been elected to Parliament here as a communist. What we have is a built-in stability. Great Britain will stay true to itself. We are used to being free, and this will remain so.

An important question for the free world will be whether it is prepared to spend enough on its defense, on the deterrence of a potential aggressor; otherwise it will be threatened by danger. Apart from our political stability, we British also have stability due to our own energy supply. Whatever happens in other regions or in the Middle East, we British will always have enough energy to keep our industry going--owing to our aggregate of coal, oil and gas. As far as our way of life is concerned, I hope that our young people will manage to express themselves within the framework of this fundamental stability. We shall, and I want to emphasize this, always be fair and reliable as an ally.

ARAB ENVOYS TALKS WITH UK LEADERS 'FRUITFUL'

LD201011 London ASH-SHARQ AL-AWSAT in Arabic 19 Mar 80 p 1 LD

[Mahir 'Uthman untitled report]

[Excerpts] London--ASH-SHARQ AL-AWSAT--An important meeting has been held in London between a committee of Arab ambassadors to the United Kingdom and a high-level British team led by Prime Minister Margaret Thatcher. The discussions during the meeting centered on the attitude of Britain and the other EEC member-states to the Arab-Israeli conflict and the Palestinian issue.

ASH-SHARQ AL-AWSAT has learned that a working luncheon was held at Chequers last Sunday. The meeting was attended on behalf of the Arab states by dean of Arab ambassadors in London UAE Ambassador Muhammad Mahid al-Tajir, Syrian Ambassador 'Adnan 'Umran, Jordanian Ambassador Ibrahim 'izz ad-Din and Lebanese Ambassador Khalid Makkawi. In addition to the prime minister, the British side included Foreign Secretary Lord Carrington and a number of prominent Foreign Office experts on Middle East affairs.

ASH-SHARQ AL-AWSAT has also learned that the discussions were lengthy and dealt with ways to crystallize the EEC states' attitude to Arab rights and the recognition of the PLO. During the meeting, the Arab ambassadors emphasized the Arab states' insistence on recognition of the PLO as the sole legitimate representative of the Palestinian people and adherence to the resolutions adopted at the Arab summit conferences in relation to supporting the Palestinian people's national rights and the solutions on which the Arabs agree with regard to the Arab-Israeli conflict.

The Arab ambassadors pointed out to the British side that the Middle East conflict can only be solved on the following bases:

1--That the Camp David agreements and what has emanated from them be considered null and void and against peace in the area.

2--That Israel withdraw from all the territories it has occupied by force.

3--That the Palestinian people's right to determine their own future freely and to establish an independent state be recognized.

4--That Arab sovereignty over occupied Jerusalem be restored.

It is understood that the British side explained that Britain intends to cyrstallize and coordinate its attitude with the other EEC states and that it prefers to have its attitude expressed within a collective declaration by the nine European states rather than individually.

ASH-SHARQ AL-AWSAT has learned that the British side emphasized that there was a positive trend in the European move toward peace. The Arab and British sides described their discussions as friendly and fruitful. Arab diplomatic circles in London regard the Chequers meeting as a very important step toward a better understanding of the Arab issue by the European states, particularly Britain.

LORD CARADON PROPOSES SOLUTION TO JERUSALEM ISSUE

JN160932 Amman AR-RA'Y in Arabic 16 Mar 80 pp 1, 16 JN

[By Muhammad Naji 'Amayirah]

[Text] Lord Caradon has called for a lasting solution to the Jerusalem issue. He proposed the partition of Jerusalem into two cities; one Arab and one Israeli, with a border between them. He also proposed the appointment of a resident UN representative in Jerusalem, to guarantee freedom of worship in the holy city for the followers of the three religions: Islam, Christianity and Judaism.

Lord Caradon emphasized that Jerusalem is the key to peace in the Middle East and that there will be no peace in the area unless a just comprehensive solution is reached to the problem of the holy city. Lord Caradon, who was speaking in an exclusive interview with AR-RA'Y, said the question now is how to achieve peace in Jerusalem. This important and persistent question, Lord Caradon added, has long been ignored or avoided because of the difficulty in reaching a solution that satisfies all parties concerned in the holy city.

Lord Caradon was the author of UN Security Council Resolution No 242 following the June war between the Arab states and Israel. He served as the United Kingdom's permanant UN representative in the years 1964-1970.

Referring to the Camp David accords, Lord Caradon said: These accords are finished and are now part of history. They are a separate agreement that will not achieve just and comprehensive peace in the area, especially since it overlooked the central issue in the Middle East problem; namely, the Jerusalem question. There is no mention of Jerusalem in the Camp David accords. Lord Caradon said that Jerusalem was ignored by Egypt and Israel because of the difficulty of reaching a lasting solution to this issue. He added: The search for a such a solution still continues. The world is called upon now, more than ever before, to find a lsting solution to this problem, which can be the basis of lasting and comprehensive peace in the area.

Lord Caradon said that there is no more difficult, complicated, emotional and sensitive an issue than the Jerusalem question and the future of the holy city. He said that any agreement among the parties concerned in the Middle East problem will not succeed or become practical without a lasting radical solution to the Jerusalem problem.

Lord Caradon said that he has been concerned with this area and Jerusalem for more than 50 years; first, during his term of office when Palestine was a British mandate, and during the past decade when he served as his country's permanent UN representative.

Regarding his current visit to Jordan, Lord Caradon said that he arrived in Jordan on Tuesday on a private visit, during which he met with His Majesty Husayn, His Highness Crown Prince Hasan, the prime minister and a number of senior officials. He said that his talks during all of these meetings dealt with latest developments in the Middle East question and the Jerusalem issue, as well as with Israel's settlement practices in the occupied Arab territories. Lord Caradon stressed that he came to Amman to hear the Jordanian officials' viewpoints in view of the importance of Jordan's stand in the current phase. He said: Whatever Jordan says now is important because of the leading role Jordan plays in reaching a just and comprehensive solution to the Middle East problem and the Jerusalem issue.

Lord Caradon added that he will leave for the West Bank tomorrow--that is today--to meet with Palestinian figures. He will also visit occupied Jerusalem and the Palestinian territory occupied in 1948 to meet with Israeli officials and Jewish figures, to discuss the situation in the area and hear their viewpoints on the Middle East question and its latest developments.

Regarding Resolution No 242, which he himself drafted, Lord Caradon said that what is needed now is not an amendment to Resolution No 242 but the drafting of a new resolution, taking into consideration the Palestinian people's right to self-determination and the future of Jerusalem. Lord Caradon said that he is optimistic about developments in the area, especially now that France and some European countries have recognized the Palestinian people's right to determine their own destiny on their national soil. He said that he hopes that there will be a new European initiative to solve the area's problem.

Lord Caradon declined to comment on President Carter's retraction on the last UN Security Council resolution, which condemns Israel's settlement practices and calls for immediate dismantling of the settlements, saying that that was the Americas' own responsibility.

DI.KO. POLITICAL BUREAU REVIEWS NATIONAL DEVELOPMENTS

NC191940 Nicosia Domestic Service in Greek 1730 GMT 19 Mar 80 NC

[Text] In a meeting under the chairmanship of Mr Kiprianou, the president of the republic and of the Democratic Party [DI.KO.], the DI.KO. Political Bureau has reviewed the latest developments in the national issue.

In a statement, DI.KO. has once again affirmed that the lack of progress on resuming the intercommunal talks is due exclusively to the Turkish side because it sets down unacceptable terms in advance and thus causes insurmountable difficulties for the UN secretary general's new efforts.

The statement also says that the DI.KO. Political Bureau unanimously endorses the handling of the national issue by the president and the government--a handling which the statement says guarantees that the Cypriot people will not be betrayed and whose goal is to find a solution to the Cyprus problem within the UN resolutions.

The statement adds: DI.KO. will continue its resolute struggle under President Kiprianou's leadership to frustrate the satanic plans of Cyprus' enemies and to find a just solution to the Cyprus problem, which will secure the unity of the state and people for a better future for all Cypriots. The DI.KO. Political Bureau concluded the discussions begun in previous meetings on further organizing and strengthening the party and made relevant decisions.

Finally the statement says that the reasons that brought about the establishment of DI.KO. in 1976 not only continue to exist today, but also after the unexpected death of Ethnarch Makarios and Kiprianou's assumption of the presidency, DI.KO's role as an independent entity in the state's political arena is even more serious and constitutes a duty to strengthen the state to the highest degree.

AKEL URGES FORMATION OF 'TRULY STRONG' GOVERNMENT

NC200930 Nicosia CYPRUS MAIL in English 20 Mar p 1 NC

[Text] The leader of the communist AKEL party, Mr Ezekias Papaioannou, in a speech at a party gathering in Limassol yesterday made his strongest call ever for a "representative government". Cyprus, he said, needs a truly strong and representative government which will undertake to settle the Cyprus problem on the basis of the Makarios line and the decisions of the National Council in February 1977.

Mr Papaioannou, in a widely embracing speech, referred to the [Democratic] Rally Party call for the resignation of the government and for the announcement that it was going to set up a "shadow cabinet" and said: "It is not an extreme right government and a government of coupists that Cyprus requires but a truly strong democratic and representative government."

Mr Papaioannou urged the government to go to the talks fully prepared to present its detailed views about a biregional federation.

He outlined the essence of a biregional federation as opposed to a confederation: A confederation is two separate states. A federation comprises a Greek Cypriot and a Turkish Cypriot administration but there shall be one government with Greek and Turkish ministers, with one parliament comprising both Greek and Turkish members in a proportion to be agreed.

Moreover, in a federation the principles of freedom of movement, settlement and ownership are safeguarded, refugees shall be able to return voluntarily to their homes under conditions of safety and the fate of the missing shall be ascertained. Turkish troops and all other foreign troops shall be withdrawn.

Mr Papaioannou called for the purge of the main culprits in the coup, the ministers in the Sampson government, and the rounding up of all illegal arms.

KLIRIDHIS REITERATES CALL FOR GOVERNMENT RESIGNATION

NC161848 Nicosia Domestic Service in Greek 1730 GMT 16 Mar 80 NC

[Text] The youth organization of the Democratic Rally Party held its second pan-Cyprian congress in Nicosia today. Addressing the congress, party leader Kliridhis called again on the government to resign so that an end is put to retrogression in all walks of Cypriot life, as he put it. He also called again for the dissolution of the House of Representatives.

Referring to relations with the Turkish Cypriots, Mr Kliridhis said that cooperation with the average Turkish Cypriot and the restoration of traditional friendly relations are elements of Greek virtue.

O AGON SCORES GOVERNMENT'S REJECTION OF U.S. PROPOSAL

NC141142 Nicosia O AGON in Greek 14 Mar 80 p 1 NC

""My Opinion" column by 'The Observer': "Why Not? Camp David Under Conditions"]

[Text] We believe that hasty rejections, "on the same day" of suggestions made by third parties for a Cyprus solution--without carefully studying them or giving documented replies or logical counterproposals--cause unimaginable harm to our issue.

First of all, in the eyes of the foreign governments and international public opinion this shows us as intransigent and not wanting a solution to the problem, since with particular ease, we always hasten to reject every suggestion submitted to us. Secondly, we relieve the Turkish side of the responsibility of being the first to reject the proposal.

The latest example of our incomprehensible tactics is our stand taken toward the U.S. Congress' suggestion for a Camp David-type procedure to resolve the Cyprus problem.

On Tuesday, the congressional study and its suggestions were published in the press and on Wednesday we hastened to reject it. It is completely unknown whether this was preceded by a serious and comprehensive examination by competent officials of the full text of the congressional study.

We do not think that the government should have hastened to reject the congressional suggestion. Not only because the Congress is one of the few foreign institutions--if not the only one--that has supported us and is still supporting us both in practice and forcefully, but also because our arguments for the rejection are very weak.

Congress suggested a procedure similar to that of Camp David for a Cyprus solution. We could have counterproposed: Very well then, we accept a similar procedure but under certain conditions, such as:

1. That any negotiations conducted be based on UN resolutions.

2. That the Turkish occupation troops withdraw from Cyprus so that negotiations are not held under the threat of Turkish guns.

3. That the talks aim at establishing a true and genuine federation and not a confederation such as the Turks demand.

4. The Turks must return the new city of Famagusta before the talks begin.

Thus we would in essence have submitted counterproposals to the congressional proposal and not a sterile "no", as our answer was.

Many would, of course, pose this question: Can the Turks possibly accept our conditions?

This is not our responsibility. This would have been a U.S. responsibility to pressure them into accepting the conditions. Even if the Turks rejected our counterproposals, they would have the ensuing responsibilities. They would be exposed and not the Greek Cypriot side.

Of course, the Cyprus Government's rejection said that the acceptance of Camp David would have removed the Cyprus problem from the UN framework. Aside from the fact that having kept the Cyprus problem within the UN framework for so many years has brought nothing tangible, we must say--without abandoning the United Nations--that we have the duty to use other procedures and try other ways to succeed in promoting our problem toward a just solution.

Let us not forget, among other things, that the Rhodesian issue was within the UN framework for many years and it was not resolved. Finally it was resolved--and indeed the best and most just solution--in a procedure outside the United Nations.

Consequently, we must not be too stiff and dogmatic in our policy. Otherwise we will pay very dearly for this dogmatic policy. It is time that we acquire more daring and determination.

ISTANBUL PAPER URGES RESUMPTION OF TALKS

NC191025 Istanbul TERCUMAN in Turkish 17 Mar 80 p 4 NC

[Article by Zafer Atay: "Will Something Be Achieved in Cyprus?"]

[Excerpts] The Greek Cypriot administration has announced its acceptance of UN Secretary General Kurt Waldheim's proposal for the resumption of the intercommunal talks. But no detailed information is available as yet. Will the Greek Cypriots come to the conference table with preconditions?

The Greek Cypriot administration has said "yes" to the intercommunal negotiations. But we do not think that Kiprianou is inspired by much good will. Kiprianou, who has just come back from a tour in Paris, London and Rome, preached this wherever he went: "Bring pressure to bear on Turkey. This is the right time for such pressure. Ankara is searching for credits. Link these credits with the Cyprus dispute."

Kiprianou is a leader who lacks calibre. Whether we like it or not, Makarios was a leader with international influence. Kiprianou has come to power by mere coincidence. He does not enjoy international sympathy. Grumblings at home have greatly increased. Kiprianou knows quite well that he can continue to stand on his feet only by provoking tension. The Greek Cypriots refrain from quarreling over posts before a settlement is secured. Kiprianou is taking full advantage of this at the moment.

Nor has there been satisfactory response from the Turkish Cypriot side for the resumption of the intercommunal talks. In a statement to the BBC in London, TFSC President Denktas stated that "the Turkish Cypriot side is ready to hold talks within the framework of the principles laid down at the summit talks he had with Makarios and Kiprianou."

To put it briefly, both sides resemble wrestlers, who continuously size up their opponents in the ring and then dash to the ropes as soon as they get a chance.

We do not know anything about the "high policies" drawn up on the Cyprus issue behind the scenes. But reason dictates the need for an early solution, which will insure for the Turkish Cypriots conditions compatible with human dignity, and which will not obstruct their social and economic development. The TFSC must therefore take the initiative, if necessary, and turn Kiprianou into a victim of his own tricks by forcing him to the negotiating table. He must be squeezed into such a tight corner that he will not be able to escape or proclaim to the world that "the Turkish Cypriots are intransigent. What can I do?"

We are worried lest certain circles might respond positively to Kiprianou's suggestions made during his recent visit to the effect that "while giving aid to Turkey, bring up the Cyprus issue and exercise pressure on it."

In the United States, which should take the first step in granting credits to Turkey, the election whirlwind is gathering momentum. Those, whose aim is the White House, will exploit this opportunity to muster votes. Senator Kennedy has already begun saying: "My heart is with the Greek Cypriots."

One of the most interesting sections of the new draft report of the Subcommittee on Europe and the Middle East of the U.S. House of Representatives is devoted to the Cyprus dispute. This report suggests that, if necessary, "Washington should threaten to suspend aid to both Turkey and Greece until the Cyprus dispute has been settled."

Both Ankara and Athens must use all the means at their disposal to persuade the Turkish and Greek Cypriot communities to come to the negotiating table. If the issue continues to be complex, then the two motherlands should take action immediately and resolve this dispute without any further delay.

DENKTAS REJECTS TALKS WITHIN FRAMEWORK OF UN RESOLUTION

[Text] The president of the Turkish Federated State of Cyprus, Rauf Denktas, has reiterated the view that the efforts to resume the Cyprus intercommunal talks within the framework of the recent UN General Assembly resolution will not yield positive results. Denktas has recalled that the Turkish Cypriot side has already informed the entire world and the UN secretary general that it will not sit at the negotiating table within the framework of a program envisaged by this resolution.

Replying to journalists' questions in Lefkosa [Nicosia] today, Denktas noted that the international committee on Cyprus envisaged in the resolution cannot be established without the consent of the Turkish Cypriot community.

Criticizing the fact that the Greek Cypriot administration filed a complaint to the United Nations regarding his statement to the effect that there is an independent federated state--with all its organs--in Cyprus, Denktas said: There is a Turkish Cypriot community living on the island that is as autonomous as the Greek Cypriot administration.

TO VIMA: FURTHER DETAILS OF KARAMANLIS LETTER TO CARTER

[By TO VIMA Washington correspondent Yiannis Roubatis]

[Text] The letter presented to President Carter on behalf of Karamanlis by Ambassador I. Tzounis on 12 October 1979 consists of three typewritten pages and the paragraph published by TO VIMA yesterday is on page two of the message.

This was reported by our correspondent Yiannis Roubatis from Washington (his reportage follows immediately) after a hesitant attempt by the government spokesman in Athens yesterday to deny the contents of the message.

The Government

The government spokesman yesterday made the following statement:

"It is true that on the occasion of Tzounis' presentation of his credentials, the prime minister of the government addressed a letter to U.S. President Carter in which he carried out a general review of relations between the two countries.

"However, press reports about the contents of this letter and particularly on references to the opposition, are not true."

The Opposition

Opposition circles underlined that it is unthinkable that the prime minister of a country should cite the danger from the opposition and that he should ask for assistance from the other side.

Authoritative KKE circles stated:

In his letter to Carter the prime minister of the government, K. Karamanlis, proclaims his devotion to the Atlantic alliance above all else and offers the U.S. President the authority of regulator over the country's internal political affairs. Such an act, which cannot be justified in the name of any expediency, not only fails to extricate the policy for the country's return to NATO from its political deadlocks but is also contrary to the very essence of defending both the country's national independence and its dignity.

The only national reply to the enslaving demands of the United States and of NATO which are also directed against the country's territorial integrity, is in the immediate severance of negotiations with NATO, in total withdrawal from the Atlantic alliance and in eviction of foreign bases.

The Karamanlis "Opportunity"

Washington 18 March. By Yiannis Roubatis--Contrary to the government spokesman's allegations the message which Prime Minister K. Karamanlis sent to President Carter on 12 October 1979 does refer to internal political repercussions which would result from a continuation of the deadlock reached by negotiations for Greece's reintegration into NATO's military structure. The message which consists of three typewritten pages does include a more general review of Greek-U.S. relations and of relations with the alliance in the period following the Turkish invasion of Cyprus and on the effect of these relations upon Greek political developments. In his message to the U.S. President, the Greek prime minister, after referring to the fact that the United States did not react to the Turkish invasion of Cyprus, stresses that the United States has demonstrated that "it is determined to assist Turkey by ignoring Greek rights and the strategic importance of Greece both on a bilateral level as well as within the alliance."

He then stresses that through its actions the U.S. administration "overthrew the Haig-Davos agreement" and that on the question of reintegration it supports "Turkish positions and claims...a fact which neither his own or any other government could accept."

On the second page of the message K. Karamanlis stresses that he personally is not prepared to allow the opposition to glean benefits from Greece's withdrawal from NATO and "the related severance of facilities to the Americans" and he continues by stating "you must realize that if you will not have to deal with me you will have to deal with the opposition whose opinions as repeatedly expressed by Papandreou are well known to you."

It is characteristic that in today's statement the government spokesman limited himself strictly to the Karamanlis message to Carter and he scrupulously avoided any comment on the Theodhoropoulos-McCloskey conversation.

As already reported by TO VIMA at this meeting Theodhoropoulos asked for the U.S. administration's "support" on issues of interest to the Greek Government as well as, naturally, on the question of reintegration.

American sources in Washington confirmed today that the Karamanlis message and the Theodhoropoulos-McCloskey conversation are the conclusion of a process pursued by the Greek Government after submission of the first variation to the "Verona Plan" on 29 May 1979. The same sources stated that General Davos was the first to refer to the necessity of solving the reintegration issue while the current Greek Government is still in authority. This was done during the ceremony when General Rogers took over his duties on 29 June 1979.

According to the same sources during a conversation at that time between General Davos and the chief of U.S. military forces, General Jones, Davos told him, "The United States must not lose the Karamanlis opportunity" and that it ought to proceed to a settlement of both bipartite as well as other issues of interest to the alliance as soon as possible.

Other U.S. diplomatic sources informed TO VIMA that during the meeting which Greek Foreign Minister Rallis had with his U.S. counterpart, Vance, in New York on 27 September 1979, Rallis attempted to speed up the process of reintegration proposing that some other way should be found for continuing negotiations.

Rallis asked the Americans to consider whether it would be possible for Greece to return to NATO without a prior solution of military issues which could be settled after Greece returned to NATO. The U.S. administration refused to discuss this proposal.

PAPANDREOU CALLS FOR RESIGNATION OF KARAMANLIS GOVERNMENT

[Text] In a strong statement yesterday leader of the majority opposition Andreas Papandreou asked for publication of the letter by Prime Minister Karamanlis to President Carter. On its part the government refused to release the letter on the grounds that it is addressed to a foreign head of state. While the chairman of PASOK stressed that since the letter was written by Karamanlis then most certainly he, personally, has the right to release it for publication. Foreign Minister Rallis, in a statement, denied sentences included in the report by our correspondent Yiannis Roubatis.

In yesterday's statement PASOK Chairman Andreas Papandreou said: "The new revelations by TO VIMA are startling. According to these revelations the country's prime minister addressed a letter to the President of the United States in which he called for his help in order to protect the 'facilities' and privileges of the United States in Greece from the Greek opposition.

"We call upon the prime minister to immediately release for publication the text of his letter to Carter. If the information published by TO VIMA is correct then we have a vast political issue which can be solved only through the resignation of the prime minister and his government."

Foreign Minister Rallis replied to Papandreou with the following statement:

"It is obvious that in his effort to cover up the mistake of a newspaper Papandreou lost all measure of sobriety and control over his words. As of yesterday the government spokesman denied the existence of a text as published by TO VIMA and I, personally, only a few hours ago emphatically denied the reports, describing them as spurious.

"For reasons of propriety the government is unable to release for publication a letter which is addressed to the head of a foreign state. If despite all this the chairman of PASOK continues to believe in the existence of this nonexistent text then all he has to do is to ask the newspaper that refers to it to publish it."

In a counterstatement, Papandreou replied:

"It is my duty to protect the country and none other. Since the letter was written by Karamanlis he most certainly has the right to release it for publication.

"It is not only a right, he, in addition, has the duty to clear up the vast national issue that has been created."

Late last night the KKE (Interior) issued a statement also asking for publication of the Karamanlis letter to Carter because "this is dictated by the necessity to clear things up."

Earlier yesterday Rallis made the following statement: "Because, despite yesterday's statement by the government spokesman, there is a continuation of the furor, which ought not to have started, around the letter from the prime minister of the government which was handed to President Carter last October, I emphatically and responsibly state that this letter, which is five pages long and not three pages, not only does not include any of the sentences mentioned in the reports of the newspaper TO VIMA but also that such an interpretation could not even be construed as a result of the letter's general spirit.

"It is obvious that the newspaper which brought the issue to public view fell victim of inaccurate and even spurious information, the purposes of which I cannot fathom.

"In conclusion I want to stress that it is unacceptable to question the sincerity of the government particularly on an issue which is known to another government and which could, at some time, be publicized."

Late last night in a counterreply to Papandreou, Rallis stated:

"I regret that Papandreou does not want to understand that it is wrong of him to insist upon defending those who leak suspicious and spurious information to the Greek press."

I KATHIMERINI COMMENTS ON ROGERS' PLAN, KARAMANLIS LETTER

[Editorial: "It Is Up to Others"]

[Excerpts] Although there is nothing fundamental we could add to what has from time to time been expressed through this column on the relations between Greece and the Atlantic alliance and the developments of the issue, latest developments provide the opportunity for a useful recapitulation and repetition of thoughts and conclusions, the correctness of which has been confirmed, we think by the two documents which were publicized.

The first report has to do with the plan prepared by the chief of NATO forces in Europe, U.S. General Rogers, for Greece's return to NATO and which, as it is well known, was rejected by the Greek Government, in the same way it has rejected plans with a similar content by General Haig, General Rogers' predecessor.

The basic lines of the Rogers plan were known ever since its rejection was announced. The details, however, which were publicized through the printing of the full text, do not lack interest, if for no other reason because at least they demonstrate what the Turkish claims are and what the degree of tolerance by the military command of the Atlantic alliance toward these claims is. We will not repeat these details here because they are already well known. We will only enumerate certain points in order to shed light upon the correctness of Greece's negative position.

We ask: Which country in the world, which has island territories, which is a member of an alliance, would accept operational control of the sea and airspace of this territory by another country, even though an ally, or by a joint "allied" task force, at a time when such a territory borders on a country that, although a member of the same alliance, has raised claims and demands on this very same territory in question, and particularly at a time when such claims are not emphatically rejected by the alliance itself?

We believe that this question exhausts the issue and that it is not necessary to proceed with the presentation or discussion of other points. What is of interest now are the reasons for the positions of the Atlantic alliance and their consequences.

As we stressed three weeks ago through this same column the Atlantic alliance is not yet ready for sweeping aside these Turkish claims and adopting settlements that would permit Greece's return to the military wing under conditions acceptable to our country even though these claims are not aimed at promoting the proven defensive goals of the alliance but the unrelated (and even contrary) expansionist and hegemonistic goals of Turkey at the expense of Greek territory. Turkey on its own part, without a direct and emphatic demand by the alliance (and particularly by the power that dominates the alliance) would have no reason (and it would also be improbable) to cancel the demands, which are an organic part of a fundamental and permanent 'national' Turkish policy--at least not during the current phase of affairs.

Instead of making such a demand upon Turkey the alliance insists on demanding that Greece should accept arrangements that would harm its sovereign rights over its national territory and would be dangerous to its national security--without even the "ameliorating" excuse (by those who make such proposals) that they are promoting the defense organization and effectiveness of the alliance in the area.

These arrangements were, as it was natural, rejected by Greece, which had absolutely no reason to speedily return to the military wing of the alliance--particularly not under conditions which are contrary to its legal and vital interests.

As to the broader consequences of this position by the Atlantic alliance, these were extremely well stressed by Prime Minister K. Karamanlis in his letter to U.S. President Carter, which also was publicized. The Greek prime minister stressed that the unjustified pro-Turkish position of Washington and the alliance have created feelings in Greece that could lead to the political victory of forces, which support a totally different foreign policy. A leading personality of the Greek Foreign Ministry underlined to the U.S. ambassador that "public opinion in Greece, both from the right and from the left, no longer has confidence in the support of the alliance."

From the Greek side things have been presented very lucidly. It is up to others to make a choice. We must admit--since our unbending position on the national issue is well known--that the handling of the issue, as a whole, by the Greek Government was in accordance to the dictates of the national interest as well as to the country's dignity.

AKROPOLIS REPRINTS KARAMANLIS FOREIGN POLICY ARTICLE

AT181700 Athens AKROPOLIS in Greek 18 Mar 80 pp 1, 9 AT

Turkey is responsible for the tension in its relations with Greece and at last it must understand the reality that the Aegean Islands are Greek. This is stressed by Prime Minister K. Karamanlis in an article that is published in the authoritative French "REVIEW OF THE TWO WORLDS" which is printed in Paris.

In the article, the full text of which AKROPOLIS is publishing, Karamanlis also mentions that every hope for the settlement of the Cyprus problem will disappear if Turkey implements its threat to settle Famagusta.

At the same time, in his article the prime minister stresses that the fear of small countries not to support justice so as not to offend the powerful constitutes the worst of policies.

The article, which is published in the "REVIEW OF THE TWO WORLDS" immediately following French President Giscard d'Estaing's article, is entitled, "Our Foreign Policy," and the text follows:

"Currently international life is marked by events which reason is unable to explain. Suffice it to take into consideration that countries with common interests and, more importantly, that belong to the same ideological area, clash and confront one another. Communists attack communists, the nonalined attack the nonalined, whites attack whites, blacks attack blacks. In our era, we are witnessing the bankruptcy of the principles of international law and the bankruptcy of ideologies which are causing the revival of obsolete nationalisms or making concessions to inadmissable interests. Within such dangerous chaos Greece must prudently handle its international relations, avoiding dangers which can threaten 't at any moment.

"After the restoration of democracy in Greece, our foreign policy acquired a dimension that until that moment had been unknown. We maintain and develop friendly relations with all countries of the world. We have strengthened our bonds with the Western countries, especially with those of the European Community. My visits to the Soviet Union and China acquired a special significance thanks to the frank and useful talks which I had with the rulers of those countries. I call the talks frank because during the talks the ideological and international position of the interlocutors was taken into consideration.

The Small Countries

"The fear which leads to not supporting justice in order not to offend the powerful constitutes the worst of policies. In my view, if small countries wish to win the respect of others they must avoid provocations and should be frank and honest. Whether this fear pervades interpersonal relations or public relations, it creates a feeling of slavishness because it deprives us of the right to express and support that which we consider right and just.

"Greece lies in one of the most sensitive areas of the world. This is something which we must not forget when we discuss our foreign policy. Countries whose security is guaranteed by their geographical position can legitimately chart their policy differently. But countries lying at the most sensitive areas of the world, like ours, must define their foreign policy with prudence and determination. In the eastern Mediterranean, in the Middle East and currently in Central Asia peace is no longer known, while the danger of a general conflagration looms on the horizon.

The Energy Crisis

"Disturbances and reactions in these areas of the world are directly or indirectly linked with the energy problem. As we know--since we are enduring the consequences--the energy crisis is leading us to one of the most grave economic crises since 1930. This is so because the international economy and, generally, the modern life of our society depends completely upon oil. A long time ago I foresaw the dangers such a crisis could cause and claimed that in order to avoid them we should coordinate the interests of the producing countries with those of the consuming countries through long-term international agreements which would take into consideration the fact that oil belongs to the former, but at the same time would provide the certainty to the latter that they could demand this product at more or less stable prices.

At present we are not only threatened by the continual and disproportionate increase in oil prices, but also by the fact that the producing countries display no haste to deliver their product.

During my recent visits to leaders of Arab and European nations, I tried to persuade them of the need for an initiative that would facilitate the beginning of a dialog.

I noted that all my interlocutors, even those of the producing countries, recognized the need for a dialog, but despite this, nothing was happening on either side so that this very significant issue could become the object of collective action. Thus complete anarchy reigns at present in the energy sector and if we do not succeed in bringing it under control soon, it will deteriorate with every passing day and elude any collective control.

Neither producers nor consumers, whose only concern is to meet their particular needs, agree among themselves, thus ignoring the dangers which threaten all humanity.

Cyprus' Drama

""In our era Cyprus' drama is a shame. Turkey bears total responsibility for the drama and its prolongation. Successive intercommunal talks have produced no results because Turkey, despite all its promises, did not want or was not able to make its intentions clear. Recently, Turkey has threatened to settle the Famagusta area, something that will make any hope for the settlement of the problem disappear and, furthermore, will constitute a provocation to us and to those who desire an equitable solution of the problem.

"Some months ago, the United Nations proposed the resumption of the intercommunal talks and, in case of failure, provided for the establishment of a special committee to assist the UN secretary general in his mission. I do not know if Turkey will take advantage of the opportunity that is being afforded it to end a drama which is a drama for itself as well...

"Greece is following the development of this tragedy with the greatest care and the greatest pain. It is redundant to stress once more the solidarity which exists between Greece and the Cypriot people. Cooperation between Athens and Nicosia is strong and constant. It will continue unimpeded and without reservation until justice has been dispensed to Cyprus Hellenism.

Differences With Turkey

"Our other differences with Turkey have not been smoothed out at all for the simple reason that despite all our efforts, it has not been possible to find a point of contact and understanding. Turkey should be blamed entirely for this because it has created these problems and is perpetuating them. Greece's position is clear and lucid. It is also reasonable. If Turkey wants to manifest understanding, the solution of the problems will be greatly facilitated.

"Turkey claims that Greece has transformed or intends to transform the Aegean into a Greek lake. I am forced to reiterate my previous statements in order to dispel any misunderstanding. Greece does not consider the Aegean a Greek lake. Greece recognizes that there is an international zone in the Aegean and that Turkey rightfully has its own territorial waters. Greece never disputed Turkey's rights as a maritime country.

"However, we ask Turkey to understand that the Aegean is interspersed with islands which are Greek and which have their own rights according to international law. The moment Turkey recognizes this truth the settlement of our differences will become easy."

ISTANBUL PAPER REPORTS ON ORGANIZATION WITH EXPANSIONIST AIMS

NC200920 Istanbul GUNAYDIN in Turkish 18 Mar 80 pp 1, 4 NC

[Report by Uran Baran from Athens under the heading: "A New Audacious Act by the Greeks"]

[Text] A map posted to all foreign newspapers and press institutions by a Greek organization, which has not disclosed its identity, has caused serious repercussions in diplomatic circles.

The Greek authorities have not yet commented on this Greek organization, which proclaims that Istanbul and Izmir are Greek and that these two cities will eventually be conquered.

These words appear below a map which shows western Turkey and the whole of the island as belonging to Greece: "Great Greece, the dream of the Greek nation is destined to live and it will live."

Distributing such a map at a time when efforts are being made to upgrade Turkish-Greek talks, and nourishing "great ideas" toward creating "the great Greece", has caused repercussions amid the Turkish diplomatic circles in Athens.

MILLIYET VIEWS U.S., WEST EUROPE MIDEAST POLICY

NC180851 Istanbul MILLIYET in Turkish 16 Mar 80 p 3 NC

[Commentary by Sami Kohen: "New Developments in the Middle East"]

[Excerpts] The latest developments in the Arab-Israeli dispute have led to certain political repercussions and complications which, as usual, transcend the borders of the region. The unstable attitude of the United States toward the UN Security Council resolution, which urges Israel to stop establishing settlements in the West Bank, has led to new arguments and increased tension. President Carter's subsequent opposition to this resolution, on grounds that it had been approved by the U.S. delegate in error, not only bewildered everybody but satisfied neither the Arabs nor the Israelis.

President Carter must have found it advantageous to act like this, particularly now that the presidential election campaign is gaining momentum. But unfortunately, the Arabs, who were greatly pleased with the first positive U.S. attitude, were just as infuriated later over President Carter's retraction. The Israelis were equally irritated when, in spite of all this, President Carter repeated his opposition to the establishment of any settlements on the West Bank. To put it briefly, because of his zigzag policy, President Carter has failed to curry favor with either side. Moreover, his popularity--which had increased after the Afghanistan developments--has now suffered serious setbacks.

There is not the slightest doubt that the United States does not in the least approve of the Begin government's settlement policy, and that it is greatly disturbed about it. As a result of the situation in Afghanistan and Iran, the United States wanted to approach the Arab world and establish firm ties with the countries in the region--only to be faced with the "Palestine issue" once again. Meanwhile, the Arab countries and particularly Saudi Arabia, known for its friendly ties with the United States, persistently demand that the United States urge Begin to alter his attitude toward occupied Arab territory, stressing that there can be no Arab-American cooperation unless the rights of the Palestinians are recognized. However, during the election campaign President Carter is not in a position to take any serious initiative in this respect. West Europe, however, is more relaxed. It can pursue a policy that is different from the official Washington policy. President Giscard d'Estaing's frequent references to the right of the Palestinians to determine their own fate during his recent visit to six Arab countries and--though expressed in rather ambiguous terms--his support of the Palestinian cause are clear indications of the kind of policy West Europe is pursuing. Undoubtedly, this "gesture" has gained a lot for France from the point of view of oil and economic ties. However, it is now understood that France does not intend to make any concrete diplomatic move in favor of the Palestine Liberation Organization.

To put it briefly, it appears that, influenced by the developments in Afghanistan and Iran, the West is gradually assuming a pro-Arab policy in the Middle East. Despite the United States, which has to act more cautiously because of domestic issues, the diplomatic loneliness of Israel is becoming more and more apparent at present. Begin's opponents in Israel openly admit this.

RPP DEPUTY PRAISES LIFTING OF NOTAM

[Text] Ankara, 19 Mar (AA)--RPP Deputy Hasan Esat Isik said that Turkey's lifting of the NOTAM restricting flights over the Aegean was a "major act of goodwill," but feared Greece did not return the sentiment.

Speaking in the National Assembly Tuesday, Isik noted Greece had been telling Turkey to be the first to lift the NOTAM "because it was the first to issue it," but four Turkish governments preceding this one had not dared take such a decision because of the risks involved. "If Greece does not attempt to close off the Aegean airspace on the pretext that the Aegean islands are an archipelago, and if the status of Ercan Airport (in the Turkish Federated State of Cyprus) is settled through negotiations between the Turkish and Greek-Cypriot communities, I will take out my hat to the government," Isik said, but added the situation did not point that way, and in fact, Greece had "raised difficulties" during the ongoing exercises in the Aegean by the Turkish Armed Forces.

ECEVIT VIEWS ELECTIONS, POSSIBLE DIALOG WITH JP

[Text] Ankara, 19 Mar (AA)--RPP leader Bulent Ecevit said he saw no reason why the next president should not be elected from within the parliament. He made the statement during a press conference he held Wednesday, when he said it would be useful to establish a dialog with the Justice Party [JP] before the balloting in the presidential election starts within a few days, but added he did not know Prime Minister Suleyman Demirel's "views on timing."

He deplored the Justice Party's insistence on not condemning violence on the extreme right, commenting, "If Prime Minister Demirel had shown against rightist terrorists half the reaction we have shown against the terrorist left, it would have been much easier to bring peace and tranquility to this country."

With regard to the economic situation, Ecevit predicted prices would rise beyond the purchasing power of the ordinary citizen, and added this was the "reasoning behind the South American model" anyway. "Some day everything from caviar to American cigarettes may be found on the market," he said, "but because of the exorbitant prices, most of the people will not be able to meet their protein needs or buy fertilizer for their farms."

Questions and Answers

Ecevit also answered questions from the floor on various current issues as follows:

[Question] Could you comment on rumors circulating about the interviews your advisor Nejat Erder, and RPP Secretary General Mustafa Ustundag had with Federal German Finance Minister Hans Matthoefer?

[Answer] Ustundag, RPP Deputy Secretary Altan Oymen and advisor Erder did meet Matthoefer during their recent visit to Germany. They expressed their appreciation for Mr Matthoefer's efforts to rally economic aid to Turkey, that was all.

[Question] Undersecretary of the Prime Ministry Turgut Ozal, in a letter to World Bank President Robert McNamara, announced the government's intention to put an end to economic planning going down to the micro-level or guided through administrative controls. Does this mean dropping planned development as expressed in the Constitution?

[Answer] In my view, the government's free market policy, particularly at this time of shortages, basically contradicts planned development despite the Constitution.

[Question] What do you think of the democracy of leaders in Turkey?

[Answer] There is a party democracy and not a democracy of leaders in Turkey, particularly so in the RPP, if you ask me. [as received]

[Question] Will you name a candidate for president if you confer with Demirel?

[Answer] Names can be put forth only after interparty dialog, particularly between the RPP and the Justice Party.

[Question] Would you prefer a civil or military presidential candidate?

[Answer] We are not faced with such a choice. And it would not be right to distinguish between available members of parliament according whether they came for a civil or military career originally. But if you are asking whether the candidate will be from within or outside the parliament, I can see no reason why the next president should not be elected from among members of parliament.

Demirel Reaction

[Text] Following RPP leader Bulent Ecevit, Prime Minister Suleyman Demirel also held a news conference today and replied to journalists' questions about the upcoming presidential election.

[Begin Demirel recording] It is the right of the Turkish Grand National Assembly to elect a president. The presidency is one of the most important duties of the Turkish Republic. Naturally, observations and speculations will be made during the election. At first sight one may not have anything against an approach of "let us discuss the issue now and then elect the president," but there are doubts about what will be discussed and in what direction the issue can be dragged. In other words, unless these points are clarified, it is impossible to start talks just like that on such an important issue.

No one is refusing to talk. The election day is not here yet. Certain opinions have not been voiced yet. The issue is not ripe yet. It would be meaningless, in this siutation, to discuss certain persons. In principle, we are not opposed to the idea of holding this discussion, but we want to know first what is expected from the discussion. In other words, we do not want people to say afterwards: "So they talked, and what happened?" There should not be room for such remarks in such an important issue. Let us talk, but what are we going to talk about and when? I have my doubts and hesitations. [end recording]

FACTORY STRIKES IDLE 15,000 METAL WORKERS

[Text] Maden-Is [Turkish Mine, Metal, Metal Works and Machine Industry Workers Union] affiliated with DISK [Confederation of Revolutionary Worker Unions] has begun strikes in 39 more factories that are MESS [Metal Products Industrialists Union] members. The number of factories where strikes are being staged has thus risen to 53 and the number of workers on strike to 15,000.

Following the disagreement in collective bargaining between Maden-Is and MESS, the union had decided to strike factories where it is authorized [to conclude wage contracts] and had begun strikes in 14 locations. The strikes which have been continuing since 13 March, are being staged at locations in Istanbul, Izmir, Eskisehir, Bursa, Izmit, Kayseri, Tekirdag, Edirne, Diyarbakir and Ankara.

VOTCP CALLS ON WORKERS TO ORGANIZE MASS STRIKES

[Statement by the Turkish Communist Party Central Committee dated 17 March 1980]

[Text] Confronted with a conflicting situation, the Turkish working class has engaged in a decisive struggle of strikes. The wave of strikes is spreading among workers of the metallurgy and textile branches as well as other fields. The working class and our people are struggling against the unbearable loads of the economic crisis, the oppressive laws, fascist attacks, imperialist pressures and against the slavery agreements. The Turkish Communist Party [TCP] calls on all our people to support the just cause of the striking working class. The spreading wave of strikes among hundreds of thousands of workers, providing for action by the toilers, and the heightened solidarity with workers who are using the strike weapon will constitute the fundamental basis for repulsing the the multilateral aggression of the collaborationist and monopolist bourgeoisie against the people.

The TCP warns all forces supporting peace, national independence, democracy and social development in the face of increasing threats. The reactionary political forces insist on their bankrupt policies, which brought us to the present crisis. Turkey is becoming increasingly dependent on NATO and imperialism in the economic, political and military fields. The government is about to sign the new slavery agreement with the United States. This agreement can transform our country into a nuclear cemetery. A handful of monopolies are increasing their hold on the national economy. The Demirel government is trying to destroy the state enterprises or to transform them into a part of the existing monopolies. This unabated escalation of monopolies means unemployment and price hikes for millions of workers and toilers; no fertilizers and hunger for the peasants; destruction for the middle class; and bankruptcy for the medium or small capitalists.

This policy is being conducted through oppression, violence and terrorism. Martial law--which has been in effect for more than 1 year--the oppressive laws being passed, the chauvinistic barbarism against the Kurdish people, the closing down of POLITIKA as well as other progressive organs, mass detentions and the fascist terror incidents which have cost the lives of thousands of citizens were not able to silence our people.

Now the government is getting ready to declare a state of emergency and to establish state security courts spreading the story of the danger of recessionism and communism. Bills to eliminate the right to negotiate labor contracts are on the parliament's agenda. Steps are being taken to legalize manhunts. Generals who support martial law are talking about internal strife and shedding blood. A constitutional amendment is being planned for the eve of the presidential elections, in a bid to further curtail the authority of the parliament by providing more power for one man. Thus, efforts are being made to implant an oppressive paramilitary system in the country. The threat of fascism is increasing. The ultimatum of the generals has failed to open the way to a Justice Party-RPP coalition. Pressures along this line are being exerted through threats of an open military coup.

The ruling classes are using the excuse of fighting terror to carry out their attacks against the people and their liberties. In fact it is the ruling classes that incite and support terrorism, becoming directly involved in terror through fascist commandos. Meanwhile, incidents of terror by leftists--whether incited by the ruling classes or acting on their own--or individuals, who are fascists or pretend to be leftists, only benefit imperialism and reaction.

The recent escalation of terror by individuals--whether they are fascists or are pretending to be leftists--is no coincidence. The government and the militarist clique are willing to use these incidents to cure the continuously spreading wave of strikes. The killing of soldiers [by terrorists] is aimed at inciting the armed forces.

The reactionary, monoplist and Maoist press is engaged in a repulsive and loud campaign to involve the TCP in the murders and acts of the terrorists posing as leftists. This campaign is being accompanied by special courses forcing public employees to read anti-communist leaflets. The objective of this concerted campaign is to intensify (?the attacks) against the TCP and to weaken the democratic and anti-imperialist forces. The TCP has determined that the essence of leftist terror--whether perpetrated by people posing as leftists or others--is counterrevolutionary.

In a bid to eliminate this weapon being used by the CIA and MIT [National Intelligence Agency] the TCP is calling on all workers, toilers, youths and intellectuals, as well as all people who support democracy, peace, independence, socialism and particularly on all the decent revolutionaries who became involved in adventurism: Return to the Leninist, organized, mass front of the working class. Do not be decieved by the dichotomy of passivity or terrorism being imposed on you. Oppose all kinds of oppression and terror through organized, mass resistance.

No bourgeois government, or any other political alternative that is not based on the organized and conscious support of the people, can solve the crisis and save the country. Today, it is imperative to converge all national and democratic forces in one front, to unite all forces that will open the path to liberation and to fight together against imperialism, the collaborationist and monopolist bourgeoisie--the archenemies.

It is now crucial to organize the struggle of the working class, of millions of toilers against efforts by monopolies to eliminate the collective agreements, against unemployment, price hikes, the bilateral slavery agreements, the nuclear arsenals on our soil, the arms race, as well as against the state security courts, the oppressive laws and arrests. The TCP stresses once more the importance of ensuring the unity of action by the widest democratic forces against the increasing pressures by imperialism and NATO and the intensified aggression of the ruling classes.

EVREN PROPOSAL ON SECURITY FORCE SEEN AS 'DEMAGOGY'

TA141123 (Clandestine) Voice of Turkish Communist Party in Turkish to Europe and Turkey 0600 GMT 14 Mar 80 TA

[Unattributed commentary: "Evren Wants the Police Duties and Authorities Law To Be Amended]

[Text] In an airport statement on his return from a fact-finding mission to Britain and Norway, Chief of the General Staff General Evren has called for the police duties and authorities law to be ammended [to allow for private guards]. This amendment, allowing for the more efficient functioning of the security forces, should be enacted as soon as possible, he added. General Evren, who also favors extended rights and authorities for police and gendarme forces as well as the establishment of the state security courts--reminiscent of the Istiklal courts of the past--opposed the stationing of soldiers at the entrances of banks, especially those privately owned.

Dear listeners, this statement by the chief of the General Staff only has the objective of legalizing a paramilitary and oppressive system. What he means in his statements is: If you do not want the armed forces to be eroded through the martial law implementations, then you must bow to the curtailing of your liberties. According to the chief of the General Staff, the armed forces will return to their barracks, but, on the other hand, the martial law duties will be taken over by the security forces whose authority will be expanded in a manner that will permit them to raid any residence, to conduct searches in any place, to detain citizens in the street, and even ban or postpone workers strikes.

Evren also stressed the necessity of establishing extraordinary courts as soon as possible. The establishment of these courts--reminiscent of the Istiklal courts--would only mean permanently extending the present martial law oppression all over the country. Such a step would mean pitiless, oppressive and violent implementations of gallows in the country at large.

Let us take a look at Evren's request for the soldiers not to be posted at the entrances of privately owned banks. It is obvious that soldiers as well as patriotic NCO's and officers are opposed to this task. But is Evren, who declares that he is opposed to the armed forces shouldering the protection of the banks, also opposed to the monopolist capitalists and their banks? Definitely not.

Chief of Staff General Evren is afraid that the following question will be asked by the people who see the soldiers posted in front of the banks. Is Mehmetcik [name symbolizing the Turkish soldier]--defending our national security or safeguarding the capitalists? What has pushed Evren to make his statement is the reaction by the people to this situation. That is why he says the military troops must return to their barracks. Such statements are made in vain.

The armed forces' current role in the state cannot be hidden. Whose state is this state? This state is the state of monopolist forces fed by imperialists, like Demirel, Sabanci, Koc, Eczacibasi [three prominent Turkish businessmen]. Are the monopolists not using this state as an oppressive tool against the people? Are the armed forces not being used as an oppressive tool by these same forces against the workers who are struggling for their rights through strikes, who are defending democracy and liberties and who are resisting for the sake of peace and security?

Evren says that the armed forces should return to their barracks. This is a good wish. However, when the present circumstances are taken into consideration, it becomes clear that the armed forces will continue to be used to preserve the interests of the collaborationists and the monopolists and will continue to be used as an outpost of imperialism.

As Necati Zincirkiran reported in an article in the Istanbul daily GUNAYDIN of 25 February in regard to a question on how he assessed the latest events at home, the chief of the General Staff answered by saying: We are watching, but a new step that we might take will not be similar to the letter we handed [to the president]. Even this threat is proof of the fact that the militarist clique is contemplating a military coup and has already completed the bloody plan providing for this. Taking all this into consideration, Evren's latest statements can only be considered as demagogy.

PAHR DENIES LINK BETWEEN BOGOTA HOSTAGE, PLO RECOGNITION

AU211030 Vienna Domestic Service in German 0600 GMT 21 Mar 80 AU

[Text] Foreign Minister Pahr denied a report of the Israeli daily HA'ARETZ asserting that Chancellor Kreisky has recognized the PLO diplomatically because Austrian Ambassador Selzer had been released by the Bogota embassy occupiers. Pahr pointed out that Austria acknowledged the PLO as the only legitimate representation of the Palestinians as long ago as in October last year before the United Nations in New York.

AU211031 Vienna ARBEITER-ZEITUNG in German 21 Mar 80 p 2 AU

[Excerpt] Vienna (AZ)--In reply to a question Foreign Minister Pahr declared on Thursday [20 March] in parliament that as early as last year Chancellor Kreisky and he himself had officially announced before the United Nations their intention to recognize the PLO. The Austrian Foreign Policy Council dealt with the matter as long ago as in September 1979, he said.

Pahr declared that he had stated in the Foreign Policy Council that Austria, like Switzerland, recognizes only states, but that he had at the same time pointed out that Austria recognized the PLO as representative of the Palestinian people. In so doing, Austria is complying with international law. Through this step, Austria also recognizes the Palestinian's right to a state of their own.

In reply to another question, Pahr declared that no incorrect means were employed in bringing about the release of the Austrian ambassador to Colombia. In view of the special circumstances--the serious illness of the ambassador's wife--the secured release does not constitute a breach of solidarity, either. Austria is continuing to participate in the efforts to bring about the release of the other hostages, he said.

SAUDI ARABIA AGREES TO OIL DELIVERIES

AU200959 Vienna KORNEN-ZEITUNG in German 20 Mar 80 p 3 AU

[Unattributed report: "Saudi Oil Begins To Flow for Austria"]

[Text] Vienna--As early as in the next few weeks Saudi Arabia will begin its oil deliveries to Austria: 35,000 barrels of crude oil per day are to be supplied to the Austrian Oil Administration [OEMV], as was arranged by Chancellor Kreisky during his Middle East trip.

The Saudi oil deliveries will make the OEMV largely independent of expensive crude oil purchases on the Rotterdam spot market. As is known, several oil companies were compelled in the past few months to make up, through purchases in Rotterdam, for contract supplies that were not delivered, among others, from the Soviet Union. The oil companies bought such additional oil quantities only hesitantly, which in February led to gasoline shortages at some filling stations. Through its deliveries (totaling 2.65 million tons annually) Saudi Arabia will become Austria's most important oil supplier.

GENERAL CONSIDERS COUNTRY UNPREPARED FOR NUCLEAR WAR

LD210943 Brussels LE SOIR in French 9-10 Mar 80 pp 1, 4 LD

[Saturnin Gomez report on Gen Robert Close 7 March speech: "Under Politicians' Fire, Close Pursues His Attack Demanding Reinforcements"--place not specified]

It was this widely circulated statement which led to General Close's "dismissal". The government did not disagree with this thesis but it believed that the statement put the political authorities in a difficult position, especially at a time when the heads of the three branches of the armed forces were letting their discontent be known--as a result of budget cuts they were unable to carry out the tasks assigned to them.

Firm, incisive, relaxed and frequently mocking, General Close did not mince his words in describing what he asserts is the country's "state of unpreparedness" for dealing with any external armed aggression. Transcending the strictly military sphere, General Close described at considerable length the "alarming situation" which exists in the civil defense sphere. "How could you expect our frontline men to fight well if the country behind them were being destroyed?"

Therefore, General Close believes that we are faced with some major tasks: the government's physical protection to insure that it can continue to exercise its authority, through the construction of antinuclear shelters, among other things; preparation of evacuation plans; creation of reception areas for refugees; and protection of the country's "sensitive points" (nuclear power stations, communications centers and so forth) which are indispensable to the country's survival in the event of conflict.

He then criticized the laws which determine the prerogatives of the military authorities in wartime. "Wartime, as defined by the 1937 law, starts on the day of mobilization: This is a fiction completely unadapted to the speed with which a conflict could arise in our times. This law is unsuited to the graduated alert system adopted by NATO. It would be advisable to determine different stages of a crisis, ranging from peacetime to wartime, in order to insure that we are not caught off our guard."

During this debate, which was supposed to be apolitical, General Close suggested that possibly there was no political will in Belgium either to make good "shortcomings" in the civil defense sphere and/or to change laws.

NEW FRENCH AMBASSADOR--Mr Roger Vaurs, the new French ambassador to Brussels, has presented his credentials to the king. [Excerpt] [Brussels LE SOIR in French 15 Mar 80 p 3 LD]

TEXT OF SCHMIDT STATE OF NATION MESSAGE

DW200930 Cologne Westdeutscher Rundfunk Network in German 0805 GMT 20 Mar 80 DW

[Report by Chancellor Helmut Schmidt on the state of the nation given to the Bundestag in Bonn--live]

[Text] Mr President, ladies and gentlemen, the situation of our divided nation and the world political development are inseparably interlinked. The preamble to the basic law says that the German people have adopted this basic law imbued with the will to preserve national and state unity and to serve peace in the world as an equal member in a unified Europe. This interconnection between Germany, Europe and world peace has become plain to anyone here once again in the recent Bundestag debates in January and February.

During my visit to the United States I met with full understanding for this idea on the part of President Carter and other interlocutors, an understanding among partners and friends. In public, too, namely in New York before the Foreign Policy Association, I said that I hope it will not be forgotten that my country and my government must always also keep in mind the destiny of our German compatriots on the other side, their desires, their interests, and that in view of our responsibility for the German people as a whole we must not rush ahead or be a spearhead.

Let me recall in this connection two crucial passages of the last government statement of 28 February: first, that no people have a greater interest in balance and detente policy than the German people, who are forced to live in two states, and second, that we are obligated to pursue a policy which will uphold the chance for further enhancing what has been achieved earlier, once the present crisis has been managed. This means that we must make our contribution toward the preservation of peace, we do not want any relapse into cold war. [applause]

In 1970, 10 years ago yesterday, Chancellor Willy Brandt met in Erfurt with the chairman of the Council of Ministers of the German Democratic Republic, Willi Stoph. The brief communique of Erfurt, seven sentences all told, does not itself reveal that with this first talk between the German government chiefs a new phase in the postwar history of our divided country began.

But we here in the Bundestag, we Germans as a whole--be it in the Federal Republic of Germany or in the German Democratic Republic, be it in divided Berlin--recall the day of Erfurt. We recall the anxieties and hopes and the manifold feelings which were associated with the meeting at the time. All of us were deeply moved by the meeting in Erfurt. But all emotion notwithstanding, the federal governments of the social-liberal coalition have tackled this problem soberly.

The 20 points which Willy Brandt formulated 8 weeks later at his second meeting with Stoph in Kassel set a yardstick for the policy of the subsequent years. This is the criterion by which we want to judge what we have achieved to date, and not yardsticks of some utopian ideas such as are aften advanced from among the ranks of the opposition concerning policy on Germany. [applause]

At this point I would like to draw attention to the publication by the federal minister for inter-German relations, which is a thick volume entitled "10 Years of Policy in Germany" and in which, among other important documents, the 20 points of Kassel are reprinted. I suggest that everybody read these 20 points again. Today I am taking these 20 points as the criterion for an interim balance sheet as to the question of what has been achieved and what remains to be done.

Point 1: In the interest of the nation Willy Brandt suggested an agreement which would improve the contacts between the people in the two states and eliminate existing disadvantages. This basic treaty was in fact signed 2 years later after tenacious and difficult negotiations. This ended the isolation of the other German state and of the Germans in the GDR who were cut off as a consequence of this isolation. The preconditions were created for a policy by which the cohesion of the Germans has been newly strengthened. [applause]

In line with Point 2 of the Kassel catalog the Bundestag approved this treaty in July 1973 despite the vehement resistance of the opposition. The political, the parliamentary controversy was followed by the legal dispute. The Federal Constitutional Court on 31 July 1973 ruled that the basic treaty is not at odds with the basic law.

Point 3 of Kassel: At the time Willy Brandt demanded that the relations between the two German states be arranged on the basis of human rights, equal rights, peaceful life together and nondiscrimination. The basic treaty does contain all these elements. Today they form the basis of German-German relations. The basic treaty also contains the avowal of human rights. All of us know that essential basic liberties are lacking in the GDR. There is yet a lot of ground to cover until they are implemented. The efforts of the Federal Government, colleague Jaeger, for human alleviations are steps on this road. [applause] We shall persistently continue these steps and this course. [applause]

In Point 4 of the Kassel catalog the renunciation of force, the peaceful settlement of controversies, the respect for territorial integrity and for the borders were postulated. All this then has been incorporated in the basic treaty, and these principles are the core of our peace policy.

In Point 5 the Federal Government at the time declared itself ready to respect the independence and sovereignty of the other German state, in its internal affairs also. This, too, has been fully incorporated in the basic treaty, and we stick to that.

The same is true for Point 6: that neither of the German states may act on behalf of the other or represent it.

Under Point 7 Willy Brandt declared that never again must war emanate from German soil, and he added Point 8 that both states will refrain from anything that might tend to disturb the peaceful life together of the peoples. This is in keeping with the preamble of our basic law. Both German states have accepted it in that treaty as the maxim of German policy.

In December last year the chairman of the Council of State, Erich Honecker, and myself, independently of each other but in conformity, said in Berlin that never again may war emanate from German soil. [applause]

In Point 9 Brandt stressed our will to support all efforts aimed at disarmament and arms control which would serve the improvement of European security. This principle has been further developed in Article 5 of the basic treaty. In the meantime, both German states in the nonproliferation treaty have renounced the acquisition of nuclear arms. They have signed the seabed treaty. They cooperate actively in the Vienna negotiations on a balanced reduction of armed forces as well as in the United Nations' worldwide disarmament efforts.

In Point 10 it was established at that time that the treaty must be based on the special situation of Germany and of the Germans who live in two states and who yet consider themselves as members of one nation.

Despite the basic differences of opinion with the GDR leadership in this matter, the Federal Government has persistently clung to its conviction, documenting it in a legally binding way in the letters on German unity appended to our treaties.

Point 11 at that time pointed out the continuous rights and responsibilities of the four powers with regard to Berlin and to Germany as a whole. The basic treaty took this into consideration since both sides recognize that the rights reserved to the four powers are not touched by the treaty. Legally and politically that is a statement of greatest significance which makes it clear that the German problem has been kept open, also when the basic treaty was concluded.

Point 12: We suggested respect for the Quadripartite Agreement and the ties between West Berlin and the Federal Republic as well as support for the four powers' efforts aimed at normalization of the situation in and around Berlin. That was preparatory to the later Quadripartite Agreement on Berlin. This four-power agreement later strengthened the viability of Berlin, safeguarded access roads to Berlin, strengthened the cities ties with the Federal Republic and increased the Berliner's freedom of movement.

Significant improvements of access roads to and from Berlin have been added in the meantime. The Berliners' vitality was allowed to develop anew. The economy of Berlin was stimulated. Since 1978 the economy of Berlin has caught up with average developments in the Federal Republic with regard to growth rates of the gross national product and investments in business. The employment figure has increased again for the first time. The influx of West German workers and employees has increased and several large enterprises have also decided to invest in Berlin. [applause]

These are positive signals contributing beyond the economic sphere to a stable political situation of the city, stimulating additionally its rich and varied cultural situation. The Federal Government has contributed considerably to the creation of a framework for these developments.

In doing this, it has always been considered that not everything that would be legally admissible would also be sensible politically. A quiet and constructive development needs firmness and restraint. We must demonstrate a sense of proportion for the politically possible, and we must have a feeling for the European chances of the city. Not he who is shouting the loudest serves the cause of Berlin, but he who carefully considers what would really serve the interests of the city and thus the interests of the people there. [applause]

Some German politicians ought to take as an example the allied protective forces which carry out their responsibilities in the interest of Berlin without great words but with firmness. [applause]

Point 13 of the Kassel meeting contained the suggestion that there be an effort for eliminating collisions between legislation in both German states in order to avoid disadvantages for the citizens. This has happened in the meantime in many cases. I remind you, for example, of recent disputes in the sphere where the new turnover tax would be valid. In this respect it was a matter of making it clear that our right to demand taxes cannot be extended to the GDR or the former German areas in the East which now belong to Poland.

However, not all differences of opinion involving legislation can be eliminated. When the basic treaty was concluded, we made the reservation that citizenship problems were not settled by the treaty. The Federal Government holds to the German citizenship as anchored in the basic law--and also out of a political and moral commitment.

I made some more extensive statements here 2 years agon in the report on the state of the nation with the agreement of all factions of the Bundestag. Today I just want to repeat that all German, regardless of where they come from, are welcome among us and that our law of citizenship--in agreement with international law--does not curtail the rights of others nor the rights of the GDR, which has issued its own citizenship law. Whether a German coming from the GDR claims his rights in our country is a question of his free decision. [applause]

In Point 14 Brandt suggested measures at that time in order to extend mutual travel and to aim for free movement.

Today we state that with regard to travel to the GDR, a considerable amount of free movement in Germany has been implemented despite continuous problems in individual cases. There are 7 to 8 million trips annually compared with the earlier 2.5 million trips 10 years ago. That includes more than 3 million visits by West Berliners who hardly had a chance form 1966 to 1972 to visit friends and relatives in East Berlin or in the GDR.

In the opposite direction, however, travel is absolutely unsatisfactory. We are happy that every year about 1.5 or 1.4 million pensioners from the GDR visit the Federal Republic. But there are only about 40,000 people below the age limit of 60 or 65 [who can visit the FRG]. Only about 40,000 people annually can travel to the Federal Republic on urgent family affairs. The latter was absolutely impossible prior to 1972. The present settlement does not suffice for us.

Point 15 at that time in Kassel dealt with the uniting of separated families. I state that since 1970 on the basis of our efforts, 26,500 germans have been permitted to resettle in the Federal Republic. In addition, there is also a high figure of former prison inmates who were also allowed to the country with our help.

Point 16 demanded that the problems along the border should be settled in a neighborly fashion. The basic treaty later charged the border commission with this task. Through laborious, detailed work and through the review and establishment of the frontier, this commission contributed toward the clear reduction in the number of serious border incidents during the past several years. It has not dropped to zero.

Nearly 1,300 km of border were established by agreement and newly marked. No agreement is as yet in sight on the 95-km-long Elbe River border. On the other hand, the border commission succeeded in finding practical solutions for cases of damage, in drinking-water supply and in other questions of water economy in the border region.

Point 17 concerns cooperation in traffic, in postal affairs and telecommunications, in the exchange of information, in science, in education, in cultural affairs, in sports. To these ends, numberous additional agreements were concluded since the basic treaty; others are under negotiation. I would like to emphasize but a few elements from a large mosaic of individual units which illustrate what has been achieved and what so far has not been attained.

The communication routes have been improved and will be further improved, for example, by the construction of the Berlin-Hamburg Autobahn, the opening of an additional railroad transit point in Berlin, through the opening of the Teltow Canal in Berlin, through the necessary repairs on the Helmstedt Autobahn, on the transit waterways. All this costs a great deal of money; some people believe that it costs too much money.

Yet, ladies and gentlemen, this money has contributed a great deal toward strengthening the viability and the economic potential of Berlin and toward introducing an element of long-term stabilization into inter-German relations. [applause]

Telephone connections were also expanded. Ten years ago today, in 1970, about 700,000 telephone calls were made from the Federal Republic to the GDR. Last year there were 30 times more, 20 million calls, an average of 55,000 a day between the two sides. For 18 years there was no telephone connection between the two sides of Berlin. Today West Berlin has more than 500 telephone lines to East Berlin and to the GDR.

Mutual information to the public in both states essentially improved as well. We know more about each other; above all the work of our journalists in the GDR has contributed toward enabling many people here to have a more exact, more explicit picture of the GDR, and as a result, prejudice has been mitigated.

The economic and social performance of the people in the GDR has been recognized beyond its borders. As early as the mid-sixties some Hamburg journalists reported their impressions of the GDR under the headline, which was quite appropriate at the time: "Travel to a Remote Country." Today nobody would expect the GDR to be the subject of such a newspaper article.

On the other hand, the working possibilities of our journalists in the GDR leave much to be desired. Evictions, restrictions, even threats by the GDR are at odds with the contractual agreements of 1972 and with the Helsinki Final Act of 1975. We are aware that in the GDR and in other communist states other criteria are applicable to journalistic work than are applicable here in our country. Yet we are firmly convinced that the GDR and other Warsaw Pact states would serve their international relations better if they were to allow Western journalists to work without hindrance. [applause]

In cultural exchanges the level achieved is not in keeping with the interests of the people in the development of the entire German sphere of culture. Neither does it correspond to the general European standard. Scientific-technical cooperation also lags far behind the East-West standard achieved elsewhere.

In sports there is an agreement between the sports associations, yet their implementation leaves much to be desired. There is no headway in environmental protection, and the problems are becoming more urgent, for instance, the desalination of the Werra River. We are endeavoring to achieve an accord with the GDR on the opening of negotiations of experts, and I hope that these talks will begin soon.

Point 18 in Kassel pertained to trade expansion. The result since then is that on an unchanged legal basis, trade exchange has more than tripled since the end of the past decade. Last year it amounted to nearly DM10 billion. The Federal Government welcomes this development, just as it welcomes the beginning of long-term cooperation. The Federal Government at the same time draws attention to the need for better regulation of non-commercial payment and accounting procedure and for eliminating social hardship there, as was envisaged in a protocol addendum to the basic treaty.

In point 19 Willy Brandt suggests that both governments appoint authorized representatives with ministerial rank to set up missions for the permanent representatives of those authorized. The result was that in 1974 the two states took up official relations. The permanent representations have been handling a variety of tasks since including a continous exchange of opinions and information between the governments and the possibilities of extending assistance, assistance of which many thousands of Germans avail themselves each year. All this seemed to be nearly inconceivable 10 years ago; today it is a foregone conclusion. [applause]

Point 20 of Kassel pertained to the membership and cooperation of the two German states in the United Nations and in other international organizations. This was put into practice in 1973. The four powers have issued a joint statement that this membership in no way touches their rights and responsibilities. And thus here, too, the modus vivendi character has been preserved for Germany.

I can remember exactly, ladies and gentlemen, at the time, 10 years ago today, these 20 Kassel points appeared to be a highly audacious program. It called for courage to present such a concept and thus to set a standard. Today we know that this was a realistic concept. Much of what was envisaged at the time has been implemented today through laborious efforts. It took a long time, it was even boring to some, yet by this purposeful policy we achieved the following for Germany:

First, we facilitated contacts between the people in divided Germany and mitigated the hardship of separation.

Second, we have kept the German problem open, just as the basic law commands. We have reaffirmed our goal of German unity also toward our treaty partners.

Third: In the course of 10 years, we have mitigated the burdens of the past also with regard to the people in Eastern Europe wherever possible through treaties and cooperation. What was achieved previously with regard to our Western neighbors has been achieved to a far-reaching extent also with regard to the peoples of the Soviet Union, the Poles and our other neighbors in the East. And many people in the East have cooperated in this matter. [applause]

Fourth: We have made it possible for the Federal Republic of Germany, since the end of the sixties, to play the role in the detente process--together with our Western friends--that was prescribed for us through our national and European responsibilities.

Fifth: We have avoided becoming isolated internationally because of our special situation as a divided nation; we have much seen to it that the political freedom of action of our state in the world has been extended considerably.

Sixth: We have made possible new forms of cooperation between the East and the West that are contributing to the strengthening of balance in Europe, to the strengthening of security in Europe.

Despite all that, ladies and gentlemen, very many things must still be done. As long as there is a wall and the application of force at the border running through Germany, we cannot be content. [applause]

The reasons for tension between both German states continue to exist. That cannot be otherwise in view of the antagonism between the political systems, due to the lack of basic political liberties and the lack of freedom of movement in the GDR. As a whole, however, mutual relations of the two states have improved without, however, permitting us to speak of good relations or normality.

Impatience and short endurance do not help to get ahead. We need long endurance in matters of German policy. Bundestag President Carstens recently stated this again, and I would like to strongly underline it with regard to the future as well. [applause]

The continuation of German policy in the future was also involved when President Carter and I early this month in a common statement agreed, and I quote: To preserve the framework of East-West relations that has been set up over more than 2 decades. End of quotation.

The then-CSU Chairman Strauss was also aware of the world political connection of the German problem [shouts] then as well as today, but I speak of 1962, Mr Barzel. I do not intend to do some window dressing with regard to the present, Mr. Barzel. [laughter, applause] CSU Chairman Strauss was also aware of the world political connection with the German problem when he said 18 years ago, in 1962: For German reunification we should have to wait for a fateful hour of the East-West talk--the talk--it was a realistic word coming, by the way, from Vilshofen. Or when he warned 4 years later against the danger of a world political isolation of our country, when he urged breaking through that isolation with the help of France, as he put it, and when he made a very skeptical statement with regard to a bilateral German-American treaty--because of the different state of interests. [shouts]

This spokesman recognized very well at times the danger of isolation. But in the middle of the sixties the CDU/CSU did not have a concept for avoiding that danger. The Social-Liberal coalition had a concept for a new German policy and a new policy toward the East, and it had the courage--and will have the courage in the future--to implement the concept. And this concept was not planned to be a breakthrough with the help of France, nor did it come about out of skepticism vis-a-vis the United States. It was based on the interests of the German people. It means that it had the support of the United States and the support of France and the support of Great Britian. And it took into consideration the state of interest of the peoples and states of Eastern Europe. [applause]

When in past weeks Mr Strauss degraded the most recent basic documents regarding cohesion and agreement during a dangerous international crisis--namely the interrelated joint statements with the French of 5 February and with the Americans of 5 March--when he degrades them with the qualification "verging on foolishness" when he tried to brush aside the latter document--on American soil--as a product of an election campaign it is detrimental to the interests of our state. It is an insult to the three government or state chiefs involved in the statements, and in the end it even hurts the originator of the polemics. [prolonged applause]

German policy and German unity can be served only with persistence, ladies and gentlemen, not with rhetoric. [prolonged applause, shouts]

The Soviet invasion of Afghanistan [shouts] has led to a serious international crisis which also has an effect on East-West relations in Europe. We hope together with our allies to be able to hold the damage in Europe within limits.

First priority is the demand for a withdrawal of Soviet troops from Afghanistan. We need a common Western answer to the Soviet expansion. In the meantime, we have made decisive progress in this matter. I quote again the joint statement of Washington: They acknowledged with satisfaction that their assessments of the effects of the Soviet invasion of Afghanistan are very close to each other, and they agree with regard to the measures every country ought to take with regard to the Soviet action. End of quotation.

This weekend I had an opportunity, in a very friendly and intense private talk with the French president, to intensify the exchange of ideas and experience between both our governments.

This centered on his important trip to the Near and Middle East as well as my talks and experiences in Washington. We also discussed the European problems, the difficult European problems, which will confront the nine heads of government in the European Council in Brussels the week after next.

On the whole--to quote the German-French statement once again--what mattered to us was that the European powers under the present circumstances must assume special responsibilities. The key points of a European action within the framework of a joint Western policy are taking shape.

First, the states' proposal concerning a nonalined and neutral Afghanistan, a negotiating offer in the central issue of the present crisis: This is not only being supported by our allies, and expressly also by the United States, but also by the ASEAN states, for example.

Second, the joint political statement by the foreign ministers of our Community and the ASEAN states in Kuala Lumpur beyond the cooperation agreement of the two regional groups of states is an entirely new step on the road toward a comprehensive partnership with the countries of the Third World for the purpose of strengthening their economic independence, their political sovereignty. Upon a German initiative, the European Community is holding exploratory talks with the Gulf states concerning the conclusion of cooperation agreements. With the agreement of the Lome Convention, the European Community has presented an orientation model for the cooperation of industrial and developing countries.

Third, the efforts for the restoration of the political balance in the Near and Middle East make the search for a just, comprehensive, lasting peace in that region even more urgent. The Europeans are endeavoring to vitalize the European-Arab dialog. At the proper time the Europeans will have to try in a careful way to help solve Middle East problems. What remains the essential elements of our policy is the right of all states of the region to live within secure borders and, on the other hand, the right to self-determination also for the Palestinian people. During his Middle East tour the French president underscored the significance of this right once again.

Fourth, in Africa our British friends, through the elections in Zimbabwe, have made an important contribution toward worldwide political stabilization, notably on a continent with which we Europeans and we Germans are particularly closely allied. What has been achieved there can only elicit our admiration. We have offered our cooperation in partnership to the government of Prime Minister Mugabe. [applause]

The European Community and its member states in the present world political crisis will have to prove that they are serious about the goals formulated at the summit meeting in The Hague 10 years ago, in December 1969, thusly: clearing the road for a united Europe which can assume its responsibility in the world tomorrow and make the contribution which is in keeping with the European task and tradition.

I find that in the present crisis the network of international cooperation is holding and is proving its worth. A network which brings us together with our allies and the EC partners and, increasingly, with the states of the Third World. Within this framework we are making our own national contribution.

Our security lies in the alliance of the free peoples of Western Europe and North America, which is led by the United States as primus inter pares. For this reason our primary concern is the unity of the alliance, the close and comprehensive coordination with all allies, in particular between ourselves and the United States. I underscore the words of the U.S.-German statement. I quote that not only the common vital interests, security interests, that not only the common security interests ally the two countries, but also their common principles and basic values, their democratic form of life, their belief in inalienable human rights. [applause]

In a basic way we are contributing to the joint defense of the West. We are prepared to make the necessary increase in our military expenditures to the same degree as it has been done each year during the past 10 years. But we are also aware that the defense capability must not be measured solely by the financial expenditures. On the basis of general conscription, which is in keeping with our interpretation of a democratic state, we have a well-trained, modernly equipped Bundeswehr, and in the future, too, we will do what is necessary in defense policy to insure our defense capability and the balance, and within the framework of the alliance but in limits drawn for us by the basic law, we will also relieve partners, if necessary, if and when they must take over other additional tasks.

We want to help our Turkish allies and friends. This spring the Federal Government took the initiative for the second time for a comprehensive international action aimed at economically consolidating Turkey, an action which is already showing initial, positive results.

Yet in dealing with our security I cannot but revert to another matter. As a reply to a quite considerable Soviet advance armament we have jointly with our partners adopted the dual decision of NATO of December 1979 on the modernization of the U.S. medium-range weapons and on the offer to the Soviet Union for arms control negotiations in this field of medium-range weapons. Jointly with our alliance partners we stand by both parts of that decision. Both parts must be understood in their full seriousness. I repeat: What matters exclusively here is to restore a balance that has been disturbed. We do not aspire to prepondernace or western advantages. On the contrary, we Germans have a vital interest in stabilizing the balance, namely on a lower level. [applause]

We are agreed with our alliance partners, and this has also been put down in the U.S.-German statement, that the arms control offer of NATO to the Soviet Union in this field of medium-range weapons remains on the table and that we want to seek progress in arms limitation wherever this might become possible.

This is also true for the negotiations on Strategic Arms Limitation, to SALT, I repeat that I would welcome it if the Soviet Union would express its action with regard to SALT II, even if it is not yet ratified, in as clear a manner as did the American President.

It also pertains to the followup meeting of the Conference for Security and Cooperation in Europe. We support having the followup meeting take place as scheduled in the fall in Madrid, Spain. [applause] We are making intensified preparations for it together with our partners. The scientific forum in Hamburg with scientists of all 35 participating states of the Conference on Security and Cooperation in Europe, CSCE, demonstrated that progress in cooperation can be also achieved in difficult times.

That also pertains to the MBFR talks. We also support the initiative of France for a conference on disarmament in Europe and we hope to make progress in the field of confidence-building measures. I again welcome the interest in a continuation of the arms limitation policy that has been expressed in the suggestion of the first secretary of the Polish Workers Party, Gierek. He approached all participants of CSCE, all who were involved in Helsinki and Belgrade.

Ladies and gentlemen, with regard to relations with the East we want to preserve what has been achieved in agreement with our allies. Most of all, however, since there is no cooperation without a balance, there is no control over a crisis without communication, without mutual information.

I welcome that communication between the two world powers has begun again. I also consider my exchange of letters with CPSU General Secretary Brezhnev to be a contribution to communications between East and West which must not be disrupted, particularly in tense times.

Between the East and the West in Europe there is no alternative to the policy of balance and of detente. [applause] But the Soviet Union must also know that its military intervention in Afghanistan has made detente more difficult and uncertain, as the German-French statement puts it, and that it would not stand a new blow of the same kind. [shouts] In other words, it is the responsibility of the Soviet Union to reestablish the upset balance through a withdrawal of its troops from Afghanistan so that the paths of cooperation which have been opened up with such toil will stay open and that peace in the world might prevail. [applause]

President Carter and I have stated together that the invasion of Afghanistan has caused a serious deterioration in the economic relations between the West and the Soviet Union.

We will shape our relations with the Soviet Union--in adherence to all treaties--in such a way that our economy will not draw advantages from measures of alliance partners. We will watch out, together with our allies, that our economic relations will not strengthen Soviet arms efforts or the Soviet military potential. But in the future too we will consider trade and economic cooperation with all countries of Eastern Europe as important elements of our policy of European stability. [applause]

The Federal Government considers it indispensable that the Soviet Union create conditions under which sportsmen from all states will be able to take part in the Olympic games. We have said so several times. These conditions have not yet been created because the occupation of Afghanistan and the battles there continue undiminished. The Olympic idea, however, since its beginnings in classical Greece, has been linked inseparably with the state of peace among the people. If peace is not reestablished in Afghanistan, a common consequence in this matter will become unavoidable.

Conditions of undisturbed cooperation, by the way, cannot be established by trying to separate the members of the Western alliance or the members of the Federal Government from each other, or by playing them against each other. If the Soviet press, for example, at one time picks the federal foreign minister as a special target of its criticism and at other time the federal chancellor, it is right on one point only, namely that both--as well as all members of this Federal Government--represent one and the same policy, [applause] a policy for Germany, that is a policy of balance and--based on the balance--a policy of understanding and cooperation. [applause]

Ten years of German policy by the social-liberal coalition have--I am taking up the threat again--strengthened the cohesion of the people in both German states. Without this human cohesion our stand for unity would lose its inner sense. [applause]

The substance of the nation, the common history, the common language, the common literature, art, music, knowledge about each other, the wish to live together and especially the common duty with regard to peace and eventually the common wish to come together under a joint roof--all these are prerequisites for German unity. Since the German policy of the social-liberal coalition was aimed at that substance we could honestly fulfill the commitment with regard to unity in line with the preamble of the basic law.

I remind you, as I said at the outset, that the basic law declares our will to serve the peace of the world in a united Europe.

Naturally we cannot renounce caution and foresight in this connection. We cannot renounce security and defense preparedness when it comes to our freedom; we cannot renounce careful foreign policy consideration, wisdom and a circumspect attitude. But we must always realize that he among us who does not want to or cannot seek a compromise with a neighbor would be useless for the peaceful reestablishment of Europe. [applause]

Here I return to the starting point of my idea with regard to the unity of the nation: only the reestablishment of the spiritual cohesion of all of Europe; only the reestablishment of the economic cohesion of all of Europe--despite all its presently depressing political forms and crises--only this offers a chance for a possible future reunification of our own nation under a common roof.

There is little sense now in advancing reunification plans or quarreling over what German unity should be like. In the letter on German unity, we made it clear that as far as we are concerned, peace in Europe is the precondition for a convergence [wiederzusammenfinden] of the Germans. This remains valid without any change. It is a commitment which in world political crisis situations requires a particularly circumspect and careful policy by the Federal Government. [applause]

All our allies also understand it this way, in particular President Carter and in particular President Giscard d'Estaing.

It was 2 years ago that then incumbent federal President Scheel pointed out that the preamble of the basic law does not say: restore the unity and the freedom; nor does it say to bring it about, but it says to complete it, which is a hint at the beginnings that had already been made, a hint on common platforms which continue to exist. At the time Scheel further said that our efforts toward unity are not an obsolete, backward-oriented empire romanticism; unity is a European peace picture oriented toward the future. I underscore this passage in particular vis-a-vis those neighbors and friends in Europe among whom occasionally some uneasiness arises over the question of what the Germans themselves plan to do with themselves on this course.

Ladies and gentlemen, much of the present partition fills us with bitterness. Yet we cannot change the present state of Germany caused by Hitler either by more hardness, as some people think, or through constant accusations, as some people are tempted to do; we cannot undo the consequences of the war. On the contrary, such attempts would just unleash additional dangers.

As far as the future of the German nation is concerned, we must state soberly that the political constellations in the world, in Europe, in the present do not offer any chances for overcoming Germany's partition into two states. But in the event that the mutual work toward detente between these two are replaced by a new confrontation, the chances for the future also would suffer from this, and nobody would suffer more from this than the Germans, and in particular the Germans on the other side. [applause]

German partition is also Europe's partition. Concretely this means that the German problem can be solved only in a European way. Everything the Europeans on both sides can do to level out the trenches between us, to create more solidarity, benefits the German cause at the same time.

Let me sum up, ladies and gentlemen: First, 10 years of policy on Germany by the social-liberal coalition have yielded concrete, positive results to the people in our divided country; at the same time they have consolidated the situation of Berlin. [applause]

Second, this policy has lived up to the mandate of the basic law. It has preserved and strengthed anew the cohesion of the Germans--an inalienable precondition for what the basic law wants. [applause]

Third, the federal government is aware of the multitude of further tasks between the two German states. It will work untiringly to cope with them. A meeting between Chairman of the Council of State Erich Honecker and myself, which I think should take place as early as possible in the German Democratic Republic, is also meant to serve this end. [applause]

The most important task for us Germans, for us in the Federal Republic of Germany, for us in the German Democratic Republic--and by the way also for the signatories of the Quadrapartite Agreement--in the present, politically dangerous world situation is the avoidance of confrontation of German soil. [strong applause]

The cohesion of the German nation and the preservation of peace are inalienable preconditions for German unity, the completion of which all of us desire. Without peace German unity is inconceivable. [prolonged strong applause]

FOREIGN MINISTER GENSCHER ADDRESSES BUNDESTAG

DW201505 Cologne Westdeutscher Rundfunk Network in German 1023 GMT 20 Mar 80 DW

[Speech by Federal Foreign Minister Hans-Dietrich Genscher to the Bundestag in Bonn following the delivery of the state of the nation message by Chancellor Helmut Schmidt --live]

[Text] Mr President, esteemed ladies and gentlemen, the topic of today's debate is to answer the question of how to pursue the political goal of the Federal Republic of Germany to work toward a state of peace in Europe in which the German people will regain their unity in free self-determination--how can this goal be successfully pursued under existing conditions of the international situation. We have not heard any advice in this respect in the speech [by Franz Josef Strauss] which we have just heard. [applause]

Ladies and gentlemen, with the letter on German unity these determining elements of policy of Germany became a component of the Federal Republic of Germany's body of work on which, following Western integration, has created the contractual bases for the policy of detente and of coming to terms with our neighbors in the East and with the GDR. This, colleague Strauss, is the avowal that we will not reconcile ourselves to German partition. It is not a verbal matter but part of a treaty to which we adhere and which you avow as well. [applause]

Ladies and gentlemen, if this debate is to live up to its purpose it must naturally also answer the question of what the Germans and their allies can now do to prevent the effects of the international crisis from being stronger in divided Germany than elsewhere. The will for peace and the avowal of the unity of the nation--and this avowal includes the one German citizenship--will for exercising the inalienable right to self-determination and the determination to implement this right within the framework of a European peace solution constitute the supporting principles of the policy on Germany pursued by the Federal Republic of Germany. [applause]

In the debate on the government statement on the state of the nation it is important to stress these principles, for they also determine the degree of responsibility of German policy within the framework of the alliance and in the securing of world peace. Herein lies the reason for my statement at the end of my speech on 17 January this year. I said at the time that for this reason there is no political decision which we can make without thinking of Dresden and Weimar, Halle, Magdeburg, Rostock and Greifswald. In the awareness of this responsibility we want to continue working for peace, security and detente, to the extent that it is up to us to do so. [applause]

Ladies and gentlemen, in the government statement the chancellor has given a sober assessment of the results of the policy for Germany since 21 May 1970, the day on which then incumbent Chancellor Willy Brandt presented in Kassel the ideas of the Federal Government concerning the principles and elements for the settlement of equal relations between the Federal Republic of Germany and the German Democratic Republic. It is obvious that not everything has been attained. Yet, ladies and gentlemen, we ought to be agreed that the people in divided Germany do not want to give up anything that has been achieved. [applause]

Ladies and gentlemen, anyone criticizing what has been achieved between 1970 and 1980--and the opposition is perfectly entitled to make a critical analysis here--must also be ready to be asked what they succeeded in achieving in the same way on the same issues during the period of their governmental responsibility. [applause]

This is especially true regarding this critical remark [replying to an interjection by the opposition] by my venerated colleague. We have not always been in the government. What makes us different from you, though, is that we do have the strength to recognize what others have done for our country, which is why, for example, the joint statement of the chancellor and the U.S. President mentions what has been attained during the past 2 decades, meaning also in the time when you bore governmental responsibility. Ladies and gentlemen, we have the responsibility and the duty to do everything to preserve what has been achieved and to clear the road for further headway.

I think that rarely before has it been as plain as it has been in the past several weeks that the unity of the nation, of the people here and over there, has so clearly manifested itself in the concern about common peace, about the safeguarding of what has been jointly attained, about human rights and about further practical progress. The responsible people in the GDR must know that they will find in us partners for any step which will bring us closer to these goals, many of which we know are jointly desired by Germans in East and West.

The world political situation directly affects the situation of the German nation. Ladies and gentlemen, during the past decades we lived to see many a crisis which had its origin in divided Germany. Others emerged from divided Europe. The fact that it is different this time does not allow us to forget history, nor does it induce us to harbor the illusion that the matter in Afghanistan is none of our business.

Detente is indivisible, and the right to self-determination and political independence are inalienable rights, and their preservation brings peoples and states together, regardless of their geographical distance.

The situation of the nation in divided Germany leads us time and again in the crisis development of our times to watch quite carefully how we can avoid the effects of this development, effects which might particularly hit us or apply to us. In so doing we must keep in mind that all progress in divided Germany has been possible only jointly with our partners and allies.

The membership in the European Community and the membership in the North Atlantic Alliance are the indispensable foundations of, not impediments to, a realistic policy of detente and coming to terms with the East.

The aims of our German policy, as I have pointed them out here, can therefore be pursued only together with our Western partners and not without them. Only in community with our partners and allies can we implement these aims.

One of the most significant documents of postwar history is the Treaty on Germany, the 25th anniversary of the implementation of which will be observed on 5 May this year. In this treaty the three powers identify themselves--the United States, France and the United Kingdom--with the aims of our German policy, and they accept their responsibilities. Numerous documents thereafter include all our partners, not merely these three, in the common aims.

Ladies and gentlemen, at least equally important is the factual support we have experienced on every occasion with regard to our German objectives. Our belonging to the Western community and to the North Atlantic Pact, therefore, is also an expression of the common interest in the national problem of the Germans.

The awareness that the alliance and the community are fiathful communities of freedom which are based on common security interests and ideological values also includes the elements of German policy mentioned in the letter on German unity. This statement stresses our conviction that the interests of the Germans and their implementation are an expression of Western unity and not of different interests in the Western camp.

All this is meant when there is talk of solidarity in the Western alliance, of solidarity between Europeans and Americans, and of solidarity between Germans and Americans.

Ladies and gentlemen, our cooperation in the alliance is therefore not contrary to the interests of the nation that is divided into different states. On the contrary, our fellow countrymen in the GDR know that our freedom is their hope, and that our freedom depends on the same conditions which guarantee our security. They know that for us Germans peace is as indivisible as the nation.

Mr President, ladies and gentlemen, the will to overcome the crisis that has been touched off by the Soviet intervention in Afghanistan has been expressed by the Federal Government in the discussions of 17 January 1980 and 28 February 1980. What was said then is valid today and unchanged. Significant elements of common efforts of Western states have either been implemented or are being continued. The Federal Government made important decisions with regard to common defense in the session of the Federal Security Council.

The European Community on 25 February 1980 initiated the cooperation agreement with Yugoslavia. On 7 March the previously annouced treaty with the ASEAN states was signed. Exploratory talks with the Gulf states are under way. Efforts to give Turkey efficient help have been promoted considerably by the efforts of the federal finance minister.

I tell you, ladies and gentlemen, if we had not made these efforts, there would not be a real chance to help Turkey. That cannot be contested. [applause]

With the Zimbabwe elections, which were termed fair and just, a significant step has been taken toward independence. In this way they have embarked on the path toward solutions through negotiations. Efforts continue with the aim of solving the Mideast problem through a guarantee of Israel's existence within secure borders and the right of the Palestinian people to carry out their right to self-determination.

Ladies and gentlemen, this means that within the more and more clear contours of an overall Western concept as an answer to the Soviet challenge, significant steps have been taken, steps that are aimed at strengthening the alliance's defensive ability, steps that are aimed at taking measures for the preservation of our strategic interests in the economic field, steps that are aimed at measures for the strengthening of the independence and sovereignty of the nonalined states.

Ladies and gentlemen, anyone who wants to correctly assess German-American relations, and who wants to correctly assess our position in the Western alliance cannot ignore the fact that the contribution of the Federal Republic of Germany to this overall concept is most considerable. That is being recognized in the United States. [applause]

A part of the overall Western concept is the suggestion of the European foreign ministers of 19 February 1980, a suggestion that is finding more and more international support. This suggestion is the honest attempt to show a way out of the immediate results of the Afghanistan crisis. It is therefore the intention of this suggestion, as well as of the suggestion by the United Nations, to achieve the withdrawal of Soviet troops from Afghanistan.

The suggestion is an attempt to create framework conditions for that withdrawal which would stabilize the future status of Afghanistan in such a way that this country would not become the subject of power policy aims of other states, nor that a danger could emanate from Afghanistan for anybody, including the Soviet Union.

Such a status for Afghanistan can be achieved only if it is a nonalined state, if its political independence and its territorial integrity are respected by all sides and if nobody interferer in the domestic affairs of this country. All sides also means the Soviet Union. The Soviet Union ought to take seriously the will for a constructive solution contained in this suggestion.

Ladies and gentlemen, in the session of the Bundestag on 17 January 1980 I said: The aim of the Soviet intervention in Afghanistan is obvious. It is the expression of an overall strategy aimed at extending the sphere of influence wherever there is a lack of stability--stability exists in Europe--and where this seems possible without running greater risk. Concretely said: In the Middle East area it is also an expression of the overall strategy aimed at advancing to the warm waters, while simultaneously gaining influence on the energy and raw material sources of the region, end of quotation.

Ladies and gentlemen, the Soviet Union terms this statement an imputation. By complying with the European suggestion it could give a sign indicating that it seriously wants to abandon that strategy. [applause] The reaction of the Soviet Union to this suggestion so far does not give any reason at all to be optimistic. There is a lack of obvious and tangible indications which would open chances for the beginning of a negotiating process. First of all, public statements mentioning the prerequisites for a Soviet withdrawal have not been followed up by corresponding action.

On the contrary, the actions of the Soviet intervention troops in Afghanistan speak a different language. And yet, ladies and gentlemen, all of us would neglect our responsibility if we did not avail ourselves of even the slightest option to contribute toward overcoming the crisis in our own way--through political means, through dialog, through negotiation. But what this requires, above all, is the necessary steps by the Soviet Union.

This, by the way, applies also to the Olympic issue which was touched on here just a while ago again. It is not we who jeopardize the Olympic games, but the Soviet Union which jeopardizes them, and in particular our participation, by its intervention. The Soviet Union alone can make it possible by withdrawing from Afghanistan.

This is why the Soviet Union must create the prerequisites to make it possible for the teams from all states of the world to participate in the games. These preconditions do not exist, and unfortunately I have no more cause today than I had in my last speech to the Bundestag to expect that they might still be created in good time.

Still, ladies and gentlemen, the attitude of the Federal Government is unequivocal. When we endeavor, colleague Marx, to bring about a common European attitude of all nine Europeans along our lines, which also means along the American-European lines, it is not a strike against the U.S.-European relationship, but an effort toward achieving a common U.S.-European position on such a difficult issue. [applause]

Ladies and gentlemen, the statement by the Soviet Union which spoke of the preconditions for withdrawal was not followed by corresponding deeds. Nevertheless we advocate the view--and I stress this once again--that in this difficult situation we must not allow the dialog contacts with the East to be severed. In this world political crisis we as Germans must, in dealing with the report on the state of the nation, especially heed the effects of this crisis on detente policy in Europe and on East-West relations at large.

Compared with earlier actions of this nature outside of Germany--I am referring to Hungary in 1956 and to Prague in 1968--the Soviet intervention in Afghanistan has the added significance that the intervention in Afghanistan happened under the conditions of a detente policy which we hoped to see progress, and that as a result important principles of this detente policy have been violated. For this reason the international situation can no longer be as it was before, even after a withdrawal of the Soviet troops from Afghanistan.

In a difficult international situation it is necessary to state here once again and say clearly that the central element of detente policy is the unconditional observance of all concluded treaties. The Federal Government also and expressly avows this today. As far as we are concerned, this also means that we will do everything in our power to keep the treaties free from impairment by events in other parts of the world. And we shall make every effort to develop this treaty policy and to utilize its possibilities in mutual interest or, to the extent it involves a multilateral instrument like the Final Act of Helsinki, in the general interest.

The negotiations conducted with the GDR particularly in the most recent past are the practical proof of not only the will for this policy, but also for the existence of opinions for this policy under the present circumstances, options which we must not neglect in the interest of the nation.

Ladies and gentlemen, detente policy stands for more, however. The principles of detente policy in the East-West relationships are adapted to behavior everywhere in the world. The United States and the Soviet Union have expressed this in their declaration of principles dated 29 May 1972. May I be permitted to quote from it:

The United States and the USSR consider it most important to prevent the emergence of situations which might lead to a dangerous worsening of their relations. Hence, they will do everything in their power to avoid military confrontations and to prevent the outbreak of nuclear war.

In their mutual relations they will always exercise restraint, and they will be prepared to negotiate and to settle differences of opinion by peaceful means. Talks and negotiations on unsettled questions will be conducted in a spirit of mutuality, mutual cooperativeness and mutual advantage. Both sides recognize that direct or indirect efforts toward achieving a unilateral advantage at the expense of the other will be at odds with these objectives. The preconditions for the preservation and strengthening of peaceful relations between the United States and the USSR are the recognition of the security interests of the parties to the treaty on the basis of the principle of equal rights and the renunciation of the use of force or the threat with force.

On 27 June 1977 the French president and the Soviet general secretary stated that the Soviet Union and France deem it necessary that the efforts of all states for the benefit of international detente policy be continued and intensified through the conformity of their attitudes toward other states and in all parts of the world with the requirements of detente. And finally, ladies and gentlemen, the joint statement of the chancellor and the Soviet general secretary of 6 May 1978 says: In respecting the indivisibility of peace and security in all parts of the world, they--meaning the Federal Republic of Germany and the USSR--will unilaterally, bilaterally and multilaterally muster their political and economic potentials for this goal, namely the indivisibility of peace and security in all parts of the world.

Thus our behavior in the present crisis must be governed, first, by the determination to do everything jointly with our allies that is necessary to safeguard the balance and thus for our own freedom and security and for the preservation of peace; second, it must be governed by the readiness to be a partner to the nonalined countries in the preservation of their nonalinement; third, it must be governed by the realization that the behavior of the Soviet Union has incalculable effects on detente policy in Europe and on the East-West relationship at large; and fourth, it must be governed by the will not to reply to the violation of these principles by the Soviet Union in Afghanistan by abandoning these principles in Europe on our part or even by calling into question the treaties concluded with the GDR, with the Soviet Union and the other East European states, the quadripartite agreement on Berlin, or the Final Act of Helsinki. These documents continue to be determinative for our policy. [applause]

This is why we will defend all results of our policy tooth and nail, and on our part we will not retract one step which has become possible as a result of the treaties and agreements concluded in the interest of the divided country. Because we do not consider the policy introduced as being static, but rather as dynamic, we will not do anything on our part that might tend to jeopardize options for further headway.

The Federal Republic of Germany does not stand alone with regard to this policy. It is included in the community of the Western countries. The statement made by the federal chancellor and the American president on 5 March 1980 says: The federal chancellor and the president repeated the determination of their countries to mitigate tentions in the world. They agreed that is desirable in the present period of increased tensions to preserve the framework of East-West relations that has been set up over more than 2 decades.

Ladies and gentlemen, colleague Strauss has once again dealt with the German-French statement of 5 February 1980. A listener would be forced to conclude that the French and German governments desired to say with this statement: so far this is perhaps just barely tolerable, but next time--beware.

Ladies and gentlemen, paragraph 1 of this statement reads as follows, and I must read it to you now: They, namely the president of the Republic of France and the federal chancellor, believe that the Soviet military intervention in Afghanistan is unacceptable and that it will create serious dangers for stability in that region and for peace.

They consider it indispensable to make an immediate end to this, as has been demanded by a great majority of the UN General Assembly. The only aim is to reestablish a situation in line with the rights of the Afghan people and the demands of international peace.

Ladies and gentlemen, the aim of a common Western policy cannot be pointed out more clearly. [applause]

[Bundestag president] Will you permit an interjection, Mr Federal Foreign Minister?

[Genscher] Please go ahead.

[Unidentified opposition spokesman] Mr Federal Minister, isn't the text you have just read--and which is certainly considered correct by all here in the House--devalued by the point that Minister President Strauss mentioned and criticized: that is that this text signals to the Soviet Union that the consequences of its action will take place only if a second act of this kind takes place? Doesn't that devalue everything you have just said? [applause]

[Genscher] Actually, my colleague, you should not impute to our own government or to the French Government that they would mutually devalue what they said in the same statement. What you have just said is not contained in the statement at all. The sentence you object to reads as follows: They state that detente would not stand a new blow of the same kind.

Ladies and gentlemen, anyone who rejects that sentence must say that as of now he no longer wants to pursue a detente policy. I tell you that we will try to create the prerequisites for a continued detente policy and preserve them where they still exist. [applause]

Ladies and gentlemen, a solution of the Afghanistan crisis will have to give an answer to the question of how the Soviet Union wants to handle the principle of indivisible detente in the future. That is one of the central issues touched upon in this sentence. [shouts] If for you the indivisibility of detente policy is meaningless, you ought to be enlightened by colleagues of your faction who are versed in foreign policy. [applause]

Peace in Europe in the future will depend even more on developments in the world. Ladies and gentlemen, the developments we are facing contain serious dangers. I will mention only the growing need for scarcer and scarcer raw materials and energy, the increasing gap between poor and rich countries, and lack of respect for the independence of the countries of the Third World, as demonstrated by the Soviet intervention in Afghanistan. And finally there is the danger of a new arms race caused by the Soviet arms lead [vorruestung]. We do not want to have an arms race, the Soviet Union is forcing it on us, it alone can stop it. Our hand remains outstretched for disarmament policy in all fields. [applause]

The Soviet intervention in Afghanistan has taken place at a time when the last vestiges of colonialism are slowly disappearing, when the young African and Asian states that have become independent are becoming aware of their independence, their weight and their share in the responsibility for the fate of the world and for peace in the world.

The Soviet policy in the Third World runs against this strong historical current. The representatives of an African state said in the great debate in the UN General Assembly on Afghanistan that no words could describe the deep disappointment and sobering feeling which the government and the people of his country experienced when the news came of the Soviet armed intervention into Afghanistan, a nonalined developing country of the Third World which did not threaten the peace and security of the Soviet Union. Nothing can more clearly express the basic mood in the Third World than this statement.

Ladies and gentlemen, we are therefore in the most critical situation where the attempt by the Soviet Union to set up predominance in the Third World brings it into stronger and stronger conflict with the countries of Africa and Asia. Two prerequisites must therefore be fulfilled in order that, in view of these dangers, peaceful development not be jeopardized.

First, the Soviet expansionist trend must be effectively stopped. Second, the stabilizing role of the nonalined movement must be recognized and more efficiently supported by the West than in the past. [applause]

America has accepted the challenge of this hour. The people, the public and the Congress have unanimously encouraged the government to face America's world political responsibility with new strength and with new awareness. This revival of America's world political responsibility is a chance for us, for Europe and for peace in the world. The responsible Europeans today will be measured by whether they have realized that and acted accordingly. The Federal Government is determined to do it.

The Soviet Union must realize that unilateral military expansion will not be accepted.

Ladies and gentlemen, the West must not lend its countenance to the thesis of an irresistible change in the balance of forces to the advantage of the communist camp, neither through words nor acts. This must also not be done through words that call into question the predictability of our policy which includes the Western unity and cohesion. European-American relations belong to this cohesion.

If the Soviet Union correctly assesses its interests it will realize that with regard to global standards as well, there is no sensible alternative to cooperation.

The earlier the Soviet Union realizes that, the better for its own affairs. Enormous costs can be saved and considerable risks can be avoided. It is also of decisive importance that everyone in the West--I must stress this again--realize the significance of the nonalined movement and accept the chance that has been offered for fair cooperation as partners in order to create a real and honest basis for lasting cooperation with these countries, cooperation that would stabilize peace.

This is a historic commitment for us, and it is a task in which Europe is playing an important role in foreign and development policies. The meeting between the foreign ministers of the European Community and ASEAN has shown that this readiness is meeting with a response on the part of the nonalined states. The efforts for peace settlements in Africa and in the Middle East and our efforts for development policy are expressive of our determination to contribute toward stability and peace everywhere in the world.

However, ladies and gentlemen, the insurance of the balance is of decisive importance for detente in Europe. The joint German-Soviet statement of 9 May 1978 says in this connection: Both sides consider it important that nobody aspire to military superiority. They proceed from the premise that approximate equality and parity for guaranteeing defense will suffice and they express their conviction that agreement on further steps in the field of disarmament and arms limitation must be accelerated so that the process of detente will not be impaired but complemented by developments in the military sphere.

It is along these lines, ladies and gentlemen, that we understand the extension of detente to the military sphere. What we want is balance, and we want this balance on as low a level of armaments as possible. But if by demanding military detente as a continuation of the political detente the Soviet Union should mean that the West should accept imbalances or endeavor less than before for the requirements of defense, then this would be a fatal misunderstanding. I repeat once again: The basic prerequisite for realistic detente policy is and remains the military balance. And wherever imbalances exist they must be mitigated. Anyone seeking military superiority places himself at odds with the objective preconditions of stable relations in Europe and in the world, and they provoke an arms race. Advance armament leads to the closure of the arms gap. Unfortunately this is so. We do not want to fan the arms race. What we want is to halt it. But we cannot do it alone; hence our outstretched hand to the Soviet Union. [applause]

Let me repeat again: What we want is balance on a lower level of armaments. This is the goal of our arms control policy, and this arms control policy is an urgent task for the eighties. The disarmament offers by NATO in December 1979 remain on the table. We will not be discouraged by the initial, negative reaction of the Soviet Union, which we regret. The decision on the closure of the arms gap will be implemented as planned. It is a necessity under defense policy and not just a rhetorical negotiating position. Any real or apparent attitude to the contrary impairs our security interests and leads to wrong assessments in Moscow, thus worsening the chances for arms control negotiations.

It is especially in the present crisis that we deem it necessary not to let the dialog between East and West break off. For this reason we will not cancel any talks. We are prepared to have talks, and we expect others to prove their good will by being similarly receptive. For this reason we want the CSCE followup meeting in Madrid to take place, and we want to talk about confidence-building measures there which the world needs now more urgently than ever beofre.

We can state with satisfaction that the Hamburg scientific forum of the CSCE took an objective course and that it also produced constructive results. We support the French initiative to convoke a conference on disarmament in Europe which is to extend the area of confidence-building measures over all of Europe.

We take every signal from the East seriously. This also applies to the proposal by Polish Party Chief Gierek for a European disarmament conference. We are examining it to see where common elements can be found with the French proposal, which we support.

Ladies and gentlemen, the Federal Republic of Germany in the past has made its full contrubution toward insuring the defense capability of the alliance in Europe. For years we have led NATO states with our contributions to the alliance, with the continuous strengthening of the combat potential of the Bundeswehr. We are prepared, within the alliance, to bear additional tasks and burdens in Europe. We will further increase our defense efforts within the framework of the commitments undertaken in the alliance and fulfill the goals of NATO's armed forces planning without restriction.

Ladies and gentlemen, nobody in our country intends to do that through a policy of indebtedness, but if we wish to accomplish this through savings, we will need a high degree of cooperation here in this House and between the Federal Government and the laender. The Federal Government cannot do it alone. [applause]

The unequivocal and incontestable avowal of the Western defense alliance is one of the indispensable preconditions for the continuation of our realistic detente policy. Our anchoring and our security in the Western alliance, however, not only provide us with the option for a detente policy, but also make it our duty in the interest of the people in Germany to preserve what we have attained in detente, also in times of crises. Particularly in this debate on the state of the nation it is necessary to draw attention to this. We, the Germans in East and West, have known in recent weeks that we are in harmony in our concern about peace. The awareness of this common feeling, the responsibility for the destiny of the whole nation, continues to determine our policy.

Ladies and gentlemen, we know that history is on our side when what matters is to fulfill the goals of the letter concerning the unity of the nation. Peace is a prospect which is in keeping with the will of all peoples in Europe and which is compatible with the security interests of all states. I am confident that the wish of the peoples for independence and freedom, for the implementation of their right to self-determination, will prove to be the stronger force in the face of all tendencies toward hegemony and oppression. The basic tendency in the life of states together is aimed at overcoming trenches, rather than digging them deeper.

Esteemed ladies and gentlemen, if we pursue the goals of the letter concerning German unity with emphasis and responsible awareness we will advocate the right cause, and this cause will prevail. Thank you.

DANISH PRIME MINISTER JORGENSEN ARRIVES IN BONN

[Excerpts] Bonn--Danish Prime Minister Anker Jorgensen arrived in Bonn tonight on a 2-day official visit. Immediately after his arrival he had an exchange of views with Federal Chancellor Helmut Schmidt. Jorgensen, who is giving a dinner tonight for the federal chancellor at the Godesberg "Redoute," will be received by Federal President Karl Carstens tomorrow. The major topics of Jorgensen's talks in Bonn are international problems after the Soviet invasion of Afghanistan, East-West relations and problems of mutual interest regarding the European Community. This may well include Britain's contribution to the community.

FORMER FREE UNIVERSITY PRESIDENT SUSPECTED OF SPYING

[Summary] Berlin--The former president of the Free University in Berlin, 41-year-old Rolf Kreibisch, who is suspected of having spied for an Eastern intelligence service, for the time being remains silent. He told a DPA correspondent over the telephone today: I prefer not to say anything for the moment. His wife Renate told DPA: There is no truth in the allegations. According to the Public Prosecutor General's Office in Koblenz, investigations concerning a number of people suspected of spying for the GDR in the Federal Republic were carried out yesterday not only in Berlin, but in Koblenz, Mainz and Stuttgart as well. In Stuttgart the investigations concerned two suspects, and in Koblenz a 59-year-old chemical technician. The Koblenz public prosecutor general said that the persons concerned had been incriminated by a GDR resident who came to the Federal Republic in 1979.

INITIATIVE ON JORDANIAN-PALESTINIAN CONFEDERATION REPORTED

JN171715 Paris AL-MUSTAQBAL in Arabic 15 Mar 80 pp 10-12 JN

[By Antoine 'Abd al-Masih]

[Excerpts] Was the cautious calm that characterized the French attitude toward the Middle East problem during the past 2 years until March 1980 the type of calm that normally precedes the storm? And, was the storm that attended the new French attitude strong enough to leave its imprint on the Middle East question and the international political situation in general?

Ten days before his visit to the Gulf, French President Valery Giscard d'Estaing met with the Arab ambassadors in Paris at a reception held in his honor by the Moroccan ambassador. the PLO representative in France, Ibrahim as-Sus, was among those invited. All those presented noted the "warm salutations" exchanged between the French president and Ibrahim as-Sus and the special attention which President Giscard d'Estaing paid to the PLO representative. In a small circle which comprised President Giscard d'Estaing, As-Sus and some Arab ambassadors, the French president said: "We welcome you in France." The PLO representative replied: "We also hope to welcome you soon in the state of Palestine." The French president replied: "I am optimistic about a solution. I have reasons for believing this."

The circle became smaller. The Arab ambassadors purposely withdrew one after the other to give the president the chance to talk with the PLO representative privately. The ambassadors were astonished and pleased at the same time to see the president and Ibrahim as-Sus continue their talk for 10 minutes. Some ambassadors said that the talk was "very important." One ambassador said: "You should expect a surprise soon."

If the French president's visit to the Gulf was political and economic, his visit to Jordan was, perhaps, more important because of its objective and the long, special talk he had with King Husayn. As we know, Jordan is closely linked to the Palestine question and the Palestinian people. Furthermore, there are Jordan's moderate and balanced policy it is now pursuing, the relations which are gradually strengthening between it and the PLO, its avoidance of Arab blocs and the dark clouds marring its relationship with the United States.

What plans and ideas did the French president bring to the Jordanian king and what were the answers to them? Informed Arab sources have confirmed to AL-MUSTAQBAL that the Giscard-Husayn talks were different from the French president's talks with the Gulf rulers. The Amman talks touched on "detailed, precise and deep" aspects. They also touched on proposal to solve the Palestine question. The French side wanted to know the seriousness of existing relations between Jordan and the PLO. It also wanted to know if these relations are strong and continuous "to make it possible to establish a federation or a confederation between a future Palestinian state and Jordan." France believes that "a federal or a confederal state is the only solution which will not embarrass any part to the dispute and, as a matter of fact, might satisfy everyone."

The French side referred to the Swiss federation as an example of the federation or confederation it proposes. It hinted that a federal or confederal plan "will bring pressure to bear on both Israel and the United States and might even save the United States from the impasse." The French side also made no secret of its demand for the need "to adopt a new resolution adding to Resolution No 242 the Palestinian people's rights to self-determination." The French side said that its stand enjoys the backing of its European allies, especially the British and the Germans. It transpired from the detailed matters discussed by the French and Jordanian sides that France "is secretly examining the legal status of the city of Jerusalem before and after the 5 June 1967 war."

In the light of the proposals and ideas submitted by the French side, the Jordanian reply was as follows: "Jordan's relations with the PLO are good," and Jordan "supports any federal or confederal formula depending on the PLO's approval."

Many questions are looming on the Middle East horizon following the French president's visit to the region. Will there be a revival of the "united Arab kingdom" plan previously proposed by Jordan and shelved after the 1974 Rabat summit, which recognized the PLO as the sole legitimate representative of the Palestinian people? Will this plan be amended? Will the PLO agree to any type of federation or confederation?

The Palestine National Council, whose decisions are binding on the PLO, previously approved the establishment of an independent Palestinian state on any part of Palestinian territory which has been liberated or evacuated by the Zionist enemy. The PLO executive committee cannot agree to any confederal formula unless it is approved by the Palestine National Council. Pending the decision of the Palestine National Council--that is, if it meets to discuss the subject of the confederation--the federation and confederation plan will remain on the shelf.

TEXT OF MARCHAIS LETTER TO GISCARD ON RECOGNITION OF PLO

[Unattributed report: "Invite 'Arafat to Paris"; capitalized word printed in italics]

Paris 14 March 1980.

Mister President of the Republic,

As you are surely aware, the PCF has spoken for many years in favor of recognition of the inalienable national rights of the Palestinian people which include that of setting up their own independent state. For my part I am convinced that there can be no just and lasting peace as long as this people's fundamental rights are denied, until the PLO--the sole legitimate and internationally recognized representative of the Palestinian people--is associated with any peace process, and until Israel liberates all the territories occupied since 1967. The security of all the states of the region is bound up with these conditions.

We have reaffirmed our position many times, particularly in the various questions put to the foreign minister. During a meeting that I had with Chairman Yasir 'Arafat, I myself outlined my party's proposals for a positive and active French role in the Middle East conflict. The response produced by these initiatives demonstrates the development of French public opinion and the increasing groundswell of sympathy for the Palestinian people.

The press has recently given much publicity both to the communique between France and Kuwait, which recognizes the Palestinian people's right to self-determination, and to your statement emphasizing that the PLO must form part of any negotiation.

Coming more than 5 years after the recognition by the UN General Assembly of the inalienable national rights of the Palestinian people--including their right to self-determination--and of the representativeness of the PLO, your statements have made no mention of this people's right to set up their own state. Now, self-determination and the right to set up an independent state are two closely allied concepts.

Under these conditions, I believe that it would be advisable to harmonize the government's words with its actions. You can do this by OFFICIALLY recognizing the PLO and by inviting Yasir 'Arafat, PLO Executive Committee chairman, to Paris.

Not only would such an invitation increase France's prestige in the world, it would be concrete proof that the path to negotiation is open and that chances for a political solution to the problem do exist.

For my part I am convinced that such an initiative could not fail to produce a broad response from our people.

I ask you, Mr President of the Republic, to accept this expression of my esteemed regard.

[Signed] Georges Marchais, secretary general.

CARTER ECONOMIC PLAN COULD PROVE 'DISGUISE FOR INACTION'

LD201531 Paris LE FIGARO in French 18 Mar 80 pp 1, 9 LD

[Alain Vernay article: "From One Fear to Another"]

[Excerpt] Although very different in their effects, inflation and hyperinflation have a single cause: The White House's inability to define a coherent policy and have it accepted subsequently by Congress and public opinion.

The fourth recovery program presented last weekend by President Carter, 5 weeks after the third one and 4 months after that of November 1, seems likely to necessitate a fifth which will cause a new increase in the cost of money, built on the ruins of the U.S. bond market which has slumped by $600 billion in 6 months. Major capital will leave Germany, Japan and Switzerland again to profit from such high interest rates. The dollar will climb, the U.S. economy will sag, with activity down as a result of the cost of money which feeds inflation before combatting it.

Thus the plan, which for a few days will be seen as a panacea, will soon be regarded as a disguise for inaction. It could be otherwise, though, if Congress accepts the still inadequate gasoline increase without obstruction.

Can we hope that the international situation will recover? Of course, but not by economic and finacial means alone, since the worrying factor is the weakening of an international economic order which the United States can no longer manage to impose by its authority on the principal OPEC producers--themselves handicapped by the American alliance, which sets some of their allies against them.

Once again the free world countries are questioning America's leadership, despite the admitted impossibility of dispensing with the dollar as an international currency. The diplomatic and military stormclouds are blurring signals from the exchange market and robbing them of their significance. This is scarcely likely to change as long as people believe that, even in defense of its vital interests, America is in no condition to act as France has done in Africa.

The reversal in the international situation is passing through an internal recovery in the United States, the keystone of which is a serious energy-saving policy.

The Western world is beginning to fear that, to recover its zest, the United States will have to endure not just one but several Pearl Harbors.

LE MONDE BLAMES CARTER FOR OLYMPICS BOYCOTT 'CONFUSION'

[Editorial: "Games and Camps"]

[Text] There is something derisory about the suggestion that alternative competitions should be organized to enable athletes who will not go to Moscow to nonetheless display their talents. True, it is necessary to assuage the frustrations of people who have been preparing for the world festival of sport for many years. It is necessary to compensate television networks and souvenir dealers who run the risk of losing enormous investments. However, far from remedying the situation, any alternative games could well aggravate the disease which is gnawing at the Olympic movement. It is unrealistic to make a clear distinction between politics and high-level athletics since so many countries have staked their prestige and resources on these competitions that it has become impossible to unreservedly celebrate any universal brotherhood of athletes. This does not mean, however, that it is either necessary or desirable to envisage the games under the colors of some "free world."

Mr Carter has been responsible for all this confusion. At the beginning of the year, seeking a way to retaliate against the invasion of Afghanistan, the U.S. President decided to boycott the games unless the country entrusted with the task of organizing them stopped its aggression without delay. He secured either enthusiastic or resigned support from some of his allies. He presented Moscow with a kind of ultimatum which, of course, had no effect since nothing indicates that the Soviet troops are to be withdrawn from Afghanistan in the near future.

In any case, did anyone have any illusions about this? Certainly not. The political arguments for and against the Olympic games in Moscow are well balanced, but it was obvious that the Red Army would not stop its offensive merely to enable the Olympic festival to take place under the best possible conditions. President Carter's stance can be justified by the hope of conveying a warning to Soviet opinion and making it realize that a military operation which has been described in the press as a kind of humanitarian mission has brought about a major crisis.

Naturally, it could be objected that the results achieved may be contrary to what was expected. Whenever they feel humiliated, the Russians occasionally rise against their government--this happened at the beginning of the century following the unsuccessful war against Japan--but they usually rally round the authorities. The failure of the games could lead to a revival of nationalism from which the leaders would benefit.

From a strictly political viewpoint, no one can say with any assurance whether participating in or boycotting the games in Moscow would be more conducive to the preservation of world peace. Be that as it may, one factor deserves special attention. For many months Moscow human rights activists have been subjected to some unjustifiable measures. They have either been sent to camps or whenever, as in Sakharov's case, their fame has protected them from too drastic measures, forced residence has been imposed on them since the police have to rid the capital of its dissidents. Repressive measures have been taken openly. The authorities do not even seem to be as concerned about it all as the Roman occupiers were when, for the sake of appearances and to conceal their crimes, they celebrated a festival of releasing Barabbas.

Very few countries possess a sufficient number of qualities required to organize any world competition to deserve such an honor. It is either naive or hypocritical to demand that any government change its entire policy if it wants to play host to leading athletes. The least that can be done is to let it know that the freedom of one man is too high a price to pay for the joy of competing.

PCI'S PAJETTA JUSTIFIES PROJECTED BERLINGUER PRC VISIT

LD201755 Rome L'UNITA in Italian 16 Mar 80 pp 1, 20 LD

[Apparent text of PCI Directorate member Gian Carlo Pajetta 14 March speech to the Central Committee: "Comrade Berlinguer to Visit Beijing Soon"--first two paragraphs L'UNITA introduction]

[Text] The CCP Central Committee has invited PCI Secretary General Comrade Enrico Berlinguer to visit the PRC with a PCI Central Committee delegation. The invitation has been accepted. The visit will take place in April.

Speaking on Friday evening on the second point on the Central Committee's agenda, Comrade Gian Carlo Pajetta said:

We have received and accepted the CCP's invitation to send a PCI delegation to Beijing. The text of the invitation will be published Sunday, in Beijing as well. We are submitting the topic to the Central Committee to stress the importance of the event and to invite its advice and opinion, if this is considered opportune. I do not believe it is a matter of issuing a yes or no here. Indeed, the acceptance of the invitation is consistent with the approach which we have always had to relations among communist parties and with the way in which we have expressed ourselves and acted with regard to the issue of our relations with the Chinese Communists.

On several occasions we have expressed our desire for relations to expand among all the workers movement's forces in various flexible forms; it has been our belief that diversity, full autonomy and even conflicts and polemics should not impede relations, exchanges of experiences or the quest for convergences. On this basis we have maintained and expanded our relations with the communist parties and with a large number of other workers parties and progressive movements throughout the world.

More specifically, with regard to the CCP, I would like to recall our constant concern and regret over the splits which have taken place and which still exist with so much of the workers and revolutionary movement, our refusal to aggravate conflicts and our hope and activity for a resumption of unitary relations.

This has always been our frankly expressed opinion at communist party conferences for many years. Furthermore, let us not forget that this inspiration was strongly felt in Togliatti's Yalta memorandum. This too is the stance which we confirmed again recently at our latest congress and at last November's Central Committee meeting.

Please permit me to cite just two short quotations. At the congress, after pointing to differences and even divergences with the Chinese communists on major points of foreign policy, Comrade Berlinguer said: "It would be mistaken to believe that a strong and modern China would necessarily be a disturbing factor with regard to detente and peace. We believe, on the contrary, that China can and must be another force working for peace and mankind's general progress. Whether or not this happens, of course, depends primarily on China itself. But it also depends on the attitude and policy which the other countries of the world, including the socialist countries, will adopt with respect to China. It would be irresponsible and damaging for the United States or other Western countries to pursue a policy aimed at playing the Chinese card against the Soviet Union and to increase tension among the socialist countries. But at the same time it would be wrong for anyone to disregard China's right to become a modern and developed country. Since this process will take place, everyone must help to insure that it leads China to make a commitment to peace and cooperation."

At the previous Central Committee meeting we said: "We are following with great attention and lively interest the new course in Chinese domestic policy in the belief that, despite the troubles and diversities which could still emerge in the recent phase of readjustment and stabilization, the Chinese revolution--one of the greatest historical events of our era--can take a further step in its development, by achieving the progress which its leaders claim to be pursuing and by enabling the Chinese people to attain more advance objective in building a socialist society. It is in this spirit and with this in mind that we are working for the resumption of normal relations with the CCP, in the belief that this is in the interests of both parties and both peoples, with the desire to contribute to advancing the international workers movement and the peoples liberation movement."

So it is in this spirit and in this direction that we have worked over the past months to reestablish relations with the CCP, by means of a series of initiatives, visits and contacts with which the comrades are acquainted (the Italian Communist Youth Federation delegation led by D'Alema, the visit by Comrades Petruccioli and Ghiara, the delegation led by Mayor Gabbuggiani for the twinning of Nanjing and Florence and the delegation from the unitary trade union confederation which included Comrade Bruno Trentin) and other contacts, some of them confidential, which our party leadership has been briefed on and has discussed. Of course we did not and still do not proceed from identical stances as the premise for comradely relations with other communist and workers parties, including therefore the CCP. The precondition is in fact the quest for cooperation in the struggle for social progress, the peoples' liberation movement and the defense of peace.

Can there be differences, positions and actions on the part of others which we do not understand and which we criticize to the extent of reproval?

There can and there are.

Frankness in relations, the rejection of impossible forms of monolithism, and the assertion that the era of organizational relations and the attribution of a leadership or central role to one party or state is over, are principles for which we have worked and which are, for that matter, formally accepted by all the communist parties represented by the Berlin conference.

We therefore consider this visit to Beijing--which solemnly marks an important event in both parties' policy--a step forward for ourselves and we hope that it will be useful to the workers and revolutionary movement as a whole.

We would like to emphasize strongly that this step is certainly not directed against any other communist and workers party or parties or in any way inimical toward any other socialist country or countries, liberation movement or movements. This means that there has been no concession on our part, that there has been and certainly will be no passive acceptance of other parties' judgments or positions which conflict with the line and stances autonomously defined by our congress and at the meetings of our leadership bodies.

As proof of this, I would like to point out that the Afghan issue--on which we have adopted an unambiguous stance--has prompted meetings and an open comparison of stances, as we felt was our duty.

Comrade Ingrao's visit to the USSR and North Korea; Minucci's to Romania; Chiaromonte's to Algeria; the visit by Bufalini and myself to Yugoslavia; the relations with the Polish, Portuguese, Spanish, French and Belgian communist parties in recent months; and the frequent and numerous contacts with other European political forces, the latest of which--definitely an important example--was the meeting between Brandt and Berlinguer, demonstrate the method and essence of our initiatives.

Moreover, it would be superfluous to point out that we have always spoken as Italian communists wherever we have been, and in this way, as far as we could, we have made an international contribution which has earned us esteem and which we consider a commitment.

This is how we want to proceed, in connection also with this most important initiative, which we consider both necessary and useful not only to the workers movement, as I have already said, but also to the more general cause of peace throughout the world.

PCI THEORIST ATTACKS PARTY'S VOTE IN FOREIGN POLICY DEBATE

[Unattributed report on 13 March speech to PCI Central Committee by Romano Ledda, secretary of the PCI Foreign Policy Studies Center]

[Text] I am not trying to dramatize the polemic more than necessary, Comrade Ledda said, but our lower house vote on Wednesday on the foreign policy motion merits some critical observations. I fully agree with the analysis of the international situation made in the report, the strength with which our autonomous stances are confirmed and the severe verdict on the government's ineptitude and inertia with regard to the present international crisis. Governments, major European political forces and nonalined and so-called Third World countries are actively moving to prevent the two major powers' polemical entrenchment from freezing and aggravating the crisis of detente, with all that that would imply. A positive European role is making headway--very different from the old self-effacement of the cold war--and there has been a wealth of innovations in the diplomatic field in recent weeks.

What about Italy? Though our government holds the EEC chairmanship, Italy is being left out, left behind and carried in tow by the most stubborn positions. We are therefore surprised at the nature of the motion which was approved. Not because the opposition cannot vote with the government forces or because we should abandon even broaden convergences--especially on the problems of war and peace. The point concerns both merit and content. The motion was not equal to the gravity of the crisis and cannot be translated into real political initiatives with this government, which contains, for instance, Longo's superatlanticist Italian Social Democratic Party. So what is the message to the country, as far as the mass movement and mass mobilization are concerned?

I will point to some examples. The motion reveals a clear step backward from the foreign policy guidelines approved by the lower house and Senate in 1977, especially compared to what is happening in Europe. France, Germany and Austria are now in favor of official recognition of the PLO, while the motion does not even mention "Palestinian rights," which is a decisive issue for solving the Mideast crisis in political terms and avoiding a military confrontation. At the meeting with Carter, Chancellor Schmidt urged the approval of SALT II. The motion lacks any reference to the need for negotiations on the rearmament issue or to SALT II. Instead it contains the Carter-style formulation on the "human rights" issue in terms which have been rejected by almost all European governments. Furthermore, there is no mention of the problem of U.S. reprisals against the Soviet intervention in Afghanistan, whereas the struggle against these reprisals is an important point which characterizes several European governments and our own position on how to guarantee the resumption of detente.

All in all, the game was not worth the candle. The Italian Government is being criticized severely for the inaction of the Italian EEC chairman. The motion, however, generically endorses this chairmanship, without supplying any indications regarding what role Italy should play at the coming summit meetings of the EEC and the industrialized countries. [paragraph continues]

This means that the price paid was higher than the value of the results and it was clear that there was something wrong in our own group's preparations for and discussion of the motion.

PERTINI BEGINS CONSULTATIONS ON FORMING NEW GOVERNMENT

[Excerpts] The head of state has started consultations at the Quirinale which will end with the entrusting of the task of forming the new government. Over to Claudio Angelini:

The first moves are under way in the presidential consultations aimed at solving the government crisis. Following the ritual, considerably shortening the list of political personalities to be consulted, Pertini is about to end this first day of meetings. He has already received Saragat and Leone, both former presidents of the republic. He is now receiving Fanfani, president of the Senate, and soon he will receive Iotti, president of the Chamber.

There has only been one statement so far: by Saragat, who called on the political forces to rapidly reach agreement. The former head of state, speaking on behalf of his party, the Social Democratic Party [PSDI], said that the PSDI will not agree to play a bit part in the government. Saragat added that to avoid absurd early elections it is necessary to reach a maximum of agreement among the parties of socialist, lay and liberal democracy to negotiate a government on equal terms with the Christian Democrats. Saragat added that the negotiations should be conducted without prejudice and preclusions. Leone restricted himself to wishing the journalists good work.

As I said, Pertini is now receiving Fanfani, president of the Senate. Tomorrow the consultations will begin for real: It will be the turn of the party delegations. That's all from the Quirinale. Back to the studio.

The head of state's consultations will continue tomorrow. President Pertini will receive the party delegations. The Christian Democrat delegation which will conduct the government negotiations was nominated today by the party leadership.

In an interview on the possible alliances in a new government, Forlani, the Christian Democrat president, said his party should above all look into the possibility of a coalition among relatively homogenous forces, tested by previous collaboration and with more coherent compatibility from the point of view of economic, social and international policy.

BRIEFS

NEW CONFINDUSTRIA PRESIDENT--Rome, March 20 (ANSA)--The Italian industrialists association "Confindustria", has a new president. Vittorio Merloni was elected with 87 votes in favor out of 90 valid ballots. Merloni, 47, is married and the father of four. He has a degree in business and economy. His managerial experience has been with "Merloni Spa" which deals in household appliances. As of last year he has been president of the federation of private industrialists in the Marche regions. He officially succeeds Guido Carli who has been "Confindustria" chief since 1976. The changeover will take place on May 6 during the federation's annual assembly. Catalan Leader Comments

LD211045 Madrid Domestic Service in Spanish 1000 GMT 21 Mar 80 LD

[Text] Jordi Pujol, leader of Convergence and Union who as a result of the elections has effectively become successor to Josep Tarradellas [as president of the Generalitat of Catalonia], has told this radio station that his coalition is open to a dialog with the Socialists but will maintain its attitude against the Communists, as it has said in its election propaganda. Jordi Pujol put down his group's success in the elections to its slogan: "If we work at it we shall come through, but if all we do is protest we shall get nowhere."

NICARAGUAN OFFICIALS ARRIVE FOR TALKS

[Excerpt] Just after midnight two members of the Nicaraguan Government junta arrived in Madrid for talks with Prime Minister Suarez and leaders of leftwing parties today. Our colleague Hector Arenas was at Barajas Airport:

This is the first time that two representatives of the government junta of Nicaragua have come to Spain since the bloody end of the Somoza tyranny. They are Violeta Chamorro and Sergio Ramirez, accompanied by Bayardo Arce, commander of the Sandinist Front. This group will today be received by Prime Minister Suarez, Socialist Party Secretary General Felipe Gonzalez and PCE Secretary General Santiago Carrillo.

GOVERNMENT ANNOUNCES AID PROGRAM FOR ZIMBABWE

[Text] Britain today announced an immediate payment of 7 million pounds sterling to Zimbabwe to help with emergency reconstruction. The government is also pledging "substantial" additional aid over the next two or three years and is to launch an appeal to other nations to provide help for Zimbabwe.

The 7 million pounds sterling announced today represents only a first immediate instalment in a scheme to be discussed in detail with the new government in Salisbury. The government will also give up to 500,000 pounds sterling for rehabilitation, matching money spent by voluntary agencies on a pound-for-pound basis. In addition, Britain is to provide immediate advice and aid in broadcasting and police, civil service and industrial training at the request of the Zimbabwe Government. At the end of the month talks will begin in Salisbury on an aid programme provided by the Common Market.

CARRINGTON VIEWS ALTERNATIVE GAMES, NEUTRAL AFGHANISTAN

LD202314 London ITV Television Network in English 1930 GMT 20 Mar 80 LD

[Interview with British Foreign Secretary Lord Carrington conducted at the Foreign Office by Lew Gardner and carried on the "TV Eye" program--recorded]

[Excerpt] [Question] May I turn now to the Olympic games and the proposals to boycott them because of Russian actions in Afghanistan. Hasn't a terrible botch been made of this whole boycott issue, Lord Carrington? The government has failed to convince the British people apparently; has failed to convince our athletes, the sporting organizations. It has failed to convince our allies in Europe of the wisdom of the boycott. The result surely is confusion and division which can only give succour and strength to Moscow, doesn't it?

[Answer] Well, I don't know whom we failed to convince. I am convinced. I can tell you that I am convinced that we should not go to Moscow and shouldn't take part in the Olympic games, because you've only got to read the propaganda that has been put out by the Soviet Union on the subject of the Olympic games to realize that this is a political activity. There is one particular document which I recollect which says in effect that the very fact that Moscow was chosen for the Olympic games is a vindication of the socialist system, and the acceptance by the rest of the world of the Soviet system. Therefore, those who say you cannot, you must not, mix sport and politics are really whistling in the wind. This is part of the reason why the Soviet Union has got the Olympic games and I think, in the light of what they did in Afghanistan, it would be quite wrong for us to take part in it. Now I accept not everybody agrees to that but I really think if they join... [interviewer interrupts, question indistinct]

[Answer] So it is said in the opinion poll, perhaps the majority don't agree with it. All I am saying is that I think if you sit down and think about it and you think about giving the Soviet Union a political success in the light of what they have done in Afghanistan it would really be reprehensible.

[Question] What I am putting to you, Lord Carrington, is that you give the Soviet Union a greater political success by making a botch of the whole boycott issue.

[Answer] Well, I don't think so.

[Question] You don't think it is?

[Answer] No, I really don't. I mean, I think that there are some difficulties ahead. I mean, for example, I am quite sure the Americans are not going to go to the Olympic games. And if the Americans don't go to the Olympic games they aren't really Olympic games. Anybody who wins a gold medal, and I have very great doubts as to whether quite a number of other countries are going to take part in it. I think it would be a tragedy if we took part in it. So I think it would be quite wrong.

[Question] What do you say, Lord Carrington, directly--I mean I have heard what you have said on the political level, but what do you say directly--to a man like Geoff Capes who has devoted the last 4 years to getting himself to peak fitness for this summer, and who says quite simply he doesn't care what the politicians say, I am going, what do you say to him?

[Answer] Well, I'd say to him what I have said to you. Don't think that I do not understand his position and the fact that he has spent so much of his time getting fit and getting prepared to take part in these games. And the reason, I mean the fact, that we have understood this has been one of the underlying reasons why Douglas Hurd has been going around with other ministers, and meetings in Geneva and so on, trying to find alternative ways in which people can take part in a competitive sport. And there is a possibility, I say no more than that, that some kind of games could be organized after whatever happens in Moscow, in which people could take part with the Americans.

[Question] Lord Carrington, there were 12 nations at that meeting in Geneva, not all of them prepared to take part in anything that was proposed. Far from being an outstanding success.... [Carrington interrupts]

[Answer] Maybe it won't happen but it is worth trying. And I don't think the 12 nations there are by any means the only nations who would join in.

[Question] If you wreck the games, however, and you get your boycott and you wreck the Olympic movement in the process, will it all have been worthwhile?

[Answer] I don't think anybody wants to wreck the Olympic movement nor do I think it necessary to wreck the Olympic movement. But I do think that you have to look a little bit further than this and you have to realize that what we are talking about is, in essence, the security of the West, and the security of the world. For the very first time since 1945, the Soviet Union has acted outside the Warsaw Pact area in taking over a neutral country. And if you really think that one can just sit down and do nothing about it, and can just accept it as a fait accompli and take the Olympic movement as being more important than the future of your children and my children and the people in the West, than I think you are gravely mistaken.

[Question] Lord Carrington, may we look now at some of the other diplomatic things that have been proposed about Afghanistan, about your own proposals for neutralizing Afghanistan? I saw them described at the weekend by an official of the UN Security Council as well meant but unlikely to be helpful. Do you see a future for your proposals?

[Answer] I don't, in point of fact, think that that's what the State Department thinks about it at all.

[Question] Security Council I said. I think there is a division between the two.

[Answer] Or what the Security Council thinks about it, because I have a slightly different network on which I get my information.

[Question] I think it is a hotter line than I have.

[Answer] I think it is a bit. That is not what they think at all. What I do think it is, but one does not want to underestimate the difficulties of achieving it. I think there are all sorts of problems in the way. But nobody has had a better idea, nobody has had a better way of seeking to make the Russians withdraw from Afghanistan. You see it does have very considerable advantages. The Soviet Union say they went into Afghanistan because there was outside interference in Afghanistan, because they were worried about their border. Well, if you have a neutral Afghanistan guaranteed by the big powers and by the powers in the area, you have removed the two reasons why the Soviet Union went in. So there is no reason why they should not get out. Now, I would have thought that this could be accepted by the USSR and would certainly be welcome by the countries of the region and would be seen by most people to be acceptable and fair. Now, I accept that it is going to be very difficult to get this done but it does seem to me that the Third World and the nonalined countries would welcome it, and for that reason might very well put pressure on the Soviet Union themselves.

[Question] Would this neutral Afghanistan have the same government it's got now? Would it be Marxist, the same Marxist government? And can that Marxist government survive without Soviet troops? And if they're withdrawn won't there be an immensely unstable Afghanistan, perhaps even a worse situation than you've got with them there?

[Answer] Well, they have tried to be neutral, you know, and nonalined over the last 150 years. We had three Afghan wars and found they were very tough people. And then there was a sort of unwritten agreement between Russia and British India that Afghanistan should be allowed to be neutral. I would have thought what would happen, and what must happen, is that the Afghans should be allowed to choose what government they want, and since it's always been in the last 150 years--it was always thought in the 150 years to be neutral, I would have thought that the outcome, if they were left to themselves would be an Afghan wish for neutrality. And this is the way I think one should approach it.

[Question] Hasn't one of the unfortunate byproducts of this whole Afghanistan situation been the showing up of differences that exist between the American approach to foreign policy and the Russians, and Europe's approach--the French and the Germans I have in mind particularly. I fancy they suspect, apparently more than our government does, that a lot of President Carter's actions are heavily influenced by the fact that this is election year in America.

[Answer] No, I genuinely don't think that is true. I think what happened was this: That there was no difference between the analysis of what happened in Afghanistan between the French and the Germans, ourselves and the Americans. I think we all of us had the same analysis. I think what was different was that the actions which various countries were prepared to take against the Soviet Union were rather different and that not everybody was agreed that everybody should do the same thing. Now I think, in a way, that is quite understandable because, particularly in Europe, each country has its own different problems. The Germans, for example, have East Germany and East Berlin, and they have the ostpolitik; the French have always said that they have a different policy vis-a-vis the Soviet Union, a more independent policy than the rest of NATO. We don't have the same contacts with the Soviet Union. So I think each of us was, perhaps, prepared to take action against the Soviet Union in the light of our own particular circumstances. But there was no quarrel about the assessment of the situation and I think that is what was important.

PRC EMBASSY DENIES REPORTED ARMS SUPPLIES TO DENKTAS

NC210819 Nicosia THE CYPRUS WEEKLY in English 21-27 Mar 80 p 1 NC

[Text] The Chinese Embassy in Nicosia yesterday denounced as "sheer groundless slander" a report in the afternoon paper APOYEVMATINI which claimed that Beijing has supplied 10-million dollars worth of arms to the Turkish Cypriot administration in the north.

A spokesman for the embassy told the Cyprus weekly: "We have seen the report and there is no truth in it whatsoever. It is total, sheer, groundless slander directed against China, and the purpose is to undermine the existing friendly relations between our countries".

Relations between Nicosia and Beijing were "as good as ever, he said, and added: "there is no change in our views which are known to everybody".

Commenting on the APOYEVMATINI report, the official government spokesman said: "The Cyprus Government is not aware of anything of the sort".

In a front-page lead story, APOYEVMATINI had the headline: "Dirty Trick." On the basis of an agreement between Ankara and Beijing, Chinese arms worth 10 million dollars for Denktas were delivered at Famagusta Harbour, according to the story.

It said: "Negotiations between Ankara and Beijing, as well as military agreements within the framework of counteracting Soviet hegemony, also concern Greece as Chinese offers for the military reinforcement of Turkey now turn against the interests of Greece. These developments are a result of the recent events in Afghanistan and are known to NATO circles which favour assistance to Turkey".

APOYEVMATINI claimed that a "secret agreement" signed last November, also provides for the "special reinforcement of Turkish Cypriot forces."

GOVERNMENT INVESTIGATES REPORTS ON PRC ARMS TO TURKS

ROLANDHIS STRESSES TURKISH 'INFLEXIBILITY' IN TALKS

NC202206 Nicosia Domestic Service in Greek 2000 GMT 20 Mar 80 NC

[Text] Speaking this evening at a Rotary Club meeting in Limassol, Foreign Minister Rolandhis stressed that despite the difficulties, an attempt should be made to solve the Cyprus problem through the intercommunal talks, based on our immutable agreed goals for a sovereign, independent, territorially integral, nonalined, bicommunal and biregional federated state. However, we must understand, the minister stressed, that the military supremacy of the other side is to be interpreted as a political inflexibility which sometimes borders on fanaticism.

The minister said: Turkey is a difficult and tactless negotiator. The political weakness of each of its governments, the anarchy and economic chaos make it more hesitant to make serious political decisions.

Mr Rolandhis added that he agrees with those who shout that the Cyprus problem should be resolved soon. He said: In order to resolve the problem we must reach a conclusion with the other side; we cannot resolve it by ourselves. The foreign minister did not rule out help from other states if the talks are kept within the UN framework. On the contrary, he said, sometimes we must pursue such help.

Mr Rolandhis then said that if this time also the Turkish leader, Mr Denktas, continues to talk about bayonets and partition and the UN secretary general's efforts fail, then the whole situation must be reevaluated by the National Council.

The leaders of the parties, he stressed, have the duty to present their positions to the president and the government responsibly, clearly and frankly. He also said that the views of the Greek Government must be heard and evaluated jointly because, he stressed, Greece constitutes for us a strength and a political support.

The minister pointed out that the national dangers are great if Turkey means and acts on what it says. He stressed that instead of slogans, political words and empty rhetoric, it is better and more advisable to express party positions to the government and to cooperate quietly in the struggle to save this country. He stressed: This struggle needs, on the one hand, pragmatism and realism, and, on the other, knowledge of the values of life and our responsibilities to history.

The foreign minister said that a military solution of the Cyprus problem must be excluded be cause such an effort would lead to the complete destruction of Cyprus.

Mr Rolandhis reiterated the positions of the government regarding the Western plan and analysed the main elements and events that influence the Cyprus problem.

ISTANBUL PAPER INTERVIEWS GREEK CYPRIOT OPPOSITION LEADER

NC210925 Istanbul AYDINLIK in Turkish 19 Mar 80 pp 1, 5 NC

Interview granted by Mr Glavkos Kliridhis, main Greek Cypriot opposition party leader, to AYDINLIK correspondent Erodgan Ozbalikci--date not given]

[Excerpts] Question: The latest developments have increased the importance of Turkey and Greece, the West wants stability in the area. Can there be any development in the Cyprus issue?

Answer: The United States wished to resolve both the Aegean and the Cyprus disputes. It wishes to bring Turkey and Greece closer together and to strengthen the southeast flank of NATO. It is trying to find a settlement which will be acceptable to both sides. Otherwise it will have to face the danger of losing either Greece or Turkey. A settlement in Cyprus can be possible only when both the Turkish and Greek sides accept a compromise solution and get together.

There was no framework during the 1974-1977 period. Makarios and Denktas agreed on four principles in 1977. They created a framework within which they could sit and talk to come to an understanding. There would be two separate regions: a Turkish Cypriot region and a Greek Cypriot region. Each side would rule itself. We had suggested to cede 20 percent of the land to the Turkish Cypriots. The Turkish Cypriots claimed 33 percent.

Question: How do you evaluate the 10-point agreement reached between Denktas and Kiprianou in 1979?

Answer: Instead of elaborating on the four guidelines, that is, trying to determine the ratio of participation of the two communities in the government and the ratio of land to be ceded to each side, they created a general framework and new principles.

Question: What do you think should be done to find a solution?

Answer: First of all, both sides should clearly specify what they accept and what they reject. Both sides should refrain from advancing preconditions. Everything should be discussed at the conference table. Both sides should sit at the conference table and put forward their proposals, and they should try to reach a compromise on matters on which they disagree.

Question: There is an important point here. Why don't both sides sit at the conference table and try to reach a compromise solution?

Answer: They make statements and counterstatements. They talk too much. As the leaders of both sides know that they will not be able to agree on the concessions they should make, they keep reiterating what they will not accept.

Question: As far as we have been able to establish, the opposition parties on both sides are strongly in favor of a compromise agreement. This is an interesting development and an advantage toward the realization of a settlement. Isn't it?

Answer: The Democratic Union Party wants the negotiations to result in an understanding. Also AKEL, which supports the present government wants a similar settlement. So responsibility rests on the shoulders of those in power in each community. They too say they want a positive outcome from the negotiations, but they are too slow in their efforts in this direction. They are not courageous enough. They are the slaves of speeches and statements they have made earlier.

Question: What should be done in order to secure progress?

Answer: The leaders should be changed...

O AGON ACCUSES TURKS OF ATTEMPTING TO CAUSE UPHEAVAL

NC190815 Nicosia O AGON in Greek 19 Mar 80 p 1 NC

[Text] According to authoritative reports, the Turks have tried during recent days to cause a climate of upheaval in the free areas in order to prevent the UN consultations and efforts for the resumption of the intercommunal talks. According to our reports, the security authorities of the republic are in possession of evidence showing that the telephone call to a newspaper after the blowing up of the automobile belonging to Mr Iraklis Dhimosthenous, Democratic Party deputy and district secretary of the Pan-Agrarian Union of Cyprus, had come from Turkish agents who aimed at creating problems for the Cyprus Government.

The EOKA [National Organization of Cypriot Fighters] organization which, according to the caller, took responsibility for the blowing up of Mr Dhimosthenous' automobile, is the creation of the Turkish Cypriot secret services, which have tried at various times to describe this organization as the creation of Greek Cypriots.

According to reports of the competent services, after the Turkish invasion the Turkish secret services had tried many times during the consultations for the resumption of the intercommunal talks to create a climate of upheaval within the Greek Cypriot community in order to foil the talks. They have again tried to create a similar situation now but have failed because the authorities of the republic know every detail of their mode of action and thus they manage to neutralize their vile designs.

DEADLINE FOR NATO DECISION REPORTEDLY END OF MARCH

[Text] Within 10 days the latest and specifically by 31 March it is likely that very important developments will take place in the relations between Greece and NATO, which will also involve final Greek decisions on the return or final withdrawal of our country from the military wing of the Atlantic alliance.

The end of March deadline, which has been set for the final--positive or negative--solution of the issue, as reported by I KATHIMERINI was revealed by NATO sources and fully explains the haste with which the leadership of the alliance is presently seeking solutions and formulas. The arrangements being sought are aimed at turning the Greek Government away from actions which could conform the determination it has shown to date.

Foreign diplomatic observers stressed that a possible NATO initiative depends upon the result of consultations between General Rogers and NATO Secretary General Luns, who was briefed by the supreme allied commander on contacts he had in the United States, with the U.S. administrations. It is, therefore, considered likely that the Rogers-Luns consultations may result in some new plan. Naturally this must not fall within the framework of plans already rejected, since Greek positions toward such plans, already submitted under Turkish dictates or approval, are already well known.

The same observers added that a Greek initiative by 31 March will appear only if a new NATO initiative is submitted within this period. In such an eventuality the immovable Greek adherence to what was agreed upon between Generals Haig and Davos is already well known. It is likely that this agreement could be subjected to certain phraseological changes by the Greek side.

It was stressed that there would be one-sided action by the Greek side only in the eventuality that a positive action came from NATO, satisfying Greek positions by the date already set for a settlement of the issue. At the same time the Greek Government appears determined to put an end to the current uncertainty, particularly after the repeated negotiations and talks, which were unsuccessful, either due to NATO positions or to Turkish interventions.

It is not considered necessary to settle relations between Greece and the Atlantic alliance before expected political developments, which will take place after Easter.

If conditions lead the Greek Government to establish a new status in relations with NATO, our country will have two options: The French or the Norwegian model.

The French model seems to be the most probable. The difference between these two forms of relations with NATO--apart from the fact that France is out of the military wing while Norway is within it--is this:

In times of peace the armed forces of both countries are under a national command. In case of a general alert, however, Norwegian forces come under NATO's military command while with France it is determined by the French Government and approved by the president of the republic if and which forces will cooperate under allied command. At the same time and in reference to its cooperation with the Atlantic alliance, France has signed numerous, local bilateral agreements with the Atlantic alliance.

Government Denial

[Text] Referring to the I KATHIMERINI report yesterday about the existence of a 31 March deadline for a solution of the NATO issue, government sources stated that this was inaccurate. The same circles stated that no deadline has been set on the NATO issue on which the Greek Government's position, they stressed, is well known.

DHROSOS VIEWS REASONS FOR NATO REINTEGRATION

[The "Political Issues" column by Yeoryios Dhrosos" "The Return to NATO"]

[Text] We have explained that the reasons for which we rejected the Rogers proposals are primarily due to a distrust of the Turks. One ought to add that we believe that proposed arrangements endanger certain of our acquired if not our sovereign rights. This is because these arrangements have to do with areas beyond the 6-mile limit. At the same time, however, these proposals do not provide satisfactory solutions to the question of limits for Aegean operational control.

The reasons for which we seek our return to NATO's military wing are numerous and related. The first one that comes into mind is that Turkey, as a member, will of necessity be strengthened more than we. It will not only have more potential for influencing the military situation in our area but it will also be able to promote its well known aspirations at our expense.

Even if we continued our political ties with NATO, our contact with defensive planning, military activities and the general military orientation of the West will be weakened. If we remain outside NATO's military wing we would unavoidably fall behind in the modernization of a series of sectors which are vital to our defense, such as modern technological equipment, telecommunications and so forth.

At the same time, participation within the military wing of the alliance involves construction and maintenance, with NATO financing, of basic military projects that are valuable to our own defense. The cost of these projects is many times greater than the Greek contribution.

By contrast, in case of a clash Aegean air and sea space will inevitably come under Turkish responsibility since Turkey would be a member of the alliance and would, naturally, share in the defense of the alliance while we would not.

We, like the rest of the world, recognize that the situation in the Middle East is daily becoming more critical. There are also certain indications that soon it will also be dangerous in the Balkan area. The absence of Greece, which creates a gap between Italy and Turkey, hinders the task of the Western alliance and, naturally, this is not in our interests. A characteristic proof of this is to be found in the great interest of the Eastern bloc in our consideration of not returning to NATO'a military wing.

There is also another considerable reason. As it is well known there is much discussion and questioning of NATO's obligations in case of an attack against Greece from the north. Naturally this event is unthinkable today. Our relations with our northern neighbors are excellent. Things, however, could certainly change. The situation in the Balkans could change and it is likely that many different types of influence could prevail.

As we have said, there is a certain fluidity and a certain uncertainty in reference to the obligations of the alliance to intervene as an allied entity if an attack is threatened against Greece. Our return to NATO's military wing certainly creates an additional complex of ties with the Western alliance. Through our presence in joint allied headquarters, in joint planning of operations and so forth these ties certainly strengthen the prospects of the alliance as a whole becoming involved in case of a threat of attack against Greece from the north. Consequently the defense of our country is covered more efficiently since the prospects of involving the entire alliance also increase.

No matter how we view things our reintegration under current conditions and possible prospects is most natural. We belong to NATO's political sector, we are part of the Common Market, we have many joint interests with the West, a common political-economic system and so forth. This is what has been repeatedly stated, as, "we belong to the West." This, however, becomes an indefinite statement, a wish, if we do not also belong to the defense of the West. Most certainly our return would have taken place a long time ago if it were not for the Turkish attempt to exploit the situation, in other words the attempt to deprive us of certain acquired rights if we are not to say anything about the threats appearing on the horizon which are directed even against our sovereign rights.

DEFENSE MINISTRY CONFIRMS TURKISH VIOLATION OF AIRSPACE

[Text] Yesterday's statement by the Ministry of National Defense confirmed I KATHIMERINI reports on violation--in the form of a "probing operation"--of Greek airspace last week by approximately 60 Turkish military aircraft. These aircraft were involved in exercises in the international area of the east Aegean, entry into which requires submitting a flight plan and Greek approval. The National Defense Ministry statement specifically stated that the Turkish aircraft entered, during exercises, the Athens FIR controlled area without first submitting the required flight plans.

The full text of the National Defense Ministry statement is as follows: "On 13 March there was a medium-scale Turkish naval and air exercise within the Turkish territorial area and a portion of the international area of the Aegean of which a preliminary announcement was made.

"During the exercise Turkish aircraft entered the Athens FIR without submitting the required flight plan in advance. The Turkish Air Force limited itself to reporting the overflights by its aircraft on general lines to the headquarters of the tactical air force. This method of reporting was rejected because it replaced regulations on air traffic which are now in force. The Greek side took all necessary measures for identification and close surveillance of the Turkish air activity, and the required legal steps were taken through diplomatic channels."

It is recalled that yesterday I KATHIMERINI reported that our military air force immediately reacted to the Turkish action, which is connected to the "arrangement" incorporated into the Rogers plan, which was rejected by the Greek Government. Greek military aircraft approached those Turkish aircraft that had penetrated to a depth of one or two miles inside Greek airspace and "escorted" them until they returned to the Turkish boundary.

It was concluded that "through this action the Turks were believed to be probing the reactions of the Greek side, specifically attempting to silently circumvent provision obliging them to submit a flight plan. If this had succeeded it would have meant an "a contrario" Greek acceptance of the counterpoint in the Rogers plan and it would have created a precedent supporting relevant Turkish demands.

FOREIGN MINISTRY DENIES EXISTENCE OF NATO BASE ON LEMNOS

[Text] Ankara, 20 Mar (AA)--The Foreign Ministry denied a report appearing in the Istanbul Daily HURRIYET Wednesday under the headline "The NATO Base on Lemnos Is Contrary to the Lausanne Treaty". A Foreign Ministry clarification noted there is no NATO base on the Aegean island of Lemnos.

It confirmed that Turkey had opposed a proposal to have a radar base set up on Lemnos under the NATO infrastructure program, noting that the Lausanne Treaty of 1923 had demilitarized the Aegean Islands.

It was later observed, however, that Greece has set up a radar base on the island "with its own resources". Supreme commander of the allied forces in Europe General Rogers had proposed including this radar installation within NATO's integrated system in order to meet air defense needs of the alliance, but Turkey had refused the proposal, the Foreign Ministry said.

FOREIGN MINISTRY DENIES VIOLATION OF GREEK AIRSPACE

[Text] It has been announced that Greek allegations that the Greek airspace was violated during the Sea Wolf exercise carried out by the Turkish Armed Forces in the Aegean Sea are without foundation. The Foreign Ministry Information Directorate General has issued a statement in connection with various allegations in the Greek press. The statement notes that the allegations in question stem from the one-sided attitude of Greece contrary to the rules and regulations of the International Civil Aviation Association.

The statement adds that Turkish Air Force planes carried out their exercise in the international airspace of the Aegean and that in accordance with the rules and regulations of the International Civil Aviation Association there is no need to give advance information on flights in this region. Noting that Turkish planes did not violate the Greek airspace, the statement adds that reports that various Turkish planes were sent back by Greek planes are also without foundation.

DEMIREL SAYS WEST TO EXTEND $250 MILLION LOAN TO COUNTRY

[Text] Prime Minister Suleyman Demirel said that a bridging loan of $250 million has been secured from Western countries. Demirel said: Turkey will solve its economic problems. I do not claim that nothing is missing, but we have seen the light.

In a statement before entering the Council of Ministers meeting, which began at 1700, Demirel said that the cabinet's agenda covered Turkey's problems. Noting that during his meeting with martial law commanders the need to take various administrative decisions in order to enable the martial law commands to fully perform their duties was discussed, Demirel added that the cabinet will discuss this issue as well. Noting that the government was successfully combatting shortages of various goods, Demirel stated that the fuel oil shortage has definitely ended and that the Central Bank now has the funds to function properly. Pointing out that shortages can be eliminated through sufficient production and imports, Demirel added that the government is capable of achieving this end as well as a decrease in prices.

VOTCP SCORES DEFENSE COOPERATION AGREEMENT WITH U.S.

[Text] Prime Minister Suleyman Demirel has announced that the cooperation and defense agreement with the United States, which has already been initialed in Ankara, will soon be signed. Pointing out that no impediment stands in the way of the signing of this agreement, Demirel said that the list of military aid to be supplied by the United States to Turkey has been prepared, and that the agreement should be signed in the near future. However, Demirel has not revealed the contents of the so-called military aid list prepared by the Pentagon, nor has he disclosed the terms of the agreement. He would not dare to do so since the agreement that he portrays as a "cooperation and defense agreement" is in fact nothing but a new slavery agreement.

The objective of this agreement is to more intensely involve our country economically, politically and militarily with U.S. cold war policies and the adventurist plans it is pursuing in our region. To this end, the U.S. aggressive bases on our soil are being provided with a permanent status. Moreover, the terms of this agreement impose the establishment of new U.S. bases on our soil and envisage the supply of the most sophisticated spying devices to those already existing. The agreement stipulates a U.S. aid package of $2.5 billion covering a period of 5 years. A major part of the so-called aid will be used to equip the armed forces of Turkey--which Chancellor Schmidt said were the only reliable agent of the West in the Middle East.

These aggressive bases--which will now be provided with a permanent status in accordance with the slavery agreement--are not only a menace to our independence and sovereignty, but to regional peace and security as well. Even the liberal sectors of the bourgeoisie acknowledge this threat and point out that the bilateral agreement to be signed with the United States is incompatible with our national interests.

In an article published some time ago in the Istanbul daily MILLIYET, Orsen Oymen refers to the C-130 U.S. transport aircraft which crashed near the Incirlik Airbase and which was coming from Pirinclik Base and says that this is a sign that certain initiatives are being taken at that base and adds that the Pirinclik Base is being supplied with equipment that will monitor not only the Soviet Union but the Persian Gulf as well.

U.S. officials are openly stating that they intend to use the bases on our soil for the military actions they might undertaken in the Middle and Near East, which they have declared as a region of national interest. In a statement in the Senate, President Carter himself said that Turkey was considered a U.S. bridgehead in the Middle East and that the bilateral agreement to be signed with Turkey should be assessed from this viewpoint. These statements are an indication that the United States intends to use our country for their adventurist plans any time they want to.

Another term of the agreement says that the United States is authorized to use military intervention in case its interests in Turkey are endangered. This was revealed in a statement to the Senate by life senator Gursoytrak.

The fact that nuclear warheads are being stored in bases on our soil is a matter which cannot be hidden any longer. Some reactionary bourgeois newspapers and dailies like TERCUMAN and MILLIYET have published a detailed map showing the existence of arsenals of nuclear warheads on these U.S. bases.

As stressed by 51 RPP deputies, 20 percent of our population as well as a major part of our material and spiritual existence would be destroyed in a probable nuclear war. The Soviet newspaper PRAVDA also wrote that a nuclear war (?to be precipitated by) U.S. aggressive bases would turn Turkey into a nuclear cemetery, revealing the realities once again.

It is obvious that the new bilateral slavery agreement might turn Turkey into a tool of imperialist threats against its neighbors--a position which is not in any way compatible with our country's national interests. That is why struggling against the signing of the slavery agreement and the aggressive bases has now taken on a new significance.

As pointed out by RPP Deputy from Adana Ismail Hakki Oztorun, a member of the Peace Association, in his address at the National Peace Congress held in Bulgaria, under the present condition, in which imperialist pressures on our country have been intensified, the responsibilities of the peace forces have increased. It will be recalled that in a speech at the National Assembly some time ago, Oztorun pointed out that the peace-loving forces would not keep silent vis-a-vis a foreign policy that does not take into consideration national wishes and aspirations and vis-a-vis concessions to be made to imperialism.

The working class as well as our people want the slavery agreement to be torn up and the bases dismantled. These demands can only be materialized through an active and organized campaign against the imperialist as well as collaborationist and monopolist forces. No, to the bilateral slavery agreements, let the bases be removed.

IMPORT-EXPORT FIGURES--Turkey's trade deficit, which amounted to $2.31 billion in 1978 has reached $2.808 billion in 1979. Turkey's imports totaled $5.069 billion while exports only totaled $2.261 billion. Oil and other raw material imports in 1979 amounted to $3.376 billion. The import of consumer goods amounted to $95.902 million while the import of capital goods was $1.596 billion. The export of agricultural goods in 1979 reached $1.243 billion, while the mineral exports totaled $132.481 million and the export of industrial goods was $785.082 million. Last year agricultural exports decreased by $200 million while the export of minerals and industrial goods increased. [Text] [Ankara Domestic Service in Turkish 0430 GMT 16 Mar 80 TA]

CLANDESTINE ORGANIZATIONS UNCOVERED--Adana, Kahramanmaras, Gaziantep, Adiyman and Hatay Martial Law Command has issued a statement on various investigations, searches and operations conducted by security forces during the past month. Security forces uncovered 21 clandestine organizations and 126 persons were detained in connection with these organizations. Another 482 persons were also caught and detained for various crimes. [Ankara Domestic Service in Turkish 1600 GMT 17 Mar 80 TA]

SECURITY OPERATIONS--The Ankara security director has announced that 1,247 persons were detained in connection with the 954 incidents which occurred in Ankara in the past 15 days. Work is also underway to apprehend another 144 persons, who are believed to be involved in these incidents. Security forces also seized 91 pistols, 448 rounds of ammunition, 137 magazines, 7 explosive devices, 2.174 kilos of hashish and numerous banned publications during searches conducted in Ankara. SPANISH MINISTERS COMMENT ON EEC MEMBERSHIP, NATO

[Ole Stephensen report: "Foreign Ministers Discuss EEC and NATO"]

[Excerpts] Spain is in line with a number of the major West European countries when it comes to an expansion of cooperation within the EEC. Spain hopes to be admitted to the EEC as a full member in 1983, and Spanish Foreign Minister Marcelino Oreja told AKTUELT that EEC cooperation ought to be expanded.

"Cooperation ought not to be limited to purely economic matters. West Europe needs to follow a more active and concerted foreign policy. Not only the EEC but the whole of West Europe," the foreign minister said.

Meanwhile Marcelino Oreja is more cautious in his statements on NATO. In 1981 the defense agreement between the United States and Spain expires. "I do not think that 'defense agreement' is the correct term. It is rather a sort of friendship and cooperation agreement, the foreign minister said.

Despite the foreign minister's choice of words the agreement is in the nature of a defense agreement. As part of the agreement the United States has two military bases in Spain.

Marcelino Oreja is taking part in the official visit of the king and queen of Spain to Denmark, which starts today, and he will have talks with Danish Foreign Minister Kjeld Olesen.

Spain wants speedy admission to EEC membership. This means that Spain has proposed one scheme for admission. It is a procedure similar to that used when Denmark joined the EEC in 1972. On the other hand the EEC has at present proposed two schemes: A long transition period for agriculture and a short transition period for industry. The reason why the EEC has proposed the long transition period for agriculture is to be found in the important fact of the competition which exists between Spain on the one hand and France and Italy, both EEC members, on the other.

Spanish Minister for European Affairs Calvo Sotelo told AKTUELT that a solution to this problem is expected in the near future. "And we expect that it will take the form of a long transition period for both agriculture and industry," Calvo Sotelo said.

FOREIGN MINISTRY DENIES SUPPORT FOR OLYMPIC BOYCOTT

LD210906 Lisbon Domestic Service in Portuguese 0800 GMT 21 Mar 80 LD

[Text] A Foreign Ministry spokesman in Lisbon today denied Strasbourg-datelined press reports that Portugal has come out in favor of a boycott of the Moscow Olympic games at the West European sports ministerial meeting, together with the Netherlands and United Kingdom. The spokesman dismissed the reports as totally false since the competent authorities in Portugal have not yet made any decision in the matter.

STRAUSS PRESENTS OPPOSITION VIEW OF STATE OF NATION

[Text] Mr President, esteemed ladies and gentlemen, the chancellor has offered a report on the state of the nation, the contents of which were known to us for the most part because it repeats the well-known facts and the well-known arguments--and the chancellor is perfectly entitled to do that. His report, however, above all stands out because of what it has not said. [applause]

For anyone who has watched development in the government party, the SPD, during the past few months and weeks, and if we compare these debates--which took place within the Federal Republic and even extended to the United States--with the text that Helmut Schmidt presented today, then this was less a report on the state of the nation than an attempt to present a report on a situation in the SPD which does not exist at all. [applause] It was a sort of internal pacification action.

In this connection, it was inevitable that the new Ostpolitik would find appreciation. For reasons of time but also because of past history which is well known--for the benefit of those who are prepared to acknowledge history and past history at all--there would be little sense in waging anew here the discussion which took place from 1969 up to the late seventies, with special emphasis on the first half of the seventies. But to avoid keeping some key issues hidden from the awareness of the present and the memory of the next generation, it is necessary to state some of these key points here.

First there is the fact that with the unilateral action from the fall of 1969 on, the cohesion of the democratic parties of this house unfortunately was abandoned deliberately, carelessly and with dangerous consequences. [applause] After all, nobody will deny that the Karlsbad decision of the parties of the Warsaw Pact, of the Warsaw Pact communist parties, of Budapest of 1967, the Budapest decision of 1969, and the secret negotiations which the coalition partner SPD conducted with the Italian Communist Party on a new, radically different Ostpolitik, were godfathers at the cradle of this policy. [applause]

From this rostrum I have stressed several times already that no political party can claim for itself that it can bring about the reunification of our divided country at this time through its special political recipes or by means of a particularly ingenious plan. Innumerable times we have stressed here that as far as we are concerned, neither capitulation nor war can be given even a remote thought as a means for solving the German problem; neither capitulation nor the use of military means.

Yet I do not want to leave any doubt here--and I think I have reason to do so--that for us freedom has the incontestable priority over unity. [applause]

Perhaps wrong times of voice, perhaps thoughtless phrases are interpreted in an exaggerated way; this is inevitable in political life. But in this house in the forties, in late 1949, in the fifties, sixties and seventies, we never left any doubt about the fact that as painful as our state partition might be to us, this pain must never be overcome by the possibility, say, that we might adopt the system of injustice, which has been forced on the other part of the German people, over the detour of an extended period of neutralization. [applause]

The chancellor--unfortunately, I received the text of his speech only 50 minutes prior to the time it was given, and therefore it is often rather difficult to refer to contentions or quotations whose verification would then require several hours--has said, and presumably I quote him correctly, that, as a result of this Ostpolitik the isolation of the other German state and the other Germans in the GDR being cut off as a consequence of that isolation has been eliminated. Why, then, did you talk in the United States about 16 million hostages who justify different German interests which consequently might lead to different modes of behavior between the United States and Germany? [applause]

Naturally we know what the situation of these, I assume, still 17 million Germans in the other part of Germany is. All of us on all sides of this house are aware of it. Yet it is a dangerous way of putting it if one, for tactical reasons or for reasons of opportunistic tactics purused in the United States, speaks of 16 million hostages. I will speak here of 16 million plaintiffs, 16 million plaintiffs against a system of injustice and not of 16 million hostages. [applause]

It is still so, and hopefully it will always remain that way, that justice is on our side, the right to the national self-determination of a nation, the right of its people to live in a liberally organized state of justice. And the fact that 17 million Germans are deprived of this right makes the German problem an indictment against the system of injustice of communism and its hegemony. [applause]

You mentioned individual treaties, you mentioned in particular the Basic Treaty. You emphasized that the Federal Constitutional Court has ruled that it is compatible with the Basic Law. You are aware of past history. You know perfectly well what lawsuit argumentation the federal government employed thus accentuating the question concerning the proportionality of justice, on the one hand, and the announced, or threatened political consequences, on the other.

There was the court argument, for example, that in case of incompatibility the Federal Republic would run the risk that the GDR might then be the only [German] UN member--a wrong argument, by the way, but it has been used along with other arguments. For that reason a decision was reached, but jusitifcation for it can be tied in with the decree or considered part of it only with great intellectual flexibility and on the basis of extremely tolerant standards.

It has therefore been pointed out in justification that the German Reich juridically continues to exist and that the Federal Republic of Germany is the legal successor of the German Reich. Let me also say this: I am not a utopian and not a dreamer who believes that historical events caused by the force of World War II and the following exploitation of the military situation by a big power can be eliminated by a legal position. I never followed that dream. But legal positions are effective arms, and once the transitional agreements are replaced by a peace agreement they must be particularly stressed. [applause]

The justification also mentions the fact that there are borders within Germany but that these borders do not have a basically different legal quality. But if the border between say Bavaria and Baden-Wuerttemberg, on the one hand, and the border between Bavaria and Saxony, on the other, have a comparable legal quality, then this highlights the shattering difference between constitutional right and political reality--if one thinks of conditions on these two borders.

There was also talk of citizenship. The federal chancellor expressly pointed out the one state citizenship of all Germans, the one right to state citizenship they have. He pointed out a special paper where the citizenship problem has been ruled out. But that does not hinder the other treaty partner from demanding as before the introduction of two citizenship rights. And there are some people in your ranks, Mr Federal Chancellor, who have adopted that demand and who represent it, whether they are holding mandates or whether they are members of the executive.

Not very much was said about the commitment to strive for reunification. The basic law speaks of the completion of unity. That would mean that we have advanced far on the way to unification and that this process need only be concluded and completed. May I point out to you that the basic law was created in a situation in which the fathers of the basic law, for good reason, started out from the assumption of German unity at that time in full agreement with the three Western allies. It seemed at that time, therefore, that something only needed to be completed, something that had been upset temporarily.

Your policy of the past 10 years has contributed considerably to the fact that despite the successes we have recognized, and the results we have recognized such as visits by pensioners, telephone and economic connections, legally and politically we are far today from the situation of 1949. [applause]

He who witnessed these discussions in the parliamentary council and later in this high house in 1949 will remember that very well if he has not lost his memory.

You say that human rights in the GDR--a regrettable situation--have not yet been fully established. It must be regretted, you said, that much work must still be done in this respect and that much must be carried out.

May I point out that what you have described here in bright colors as the results of the new Ostpolitik is actually the minimum that should be natural between civilized nations and cultivated states. [applause] Why did not you say that in contrast to the then-voiced expectations and even announcements--the shooting order and everything connected with it--have not even been limited or mitigated but even intensified and perfected. That is also a German reality. [applause] And in the course of your speech colleague Barzel was heckling, saying that both German states have committed themselves to contribute to the peaceful coexistence of the nations.

But the fraternal help-- I hope I speak in a tone of understandable irony this time--which is being rendered by Honecker's army in Africa and its victims--thousands of people, women and children have died and if I just think of the terrible conditions in Ethiopia and in other countries--does that fit into the beautiful picture of having more and more things in common, more and more perfect relations and of the fulfullment of the mission? I think that if one goes by the standards of sound commonsense, this is certainly not so. [applause]

You have given a meaning to the opening of the German problem which for your political tactics--of strategy I cannot speak here because strategy presupposes higher standards of judgment--but you have given a meaning to the term keeping the German problem open which cannot be the focal point and which never was. This is namely that the common language we have--thank God, and we will keep it--that the common culture, intensified meetings of people and everything that is connected with it, relations in the fields of science, art and sports, that this keeps the German problem open. I do not contest that, but keeping the German problem open meant something completely different: the clear political announcement that we will never accept the division of Germany and that we will pursue with all the peaceful, legitimate means of our policy the reunification of both parts and thus the merger of our people. [applause]

Mr Federal Chancellor, if your criteria were a fact, we would be considerably closer to reunification with Austria than with the other part of Germany. [shouts] All these things exist there: The common language, culture, architecture, there is enough of that. Once one has crossed the border there are no problems. If one does it without a passport it costs Dm5, while elsewhere it costs one's life. That is the small difference, the little problem. [shouts, appaluse]

You have mentioned the achievements of the GDR in touching words. This is what I have previously described as the minimum of what seems natural. You should have said something more about the achievements of the Federal Republic of Germany for the economy of the GDR. And you should have assessed the achievements; the result would have been that we are making far greater services through a number of transfer payments and trade privileges, resulting from the GDR's silent membership in the European Community, considerably higher services than we roughly receive in return through return services. [applause]

You quoted from one of my speeches back in 1962--I may perhaps refresh your historical memory: Though I am not keen on titles, it was not only the CSU chairman but also the federal defense minister who spoke at the time--in which I mentioned that we would more easily overcome international isolation with the help of France--and that, after all, was the France of De Gaulle. I have not the least reason to feel that the statement made at the time under the circumstances then prevalent is wrong now. In 1962 I advocated the view--and with regard to that time I could contribute quite a bit toward contemporary history but the time is too short here and now--that to us the rapprochement with the East through De Gaulle, through the France also of De Gaulle, could be more easily managed than through bilateral attempts at rapprochement.

If you say to the merriment of your friends that I harbored skepticism about a bilateral U.S.-German alliance, then I say I did have that, of course, and I continue to have it today as well, but not against a U.S.-German alliance but, as you quoted me quite correctly, against a bilateral U.S.-German alliance. This is not in keeping with the architecture of NATO, this is at odds with the concepts. [applause] After all, it is not for nothing that the geographic belt of NATO--leaving aside now what the definition is of the geographic security interests today--consists, apart from the United States as the main power, of another great American state, Canada, and then extends clear across Western Europe and Central Europe, omitting some neutral states such as Finland, Austria and Switzerland, down to the region of Greece and Turkey, a part which unfortunately is no longer in order. That it is no longer in order is not attributable to the mistakes of German policy, I can state here expressly.

I never did think much of a bilateral German-U.S. alliance. But I do not make a secret of my view that a bilateral U.S.-German alliance would still be more preferable to me than none at all. But that is not the purpose of our alliance policy. It is the purpose of our alliance policy (?to have) Norway and Denmark, Holland, Belgium, Luxembourg, Great Britain and France--even with its special position in the military organization--and Portugal, and there is also talk about the admission of Spain to this alliance. I would welcome it if democratic Spain were admitted to this alliance. [applause]

May I now be allowed, Mr Chancellor, to say something about the inter-German situation. A while ago I wrote a detailed letter to you, and if I remember correctly you briefly referred to it at the conference of the minister-presidents. I wrote to you with a view to then meeting with Honecker, which you had announced at the Berlin SPD Congress, a meeting which we might say has become subject to a certain delay due to unilateral action.

I wrote to you--and I will refrain from quoting this lengthy letter here except perhaps only a paragraph from it--that I would like to draw your attention to some problems which, from the viewpoint of the government of the state of Bavaria, urgently require a solution. This is true for all laender governments whose laender have a common line of demarcation, a border, with the other German state. I wrote to you that in 1979 the GDR, repeat, in 1979, carried out the most extensive work in many years on the border-securing installations on its territory along the Bavarian part of the border. At times as many as 1,000 men were busy modernizing the border barriers and security installations.

Across from Bavaria this year 46.5 kilometers of a single metal lattice fence were put up which is suited for the installation of the SM-70 type self-firing installations, even if only 10 kilometers were armed with them this year. I wrote to you that these measures are indicative of the fact that the GDR is making every effort to shut off its population from the Federal Republic of Germany. Also technically, even though under article 1 of the basic treaty and in the preamble to the government protocol dated 29 November 1978 it undertook to develop neighborly relations and promote them for the benefit of the people.

The construction of 46 kilometers of metal lattice fence, the arming of 10 kilometers with these murderous, cruel self-firing installations definitely are not suited for developing neighborly relations. [applause]

Furthermore I wrote to you about impediments in tourist travel, about the problems of freight assistance at the border; in a particularly urgent manner I showed to you the behavior of the GDR in keeping the waters pure, a behavior which derides all commandments of environmental protection and its minimum requirements. You yourself have referred to this problem. And I mentioned a number of other problems. This, Mr Chancellor, is the reality.

You have deemed it necessary to give wrong information to this house, to state a flat untruth. You said--I am taking the version of 0805 this morning--that if Mr Strauss during the past several weeks degrades the fundamental documents of common stance and conformity of view in a dangerous internal crisis, namely our existing joint statements with the French of 5 February, with the Americans of 5 March, with the qualification that they verge on foolishness and even seeks to sweep the latter aside on American soil as a product of the election campaign, then this attempt harms the interests of our state, and so forth. It abuses the statements of the three statesmen participating on these statements.

Why do you have to say what is untrue? After all, you are bound to know the truth. During my last speech I defined my stance on this problem quite specifically; I criticized one sentence in the German-French communique which I will continue to criticize. Besides, we of the opposition are definitely not obligated to line up before you to kiss your ring, to accept your benevolent statements with knees bent, possibly, and to venerate you as the perfection of the ultimate wisdom. [applause]

On the day of this German-French statement as well as during my subsequent visit to Paris I said that I had a positive attitude toward a number of points in this communique. Many press people had asked me about it, and it was impossible to dodge such questions. German-French friendship and cooperation: Who was it at the time that raised the most serious objections against the conclusion of the German-French friendship treaty? Who in this house--just read up on the minutes--said at the time that the France of De Gaulle had become a domestic policy desert? It was colleague Wehner at the time. Who pronounced all sorts of suspicions and insinuations because of the special relationship between Adenauer and De Gaulle?

It goes without saying that I affirmed the NATO avowal, the solidarity with the United States; naturally I endorsed the condemnation of the Russian invasion of Afghanistan. Naturally I supported the request addressed to the Soviet Union that it withdraw its troops. But one sentence in this communique--and you ought to have at least so much intellectual capacity or moral decency as to interpret such things exactly and to read them exactly. [applause]

I said that the following sentence is its correct meaning--I cannot recall it now literally down to the last perfection--namely, that the policy of detente would not withstand another blow similar to Afghanistan. That sentence verges on foolishness. I am sorry that I must repeat it again here. [Shouts, prolonged applause]

The Soviets can read and interpret documents better than people among the ranks of the Bonn officials seem to be able to. This formulation means--and this brings us to the core of the political contrast in this house, in the public and in Europe and the world--that it does not make sense at all to cover up this core here. The fronts must be made quite clear here. I do not want to have a confrontation, but rather intellectual integrity and spiritual clarity in the political fronts and the backgrounds. The formulation means actually: You can stay in Afghanistan if you want to. It will not change the policy of detente. It has been announced that only a subsequent action could curtail the policy of detente. It would have been better to write nothing at all, to have stopped at the request for withdrawal. But the statement: The next time we will be angry, this statement is really the limit. [applause]

The only politically logical and consistent formulation would have been: If the Soviet Union is not prepared to withdraw its troops from Afghanistan in an appropriate time and to reestablish the neutrality, integrity and sovereignty of this country, then the policy of detente cannot be continued the way we have understood it so far. That would have been a logical continuation. [applause]

The core of the contrast which we should not cover up consists of the fact that we say: Afghanistan is the crucial test. Afghanistan has demonstrated that as before the Soviet Union pursues a brutal power policy, that it does not follow international rules--the famous code of conduct--that it is not so interwoven in world economics or world political developments of the civilized world that it would abstain from such actions.

Therefore, we say that the withdrawal from Afghanistan is the crucial test. [applause] But it is not a hint at the next action. Does it mean that if the Soviet Union invades Pakistan, if it takes care of Yugoslavia and Romanian in an especially friendly way that we will start thinking about the state of detente policy? This must be stated frankly. This is what is involved. [applause]

I characterized just this sentence--in the Federal Republic and not on foreign territory, by the way, I repeated it in France because that sentence was pointed out to me--as verging on foolishness, although you have depicted it in order to defame me as if I had also said that regarding the German-American communique. [shouts]

With regard to the German-American communique, I have--and you should at least acknowledge it--[shouts] the talent to produce communiques, the talent to read communiques. The talent to interpret communiques has, after all, increased a bit in the course of more than one human generation of political activity. Many things that are written in the German-American communique find our approval. We are not so enthusiastic over the fact that in this communique you have also overemphasized the difference of interests between the United States and the Federal Republic, emphasized it too much. What is written between the lines of this communique is interesting, and even more interesting is what stands in the background, neither on the lines nor between the lines, and I would like to say a few words about that.

In assessing a communique, one must naturally bear in mind the position and the political interests of those who have produced and published said communique. That is not malicious criticism or complaint; it is natural. President Carter faces a difficult election battle. He has presidential elections this year. He is suffering from the enormous burden of the still unresolved situation of the Tehran hostages, from the dramatically high inflation rate, from developments in Afghanistan and from some absurdities [ungereimtheiten]--I want to express myself most carefully--which took place earlier on both sides of the Atlantic.

It is in the natural interest of President Carter to publish a communique that does not stress the contrasts, but the things in common. Mr Federal Chancellor, I grant you that it is in your interest to publish a communique this year with which your party can live, but a communique which will not leave you wide open. This is why I stated--I have no reason to modify it in some way or to make excuses--that this communique is naturally also a sign that the two who signed the communique are interested in not exposing a flank to their respective political opponents in the coming elections in their respective countries. Had the communique contained everything about German-American relations today, including the psychological side and public opinion, this communique, Mr Federal Chancellor, would certainly not have been useful for you in the coming election campaign.

The American President is not interested at all in stressing the problems in a communique in connection with one of his most important allies, the economically big-power Federal Republic of Germany. The problems that have come up unfortunately stress them most clearly and even bluntly. When I am asked by journalists I cannot suppress my opinion just because you do not like it. But the fact that you do not like my opinion is no justification for falsification here in front of this esteemed house. [applause]

I do not want to have a great quarrel between Schmidt and Strauss, as has been announced in DIE WELT today: The situation is much too serious for that. I prefer to quarrel when I am not in such a serious mood. But you have tried to proke me in the course of recent days. This was written today by a journalist who is not particularly distinguished by restraint with regard to criticism of the CDU/CSU in SUEDDEUTSCHE ZEITUNG.

You have fabricated such foolish stuff, saying that I have hurried to follow you to France, that I have hurried to follow you to the United States. You have expressed pity for me, saying that I have been shining the door handles that contained your fingerprints. I do not know whether you had greasy or oily fingers [laughter]--you said I have been shining the doorhandles which still had your fingerprints on them. That is not the language of a federal chancellor, it is the language of an SPD precinct election fighter. [laughter, prolonged applause]

I would like to use this opportunity to point out to the public that the dates for the visits in France and the United States--by the way, these visits are quite natural things, one need not justify oneself because of them or make excuses or pretend that this is something special. I consider a visit to France an act of European domestic policy, more so than an act of German foreign policy. [applause] I consider a visit to the United States a milestone on a road, in a chain, where many milestones of mutual contacts have been set.

But, Mr Federal Chancellor, the assertion that I quickly squeezed in after you is objectively untrue. My travel schedule was set months before, months before you agreed to visit the United States. [shouts] In doing this you naturally wanted to denigrate me in the eyes of the public, or you wanted me to cancel my visit to the United States, expecting that then most unfriendly commentaries would rightly appear as a consequence of a ridiculous attitude I would then have to take. It is unworthy of you to do something like that. [prolonged applause, shouts]

The excitement of the SPD in connection with these developments is quite a piece of hypocrisy, I would say. [shouts] On 17 March the CDU/CSU read a statement by the faction and party chairman, Dr Helmut Kohl. He very clearly objected to the strict rejection of stationing nuclear medium-range arms in the Federal Republic of Germany, voice by the SPD faction chairman, Herbert Wehner. Today I read again: Wehner--the same course as the chancellor.

Stop this hide-and seek game! Who do you want to fool? [applause] Who do you want to fool? We know exactly under what difficult labor pains the Berlin agreement was achieved: spongy, wishy-washy, blurred, saying nothing, with a double meaning, permitting everything and forbidding everything, and permitting every kind of interpretation.

We know that a big part of your party, even the federal manager, represented the standpoint that one had to bite into the sour apple, so to speak, gulp down the toad, just to encourage the Americans to take part in the disarmament talks, and lead them to support arms control, disarmament or limitation of armament offers. In other words we accepted that decision reluctantly, but otherwise we would not have obtained the Americans' agreement with regard to closing the arms gap.

Ladies and gentlemen, in order to eliminate all doubts in this esteemed house, and the same applies to myself--I am no longer a member of it--we welcome every initiative, really every initiative, aimed at sensible disarmament, effective arms limitation, real arms control. We welcome every, really every, initiative. But we are not prepared, and there one sees the limit, to consider as an end in itself everything contained in the terms disarmament, arms control and limitation of armament. From the Soviet point of view this is part of their strategy through which they want to use their military superiority in the field of disarmament negotiations as well.

We cannot change that, but we must take it up, we must live up to this provocation or challenge. I just want to say very clearly that every statement to the effect that the CDU/CSU is less interested in disarmament, arms limitation, arms control than say the government parties, vitiates the political atmosphere. [applause]

But, colleague Wehner, I want to address you because you still hold an important office in the SPD: If because of the one sentence, the verge of foolishness, said in Germany, if I am charged with violating German interests abroad in connection with the definition and interpretation of the German-American communique--as reported here--it means that all of us have to be train bearers for the federal chancellor. In doing this one must be very quick, because he can turn around so fast that one would not be able to follow his turn. [laughter, applause]

But, Mr Wehner, did you not say recently--the excerpt from the parliamentary-political press service is dated 17 September 1979--in an interview with a Yugoslav paper: The chairman of the SPD Bundestag faction, Herbert Wehner, believes that in the 1980 election year a decision will be made whether the CDU-CSU, headed by Strauss, will succeed in turning back again the 30 years of democratic developments in the Federal Republic. [shouts] Wehner said in an interview with the Yugoslav daily VJESNIK that decisive for this process is the inability of the CDU/CSU opposition to form a constructive opposition in a parliamentary democracy. [applause] Yes, the applause is even more of a shame for you than the statements of Mr Wehner are for himself. [applause] I do not want to comment here on the set-up of democracy in the Federal Republic of Germany in the past 30 years.

Mr Wehner, the fact that we had to build a democracy was due to those who destroyed the Weimar Republic, the Nazis and the communists! [shouts of yes, yes, prolonged applause]

There is no need for me to make an apologetic speech. When Hitler came to power I was 17 years old and I could tell many things about those times, and about radicalization of the than German Reich by the parties, the rightist and leftist extremists. I do not want to return to that issue. But it is an example of remarkable boldness for you to impute that the CDU/CSU under me wants to turn back 30 years of democracy. That is unbelievable. [shouts, applause] I do not believe that this statement, despite the sharp controversy we have, can be in line with the approach of the federal chancellor.

We have not been lying to and cheating the German people for 30 years. We have built a democracy as a painful conclusion of the history of the Weimar Republic, as a painful conclusion of the war we have experienced, and a painful conclusion of the situation we have been in. I have never claimed that we build it up all by ourselves, yet I may point out that the decisive solutions, the overcoming of the economic distress, the market economy, the decisive questions concerning our security, the Bundeswehr and NATO had to be railroaded through here against you and your friends. [strong, prolonged applause]

If you had prevailed with your plan on Germany at the time we would indeed have the chance today of being reunited on the wrong side. [applause]

It is an impudence which you have the nerve to display abroad, not only toward myself or toward us. Just think what you said in Moscow about Willy Brandt at the time. You remember how you ridiculed him in public and abused him. Were we not the ones who protected Willy Brandt against you and this because you were guilty of uncontrolled outbursts of hatred at the time? What did you say in Prague, in Hungary and what did you say in Warsaw? I do not want to rummage in the chest of quotations here, yet you, of all people, should have kept your mouth shut here. [commotion, applause]

You need not concern yourself with us, Mr Chancellor. Asked what the main difference is between Helmut Schmidt and myself I did not indulge in long phrases--though it would also have been possible to show analytical differences and to transpose them onto political. What I said was that the main difference between myself and Helmut Schmidt is that what I am saying here on questions concerning the reaction to the Soviet invasion of Afghanistan, nonparticipation in the Olympic games, measures in the field of trade policy, and the intensification of our defense including the decision on the closure of the arms gap are supported by both the CDU and the CSU from the top to the last man in the rank and file, but not by the SPD. [applause]

Near the conclusion of my explanations may I be allowed to add a few more things? The explanations were actually intended to deal with the situation involving Europe, the United States, Afghanistan; yet one must adapt to the imponderables of the chancellor and to the short time periods he makes available to others, therefore may I be allowed to make a few remarks concerning the question of Europe, the United States, with a view to the world situation.

You must not equate SPD interests with German interests. [applause] It is the talk of the town not only here but also in Washington that you enjoy a greater degree of confidence in the United States than in your party. And if for this reason you refer to my critical utterances, to which I am perfectly well entitled, then this is not a violation of the German interests but a clarification of the SPD policy, its dangerous background, its inconsistencies, difficulties and dangers. [applause]

During my trip to the United States it was not in my talks with members of the government, including the president, albeit in those with all ranks of Congress, the Senate and the House of Representatives--and this involves a sizable number of names; three colleagues from this house, Walter Kiep, a former member of this house, and two members, Mr Mertes and Mr Hans Klein, were present during these talks with the members of parliament--one word recurred in all these talks which I had never heard before in all of the 25 years of visits and meetings in the United States and which I had not even deemed possible in this context: the word uncertainty. We are full of uncertainty. Uncertainty (?emerges) from Tehran; uncertainty, these are the consequences of Afghanistan; uncertainty; How do the allies behave toward us, including the Federal Republic of Germany, even though we were not the only ones meant by this. And how is the future of NATO to be further developed and what about our rate of inflation? One uncertainty on top of another.

If you pretend that everything is in perfect order, Mr Chancellor, then I do not know whether your capability for self-deceit is greater than your aptitude for deceiving those around you. After your visit there was a statement by the man who no doubt enjoys the confidence of the U.S. President, because he cooperates with the president in daily, I repeat daily, examination of the situation and, if necessary, decisionmaking, security adviser Brzezinski. He declared: What we need is more tangible solidarity from the allies, more concrete actions, and not just rhetorical support. This did not spare the Federal Republic in that respect. Tangible actions and not just rhetorical support. I may even go further: Mr Strausz-Hupe, U.S. ambassador to NATO for many years, in his essay in POLICY REVIEW in the winter of 1980 [as heard] wrote: In summary, the German-American relationship was worsened in an alarming way. He did not write that because we had asked him to. He did not write that to do us a favor. Being a historian, a political scientist, a strategic scientist, he merely described what to him is the upshot of the development of U.S.-German relations of the past several years.

This cannot be eliminated even by you with your often ambiguous way of putting things, Mr Schmidt. Yet an important American diplomat says that German-American relations have deteriorated in an alarming way. If he says that West Germany is about to review its priorities in international politics, if it is said about you in the Moscow press that you have disappointed hopes in the United States, then I can only congratulate you on this. But the question then is: Why did you arouse hopes at all? Had you not aroused any, you would not have had any need to disappoint any.

If you say that the Soviet Union needs a psychological protective screen to be able to withdraw from Afghanistan, well enough. I share your opinion that there is little sense in talking with a great power about punitive actions and using similar vocabulary. But there are here certain differences between the U.S. political terminology and ours which are attributable to the tradition, to the meaning of the words, and so forth. But your repeatedly strong emphasis on the differences in the interests of the United States, Europe and the Federal Republic of Germany is not totally wrong, analytically speaking, since the geographical and historical differences between us mean specific interests of this or that nature here and there. But to talk time and again about differences, when it should be necessary to talk about the common aspects today--to say that Soviet tanks are 50 kilometers from Hamburg--is (?improper). After all, they do not need any less time to get to Hamburg than Soviet missiles need to destroy the industrial areas of North America. In view of the development of the new technology, we are sitting in one and the same boat today, and it does not make any difference whether we say unfortunately or thank God.

Because of scientific-technical developments in the last generation today's world no longer knows any limits in the fields of communications technology, transport technology and destruction technology. There, the security of Washington is also at stake in Hamburg, but Hamburg's security is also at stake in Washington. [applause] This would have called for your clearly stressing these matters of common interest.

A wise German correspondent has written the following assessment of your visit: Schmidt managed to handle the American president on the occasion of his visit to the United States. But he did not manage to handle the senators, the congressmen, the American public, the press and the media. That is one of the very great differences between the communist form of leadership, as in the Soviet Union and other places, and the democratic form of leadership.

Mr Brezhnev does not have to take public opinion into consideration. Public opinion does exist in dictatorships, but it is formed beneath the surface. Public opinion in the form of a productive force does not exist. In the United States the president's leeway in making decisions is dominated by public opinion, which can very easily increase or ebb away.

If you achieved good understanding with the American president--everybody is happy about that, nobody has criticized you for that--last but not least because the administration in America had certain difficulties because of voting problems in the Security Council. First there was a yes, and then a no, with regard to a Middle East resolution. And if you took this wisely into consideration, you are entitled to do so. But reaching an understanding with the American President, and the polite description of it in the communique, does not say anything about the fact that the attitudes of public opinion in the United States, the citizens, the mass media and the members of the two congressional bodies on Capital Hill, have deteriorated decisively vis-a-vis Europe and the Federal Republic. That is a fact you should have stressed here on the occasion of such a report as the state of the nation message. You should have analyzed it and you should have made your suggestions, about how to overcome it. [applause]

On your return flight from the United States, as the Bonn correspondent of the New York TIMES has written, did you not--in criticizing the Olympic boycott--state that this was a measure that only obstructed the East-West dialog? The New York TIMES added that Mr Boelling tried to eliminate that sentence from the interview, but that you insisted that the sentence remain in the interview. You were right, in that that sentence really expresses your opinion. If you read the U.S. press of that period you could see the concern, running like a red thread through it, that the foundation of NATO was gradually beginning to shake. Concern is being felt that American-European relations are eroding. You have psychologically lent yourself to this erosion with your remarks, you did not fight it. [applause]

It is no coincidence either that on 15 March of this year, that is, after your visit, the New York TIMES--which did not somersault as it did in earlier times with regard to ostpolitik and other connected problems, somersault out of admiration for the CDU/CSU--[shouts] yes, professor, tempora mutantur et nos mutamur in illis [times change and we change with them]. [shouts, laughter]--the paper writes: "NATO out to lunch," which means that our allies are having lunch. They do not care about our problems, they do not care about our difficulties, they do not care about our burdens. Such articles, which one can find everywhere in the U.S. press, such as in the Kansas City STAR, produce more American psychological impact than a communique which, over there, was unknown to most people anyway. These are the problems. [applause]

I have been attacked because of my stance in the United States, and I want to discuss it somewhat here. I have said, I have pointed out the speech given by Dr Kohl in the Bundestag indicating that we have from the very beginning considered as correct nonparticipation in the Moscow Olympic games as part of the countermeasures, the reaction to Afghanistan. [applause]

I do not believe that sports and politics are identical, but if one knows how in 1936 the international breakthrough of National Socialism was thoroughly promoted by the Berlin games, how it was given prestige and recognized internationally through the games, although at that time the German Reich had not attacked a neighbor--at that time, knowing this, one can say now that the prerequisites for the Olympic games do not exist.

What is the good of the hide-and-seek game behind 24 May and the decision of the International Olympic Committee? If the Olympic Committee decides in favor of Moscow, I would like to see whether you would dare to decide in favor of Moscow if the Americans do not go. But since the Americans have committed themselves, since their deadline has run out, it would also serve German interests and the interests of the community, the so often avowed solidarity, to make this statement now instead of hiding behind such dubious deadlines as you are doing in an opportunistic way. [applause]

I have also stated the preparedness of the CDU/CSU, for the period after the elections as well, to support economic-political measures against the Soviet Union, also as part of the burden to be handled by the Federal Republic. I must defend myself against the proliferation of wrong ideas or consequences, be it through lack of knowledge or intentional misinterpretation.

I would like to state the key words: First, I have said that valid treaties must be adhered to and implemented. Second, I have said that the allies of the Soviet Union should not be automatically included in such measures. Our opinion was in line with that of the Americans in this field, unless they thoroughly promote the evasion of such measures. That would create a new situation. I said yes to a new and extended COCOM list. I stated my grave reservations--I believe that I am at least somewhat in accordance with the federal minister of economics on this matter--against barter deals where industrial installations are being supplied which are being paid for by the output of these installations, or with the help of which the credit is paid for. I considered it natural that we would not enter into other contracts in order to gain advantages, while others would have disadvantages. And--this brings me to the decisive point--if economic measures are being considered, these are sanctions, they must not be independent German actions. We ourselves cannot say we will take this or that measure, while the others do not participate.

I have said that a government dominated by the CDU/CSU would be prepared, and will be prepared to take part in economic measures of a common character. Sanctions are the opposite of normal trade. It would mean that normal conditions which have existed so far--which we would like to have continue in the future if the international atmosphere permits it--can be temporarily lifted or eliminated. No more and no less. And then there was also talk of military measures.

Mr Kohl, Mr Zimmermann and myself in the conference with the chancellor on 24 January voiced our views concerning certain measures. I will refrain from repeating them here. But I do want to say that what makes us different from the Federal Government, from the Social Democratic part of the Federal Government to be exact, is quite sizeable: We advocate the view that considerable additional expenditures for our security must not be financed by another increase in the credit potential, which is already gigantic anyway.

The concept that this can be coped with solely by means of credits is one of the dangerous concepts, which in the case of the Americans has led to the decline of their currency. After all, you were the one, Mr Chancellor, who at the time most strongly said with a view to the developments in Vietnam that the Americans want to finance their expenditures by means of credits, which is why they have plunged the entire international currency situation into confusion.

I would like to know from you, then, what it means when you said today that unless peace in Afghanistan is restored, a common consequence will be inevitable. But what matters is not alone the restoration of peace in Afghanistan. It might also be a graveyard's peace; it might well be a peace which is imposed on these people as a peace arising from force of arms after a bloodbath without precedent. This is not what we understand by peace. What we understand by peace for Afghanistan is the neutrality, the integrity and the sovereignty of this country, and the right of its people to be allowed to determine their destiny themselves. [applause]

For this reason you as the government chief should have a more realistic assessment of things and a more courageous attitude instead of using pretexts to justify your hesitancy. You know better than I do, or as well as I do, that at the moment the Red Army continues its presence in Afghanistan unabated, and that it is being reinforced. You know that unlike Prague, at this time the Red Army is perfectly organized and systematic and that no doubt it also has a greater readiness to take risks, because the West--I need only mention Angola and Ethiopia--has led to the wrong conclusion, namely Soviet power policy can afford anything since no serious Western reaction need be anticipated any longer.

Depots, takeoff and landing strips and landing pads for helicopters are being built in the vicinity of the Iranian border. You know that at the moment the Soviet spring offensive is partly being prepared and partly underway and that in this area of action terror is being exercised, with the Soviets using the most modern means of mass destruction, the most modern arms technology, helicopters with napalm bombs and so-called cluster bombs, MiG-23 planes, and even with the most cruel treatment of women and children, a terror with which they hope to break the hardness of the resistance of the Islamic rebels or the Muslim freedom fighters. What they are relying on is the maxim that if action is to be taken, then it must be so harsh that the will to resist will be quelled, even if this means using the most cruel means of destruction. After all, this is the policy in Afghanistan at the moment.

This is why it is so childish to say that we are now waiting for the withdrawal of the Soviet troops. We still want to give them a chance to pull their troops out. The word neutralization has been introduced into the debate. What does neutralization mean anyway? Neutralization means that neither the Soviet Union nor the United States is to control the country: It is not to be affiliated with either of the blocs, it must be nonalined, it is to have sovereignty and integrity and it is to be allowed to decide for itself. Do not misunderstand me, I am not saying this in a tone of maliciousness, I am not saying it in the sense of a moral condemnation of Mr Brezhnev whom I personally consider a great statesman, albeit a statesman who does things differently from the way we have done in the West.

After all, what the Soviets understand by neutrality is the maintenance of a regime of their color, the maintenance of a regime such as they tried with Daud, then with Taraki, then with Amin, and which they are now trying out with Karmal. This regime simply cannot hold its own without a Soviet presence, because the Muslim freedom fighters would chase this regime away. For this reason I would like to repeat here: Afghanistan is a turning point, either for the better or for the worse.

Western policy must be aimed at making Afghanistan a turning point for the better. But [applause] this also requires that we be prepared to take upon ourselves certain sacrifices, burdens and risks. I simply reject that intellectual carelessness of representing the Soviet invasion of Afghanistan as a thoughtless adventure, as a juvenile prank. The invasion of Afghanistan by the Soviet Union is a logical step within the framework of its overall strategic concept. This invasion naturally serves to prepare for control over the Arab oil countries, it spells the intimidation and control of Pakistan and especially Baluchistan; it means access to the Indian Ocean.

The transfer of part of the Soviet Pacific fleet to South Vietnam constitutes a warning to the People's Republic of China, whose encirclement is being expanded; it means a 50 percent encirclement of Iran; it means the preparation of the military starting position for the future of Iran. This is because the Soviets believe that the national unity of Iran will break apart under the pressure of the chaotic conditions. And for that event they have prepared their starting positions even now. After all, they are not enlarging their air bases and ammunition depots along the Pakistani border at present, but along the Iranian border. Pakistan is intimidated anyway, as is India. The Arab states are intimidated. After all, their political leadership systems are to be destabilized and overthrown--just look at the military preparations in South Yemen.

With all our attention on Vietnam [corrects himself] on the Afghanistan problem we must not overlook developments in South Yemen lest it happen to us again that while we are still looking at one hotbed of crisis, the next one is building up in full swing. Mr Chancellor, it would have been worthy of, and appropriate for, a government chief to point this out in all frankness when the state of the nation is involved once again. [applause]

After all, it is the objective of the invasion of Afghanistan to create an uninterrupted sphere of influence from the north of Afghanistan to the borders of South Africa. I welcome the fact that prime minister Mugabe is to be supported in partnership, under the proviso that he will have given up his concept of a Marxist unity state under communist leadership, a concept which he has promulgated for years. Otherwise the events in Rhodesia would result for us in a multitude of new burdens, problems for the solution of the Namibia problem and problems for the future and the peaceful development of South Africa.

The invasion, after all, also means a massive psychological influence on the nonalined states. The nonalined are supposed to gain the impression that the power of the Soviet Union alone is what counts and no other power. And another factor is that the change in the strategic situation--and we need not repeat here again why Afghanistan is a key strategic country, listing all the reasons, since history and the present prove it--in the opinion of the Soviet Union requires an appropriate geopolitical redistribution and a new distribution. Based on the fact of their military control over Afghanistan, they are drawing the conclusion that a geopolitical reassessment need not take place.

This new distribution is to be launching pad for the next new distribution that will be claimed. Eventually it is their main objective to separate American interests from European interests.

Mr Schmidt, please do everything to make it clear to Mr Brezhnev that it is intolerable for us to hear that hard policy is war policy, and if you want peace policy you must turn away from the United States. Constant drips wear away the stone. And they create a psychological condition. The Soviets have one great advantage next to many disadvantages of their system: They can reckon with long-term development lines, they can launch campaigns for aims whose achievement seems utopian at the moment, which lie 10, 20 or 30 years in the future. While we and the Americans must always be very pragmatic and say: What can we do now, what can we do by tomorrow morning. We must again follow long-term development lines, we must work them out together. [applause]

Therefore I can only ask in an imploring way that agreement be achieved in assessing the situation, agreement between the United States and Europe, between the United States and the Federal Republic of Germany. As a consequence of this common assessement of the situation we ought to speak of common interests, think along the lines of common interests and act according to common interests. The talks about friendship and solidarity--one is friendly with everybody in the world, and the word solidarity has the foul and stale taste to it indicating that actually we do not want to, but if the Americans do not go to Moscow, we must take part in that nonsense because unfortunately we have no choice because we are tied down; we hope that tomorrow everything will be different--no, this must come out of our own assessment of the situation and our own ability to make decisions. [prolonged applause] And an overall political concept should grow out of this.

I am sorry to say that it must be made clear to the Soviet Union that its risk has increased and that in a next blow the risk could become uncontrollable, the point of no return could be passed. We ought to see to it that our military and economic security interests converge today. Energy will be the great issue of the last 2 decades of this century and the first 3 decades of the next century. Energy and raw materials, control over their availability, will determine the stability of our democratic industrial societies.

We should not forget in this respect that the United States is in a position with much capital--but that is not a problem for it--to become independent in 10 and not more than 15 years. What interest should it then have to act for those who unfortunately, because of other geographic or geological prerequisites, cannot become independent and who do not have the military strength or credibility to properly stress their interests in this crisis belt where oil and raw materials are produced.

These are problems of the state of the nation. These are the long-term problems. These are the challenges we are facing. We ought to discuss them and a government chief ought to report on them. He should frankly say with regard to these problems what sacrifices, burdens and difficulties we have to face. That would serve the unity of democratic forces. It would help to reestablish the awareness that has been willfully destroyed, and it would be a realistic starting point for eventually bringing about, through the Afghanistan problem, a change in the world to the advantage of freedom. [prolonged applause]

SCHMIDT, JORGENSEN REITERATE SUPPORT FOR DETENTE

[Text] Bonn--Federal Chancellor Helmut Schmidt and Danish Prime Minister Anker Jorgensen have expressed the will of their governments to continue jointly the policy of detente between East and West. Speaking at a dinner in honor of his guest in Bonn this evening, Schmidt said that it is only on the basis of a military balance that the process of detente interrupted by Afghanistan could be started up again. "There must be no return to the cold war," the chancellor said.

In reply, Jorgensen said: "We cannot accept the Soviet occupation of Afghanistan, but neither do we wish to lose detente and the results it has achieved so far." The present international situation could "later" prove to be a setback for the policy of detente. Such a policy is "absolutely necessary if the human race is to survive."

Immediately after his arrival for a 2-day official visit this evening Jorgensen had a first exchange of views with the Federal Chancellor. Tomorrow (Friday) he will be received by Federal President Karl Carstens and will also meet Federal Foreign Minister Hans-Dietrich Genscher and SPD Chairman Willy Brandt.

Joint Press Conference

[Excerpts] Bonn--The governments in Bonn and Copenhagen are in agreement that the crisis concerning the financial contributions to the EEC resulting from Britain's demand for a massive reduction in London's contribution to the EEC budget must be solved quickly. Federal Chancellor Schmidt and the Danish Prime Minister Jorgensen at a press conference in Bonn today were cautiously optimistic that a solution could be found provided that other controversial questions in the agricultural sphere could be settled at the same time.

Jorgensen, who arrived in Bonn for a 2-day visit yesterday, and Schmidt described a solution to the fishery dispute as particularly urgent. Both agreed that the principles of agricultural policy must be upheld. Schmidt replied with a "cautious yes" to the question whether such a "package solution" would leave room for a financial concession to London.

Schmidt also briefed Jorgensen on his recent talks with President Carter and President Giscard d'Estaing. Both Schmidt and Jorgensen described Moscow's intervention in Afghanistan as a heavy blow against detente. Nonetheless, everything has to be done to "defuse the situation."

DEFENSE MINISTER APEL LEAVES ON ASIAN TOUR

[Text] Bonn--Federal Defense Minister Hans Apel left Bonn today for a visit to Asia which will last almost 2 weeks. His first stop will be Japan, after which he will go on to New Zealand and Australia. Questions of security, foreign and economic policy are to be discussed in talks with government representatives and public figures. Special significance is attributed in Bonn to Apel's trip following the Soviet invasion of Afghanistan.

SPD CHAIRMAN BRANDT OFFERS ADVICE ON AFGHAN CRISIS

[Text] [Bonn]--Against the background of the Afghanistan crisis SPD Chairman Willy Brandt has called on the superpowers, the United States and the Soviet Union, to change their mutual relationship and clarify the level of their talks on disarmament and detente. In an interview for the paper NEUE WESTFAELISCHE (Bielefeld) published in advance today Brandt said that this was a prerequisite for the success of the CSCE followup conference planned to take place in Madrid in the fall.

If nothing comes about between the superpowers, he said, with reference to his own doubts about whether the Madrid conference will take place, "it is questionable whether any Christmas decorations will be hung on the tree." Brandt also asked the two superpowers when they are planning to start negotiations on SALT III.

Brandt showed evident skepticism about the political expediency of a boycott of the Moscow Olympic games. "It is certainly a mistake to think that one can get the Russians out of Afghanistan that way," he said. He feels very sorry for the sportsmen, who would be deprived of the event after years of preparation. "But that is now in the mill of politics, or what is regarded as politics." Brandt came out in favor of an independent, nonalined Afghanistan with guaranteed frontiers becoming a more dominant topic of international discussions.

WEHNER SEES DANGER OF SUPERPOWER CONFLICT

[Text] Bonn--The SPD lower house floor leader, Herbert Wehner, believes that the fear that the present conflict between the two world powers, the USSR and the United States, in the wake of the Soviet invasion of Afghanistan could spill over into other areas as well as those bordering Afghanistan, is not unfounded. Wehner said in a Deutschlandfunk interview today that the world powers could get into a situation "from which it will be very difficult to get out of again" and that further complications could be added to existing ones. In this connection, Wehner said that he believed that more important than encouraging signs from the Kremlin for the supporters of the policy of detente in the West was the fact that the two superpowers "are not really speaking with one another."

Wehner said he was sure that a basic interest in the policy of detente remained in Moscow, too, and for this reason he wanted to help prevent the Federal Republic from being infected by the idea that the Soviet Union would eventually unleash something here, too.

Pointing to the example of the American Vietnam war, he said it was clear that patience was required regarding the Soviet withdrawal from Afghanistan. He described as "impossible" the American President's "ultimatum" that if the Soviet troops had not been withdrawn by 20 February, there would be no Olympic games for either the Americans or others. This was not appropriate, given the seriousness of the events.

The text of the interview was prereleased to DPA.

CARSTENS SETS DATE FOR BUNDESTAG ELECTIONS

LD171508 Hamburg DPA in German 1408 GMT 17 Mar 80 LD

[Text] Bonn--Federal President Karl Carstens has set Sunday, 5 October, as the date for this year's Bundestag elections. This was stated today by the president's office in Bonn. The federal president has thus complied with the Federal Government's recommendation.

LE MONDE: GOVERNMENT OLYMPIC BOYCOTT INDICATED

[Text] Paris, March 22 (AFP)--The influential French daily LE MONDE today said all signs point to France not going to the Moscow Summer Olympics. Until now, France has refrained from approving the boycott of the Moscow games urged by American President Jimmy Carter. The front-page article said that "everything indicates that France, like West Germany, is heading towards non-participation in the Moscow Summer Olympics."

"In circles close to the French foreign affairs minister, it is considered settled that France will not go to Moscow if nothing decisive happens in the next few weeks," the article read. "The Soviet Union would have to undertake a spectacular initiative in Afghanistan for the dynamics of the boycott not to affect it and as of now only the International Olympic Committee thinks or hopes such is the intention of the USSR," said LE MONDE. LE MONDE said France's position is "theoretically less dependent on the Americans" than West Germany's, and this explains the significance of the French stressing "non-participation rather than a boycott."

The article's author, Francois Janin, recalled that French President Valery Giscard d'Estaing had recently called the Soviet invasion of Afghanistan "unacceptable." Mr Janin wrote: "If there is no official French decision yet, it is without doubt because a tactical choice to wait for the deadline, in the last half of May, for answering invitations to the Olympics only has advantages. Announcing non-participation just before the deadline will limit the effect and most importantly thelength of hostile reactions to this decision."

MOROCCO'S KING HASSAN ARRIVES ON 'UNEXPECTED VISIT'

LD231907 Paris Domestic Service in French 1700 GMT 23 Mar 80 LD

[Text] An unexpected private visit by King Hassan II to France is due to last 8 days. The king of Morocco was welcomed a short while ago at the airport by Foreign Minister Jean Francois-Poncet.

To Meet With Giscard

LD232130 Rabat Domestic Service in Arabic 2000 GMT 23 Mar 80 LD

[Summary] This afternoon King Hassan arrived in Paris on a private visit to last a few days. He was welcomed at the airport by Prince Moulay Rashid, and Princesses Laylah Hasna and Laylah Asna who arrived in Paris yesterday, and by French Foreign Minister Francois-Poncet and Boucetta, Moroccan minister of state for foreign affairs and cooperation. The king is accompanied by Prince Moulay Abdullah, Gen Moulay Hafiz Alaoui, minister of royal palaces, protocol and medals, Gen Ahmed Dlimi and other senior officials. The French president is to meet with the king three times during his stay.

FOREIGN MINISTRY DENIES PARIS WANTS MADRID CSCE CANCELED

[Text] The Foreign Ministry has just denied certain reports stating that France wishes to call for the cancellation or postponement of the Madrid Conference on Security and Cooperation in Europe, planned for November. These reports come in particular from the American press. The Foreign Ministry points out that France is continuing to prepare for this meeting, and these reports are without foundation.

TALKS AT THE HAGUE COVERED RHINE POLLUTION, EEC ISSUES

[Unattributed report: "Mr Barre and Mr Francois-Poncet in The Hague: The Rhine Pollution Affair Must Be Settled Internationally"]

[Text] The talks which Prime Minister Raymond Barre and Foreign Minister Jean Francois-Poncet had in The Hague 18 March centered on the pollution of the Rhine, community problems and preparations for the Brussels summit of the Nine at the end of the month.

In the French Government's view, the saline pollution of the Rhine must be settled internationally. Under the 1976 Bonn Convention, the states along the Rhine planned to reduce the river's salinity by injecting into the subsoil the waste from the Alsace potash mines presently being discharged into the Rhine, but Mr Barre withdrew the ratification bill from the National Assembly agenda since it would have been rejected by a Rally for the Republic, Socialist and Communist coalition on this issue in the French Parliament.

Since then, Paris committed itself to put forward practicable solutions while respecting, as far as possible, the concern of Parliament and public opinion.

Meanwhile, the forthcoming Brussels summit is considered crucial for the EEC's future. Mr Francois-Poncet will be discussing this with Danish Foreign Minister Olesen in Copenhagen on Wednesday, and it was the focus of Sunday's talks between Mr Giscard d'Estaing and Mr Schmidt in Hamburg. On this subject, Elysee spokesman Poirier stated on 17 March that this exchange of views also related "to the problems under review at the forthcoming European Council. It is France's will to arrive politically at an equitable solution (in keeping with the principles of Community organization) on the whole range of questions on which Europe's continued progress depends. But if we are to arrive at this solution, this political will must clearly be mutual."

BOURGES TO VISIT PACIFIC FORCES, NUCLEAR SITES

[Unattributed report: "Mr Bourges Inspects French Forces in Pacific and May Be Present at Nuclear Test at Mururoa"]

[Text] Defense Minister Yvon Bourges will be inspecting the French Pacific forces, most of which are stationed in Polynesia and New Caledonia, from 20 through 28 March. According to well-informed sources in Paris, he will also watch a nuclear test at Mururoa.

The defense minister plans to spend most of his time in Papeete and Mururoa, and later, Noumea, where France keeps so-called national sovereignty forces independent of the civilian and military personnel needed for nuclear tests.

Mr Bourges will visit the Mururoa nuclear sites from 20 through 24 March, that is, after having talks with administration officials and elected representatives of French Polynesia. According to our Papeete correspondent, on the eve of this visit, local political parties are still divided over the military presence in Polynesia.

The Tahoeraa Huiraatira, which has connections with the Rally for the Republic and is the main movement opposing the autonomist majority, stated that it supports France's decision to possess nuclear arms, but only as a deterrent. [paragraph continues]

However, Mr John Teariki, leader of the Here Ai'a, one of the two components of the Territorial Assembly majority, recalled that as a result of nuclear tests on the Mururoa site, the islands are depopulated and their former way of life has been forsaken in favor of an "egoistic consumer" society.

Mr Francis Sanford, former deputy, governing council deputy chairman and leader of the Te Ea Api, the second majority party, recalled his opposition to "any form of nuclear tests."

Since atmospheric tests were replaced with underground tests in 1975, French technicians have managed to reduce the unit cost of their tests by 50 percent. These tests are carried out either in wells dug in basaltic rock underneath the nonsubmerged coral area or an atoll or--in the offshore technique--at great depths underneath the seabed of an inner lagoon.

As a result of the reduction in the cost of each test, it has been possible to increase the number of tests compared with the previous atmospheric test series.

Some 18 months ago, following an unsuccessful test, engineers and technicians working for the Nuclear Energy Commission were afraid that the government program to equip all M-4 missiles carried by strategic submarines with multiple warheads by 1985 could be delayed, especially since the number of tests which the government allowed the Nuclear Energy Commission to carry out with a view to developing a multiple warhead was only one-tenth of the number of similar U.S. tests.

It appears that this technique has now been mastered, and the men in charge of the Nuclear Energy Commission have stated that they will be able to abide by the prescribed deadlines and comply with the weapon's required features and performance.

TUNISIA'S NOUIRA LEAVES PARIS FOR RECUPERATION IN NICE

NC221259 Paris AFP in English 1257 GMT 22 Mar 80 NC

INTEREST RATE COMPONENT OF U.S.-INFLATION PLAN EXAMINED

[Paul Fabra article: "A Chaotic Situation"]

[Text] It is the stock exchanges which have produced the most spectacular reactions to Mr Carter's new plan for combatting inflation. For the European countries it is the rise in the dollar which, at least in the short term, seems to be the phenomenon which is affecting them most.

This rise will automatically produce a proportional increase in the oil "bill" (which has a deflationary effect on economic activity) while pushing the general price level up a little more. [paragraph continues]

The revaluation of the U.S. currency is especially likely to aggravate the new problems in financing the foreign deficit facing the FRG, whose finance minister has just visited Saudi Arabia to try to obtain a direct loan from OPEC of around 10 billion deutsche mark.

The rise in the dollar and the accompanying fall in gold are, however, just one aspect of the situation--a new situation in many respects--which is now emerging after the decisions taken in Washington. For the past 15 months, every time the U.S. authorities have been forced--always at the last minute--to try to regain control of the situation, they at least managed to stop their currency's downward spiral and, in most cases, to start its recovery.

That was what happened on 1 November 1978, which was a date to remember in contemporary monetary history: Since then the dollar has slumped at times but a degree of de facto stabilization had been established between the exchange rates as if the currencies, now all affected by inflation to varying degrees, had--for a time--ben mutually consoled by their common weakness. This was also the case on 6 October 1979 when, after the lamentable Monetary Fund General Assembly in Belgrade (where only Marshal Tito, still full of spirit, gave a good impression), Paul Volcker had to take emergency measures, described at the time as energetic, which at least had the effect of reducing the gold fever for a few weeks--a fever which had produced the first signs of a general desertion of "paper money." It was also the case after 15 February, when the Federal Reserve System president once more raised the U.S. bank rate (bringing it to 13 percent)--a prelude to the White House program on 15 March which was also accompanied by a "selective" increase in the bank rate (which is now 16 percent for the excessively greedy banks).

The Cost of Credit

Each of these stages was characterized by a new stage in the increasing cost of credit. The considerable dangers posed by such a development cannot be overemphasized. At the end of 1978 the interest rate on dollar deposits at 1 month's date reached 11 percent; in November 1979 it reached 16.75 percent and it is now around 20 percent. This has produced a parallel increase in the cost of bank loans.

The U.S. commercial banks' prime rate has just been raised to the unprecedented level of 18.5 percent (which is a real rate of at least 20 percent for credit at 3 months given to the cream of the enterprises...). Some 12 months ago the prime rate was still 11.5 percent. The same trend can be seen in other countries and, in particular, in those which until 1978 had effectively protected themselves from the enveloping inflation. In Germany short-term interest rates have generally trebled since the beginning of last year (to reach around 10 percent now). In France, the development has been less abrupt since it started from a higher level; nonetheless the rate has doubled on the Paris monetary market (transactions between banks)--from 6.7 percent in January 1979 to 13 percent at present.

Although they reflect a major increase in the financial burden on borrowers--today this includes everybody (how many companies do not borrow money to...pay their taxes?)--these figures in themselves only describe one aspect of the situation. Moreover does the continuation of economic activity at a rapid pace not prove that it is possible to adapt to this isutation? Optimists unfailingly point out that if these rates are compared with the "inflation rate" a very different view of the "real cost" of credit emerges.

In the United States--the country which runs the show--the annual rate of price increases has been around 18 to 19 percent since the beginning of 1980, as against 13 percent in the last quarter of 1979. Therefore is it abnormal or particularly painful to pay interest at 1.6 percent to 2 percent (according to who you are) per month when prices, particularly wholesale prices (those which concern enterprises), are rising in approximately the same proportions?

The most serious aspect of the situation is the chaos into which this development has thrown the financial markets. Short-term interest rates have been higher than medium- and long-term interest rates for several months now. When such a situation continues there comes a time when nobody will agree to apply for issues at several years' date. This is what happened at the end of January in New York where there was a positive collapse on the stock market. Since then the phenomenon has spread. In Paris the famous government issue at 12 percent in January is now quoted below par. In the last monthly report on "financial market trends" the OECD experts note, for the first time, a drop in the overall amount of issues on the Euro-share market and calculate that the trend should continue throughout the year (however at present the outlook goes no further than 6 weeks).

What do corporations do when they can no longer borrow on a medium-term basis? They turn to the banks in even larger numbers. That is why in the past few weeks on the other side of the Atlantic there has been an increase in applications for bank credit despite the constant rise in interest rates. As for the banks, which have large holdings of stocks, they are in danger of suffering considerable losses if they should have to liquidate some of them.

More generally speaking, the upheaval in the natural interest rate hierarchy undermines the modern credit machinery since few banks do not practice "transformation," which consists of procuring short-term resources for medium-term loans. However, short-term borrowing now costs more than the expected revenue from "longer" placements. Mr Felix Rohatyn, a French-American banker from the Lazare Bank and the author of the plan which 5 years ago prevented New York from simply going bankrupt, has just suggested applying identical measures to the entire United States--a suggestion taken seriously by financial circles.

Contrary to what people sometimes tend to think, the "escalation" in interest rates is not the result of a deliberate decision by the authorities. In this affair they observe rather than direct. Each week the U.S. Treasury (and also the British, German and French treasuries, among others) has to borrow to finance its operations. To procure the funds it urgently needs it has to offer a rate of remuneration largely dictated by market conditions, which themselves are determined by credit rates. That is why Mr Carter's announcement that he will restore a budgetary balance (and more than balance) for fiscal 1980-1981 starting 1 October is a step in the right direction. However there could be many upheavals between now and then.

ACADEMICIANS 'DEMAND' RIGHT TO VISIT SAKHAROV

[Unattributed report: "Six French Academicians Want to Visit Mr Andrey Sakharov"]

[Excerpt] The following letter was sent to the USSR ambassador to France on 5 March by six French academicians--namely, mathematician Jean Dieudonne; biologist and Pasteur Institute Director Francois Gros; Louis Michel, physicist and professor at the IHES [Higher Institute of Scientific Studies]; Jean-Claude Pecker, astronomer and College de France professor; Francis Perrin, physicist and College de France professor; and Rene Thom, mathematician and IHES professor. "The scientific communist is gravely concerned by the situation of Academician Andrey Sakharov, who is isolated from science and mankind by his exile and by the sanctions against him. Mankind's basic rights, including the principle of the free circulation of people and ideas, are among the scientific world's most ancient traditions. In the name of these traditions we demand the right to visit our colleague Andrey Sakharov as soon as possible." The committee has also informed Foreign Minister Francois-Poncet and Mr Sakharov of their initiative.

RUFFINI SPEAKS ON ATLANTIC ALLIANCE AND STRATEGIC BALANCE

[Text] (ANSA)-Palermo, March 24--The Atlantic alliance is an instrument for security in a moment of international tension. For Italy, the framework of the alliance and participation in the European Economic Community (EEC) are the reference points of its foreign policy. These and other points were made here Sunday by Italian Foreign Minister Attilio Ruffini at a meeting of the "Sicilian Atlantic Club" on the theme "Atlantic alliance and strategic balance in the 'eighties'".

"Faced with Soviet military power, which exceeds any defense needs, NATO must review its methods and operations in order to be in step with the situation and to preserve peace", Ruffini said. Italy "will make its contribution to deepening the process of East-West detente", he added.

The foreign minister spoke of the situation in the Mediterranean basin and referred to contrasts between Greece and Turkey, between Arabs and Israelis, to the Lebanese situation, to Malta's political initiatives--"whose goals are difficult to understand"--to the Libyan-Tunisian crisis, and to the Yugoslav situation.

"EEC members have the duty to put aside their particular interests in bilateral relations with countries on the other bank (of the Mediterranean) in favor of an overall vision of the common interests of stability, progress and peace in the entire basin".

With respect to the Soviet intervention in Afghanistan and the situation in the African Horn, Ruffini said that "today, one must talk of global threat, and no longer of regional threats, which cannot be contained within the geographical limits of the North Atlantic Treaty.

"This threat is not military, but political, economic and even ideological. Therefore, the alliance can no longer hope to defend its interests only with a military reaction. In brief, if Soviet strategy has become intercontinental, NATO must acknowledge this and begin to compensate. If the threat is global, the capacity to react must necessarily be global", Ruffini said.

With respect to detente, Ruffini observed that the West is seeking all the mechanisms suitable for preserving peace, despite the fact that the Soviet intervention in Afghanistan "has made more evident the Soviet Union's unwillingness to respect the principle of the globality of detente".

The idea of "regional" detente tends to underestimate the effect of Soviet expansionism on global balance which is the foundation of peace, the minister said.

The risk of self-destruction strengthens the need to limit armaments, which would have a beneficial effect on relations among states and would permit the use of large resources for social needs", the foreign minister asserted.

FIAT REPORTEDLY NEGOTIATING 'COLOSSAL DEAL' WITH USSR

[Text] Rome, March 22-(ANSA)--The Italian FIAT automobile manufacturing giant was reported here today to be negotiating another colossal deal with the Soviet Union to double the size of Togliattigrad, the FIAT-built motor city.

News of the negotiations, which were reportedly well along their way, will be published in the forthcoming issue of the Italian ESPRESSO news weekly. According to ESPRESSO, which got its leaks about the deal during Soviet Deputy Economy Minister Vladimir Sushkov's recent visit to Turin, the part of the operation involving the expansion of Togliattigrad would involve a FIAT investment of some 200 billion dollars.

The deal calls for the construction of a new autoworks in the Soviet motor city, with production targeted to expand from the present rate of 660,000 vehicles to more than 1,200,000.

ESPRESSO indicated that the Libyan Jamahiriyah, a ten-percent shareholder in the FIAT corporation, might foot a portion of the bill.

The new agreement would also provide arrangements for the construction at a late date of another plant for the production of trucks, tractors and farm machinery.

In return for its investment, "JG" [as received] will reportedly receive auto parts produced in the East at a lower labor cost and adaptable to the Western industry's cars.

The weekly also indicated that other European automobile companies, like the French Renault and Peugot corporations, would also benefit from the arrangement.

PERTINI CONCLUDING TALKS ON FORMING NEW GOVERNMENT

LD212144 Rome Domestic Service in Italian 1800 GMT 21 Mar 80 LD

[Text] The consultations by the head of state, held at an accelerated pace, are coming to an end. A report from the Quirinale by Claudio Angelini:

The presidential consultations to solve the government crisis are drawing to a close. Pertini devoted the second and last day of meetings to the political parties. A basic fact has emerged from these meetings: the willingness by all to rapidly conclude the political crisis. Another common factor is the view that the new government will have to have as one of the main points of its program the struggle against terrorism and the defense of public order.

Let us examine today's calendar: Pertini has already received representatives of the Christian Democrats, the Communist Party, the mixed groups in the Senate and the Chamber, the South Tyrolean People's Party, the Social Movement, the Social Democratic Party, the Republican Party, the Radical Party, the Liberal Party and the independent left.

The secretary of the Christian Democrats, Piccoli, urged a rapid solution of the crisis. He said his party will make its contribution in the spirit of national solidarity in order to form a government of wide coresponsibility and with the largest possible majority. He stated, however, that formulas had not yet been discussed. Communist Party Secretary Berlinguer declared that the Communist Party would remain in opposition until a government of broad democratic unity was set up with a program of harsh struggle against terrorism, a program of moral recovery and social renovation.

Almirante, for the Social Movement, put the emphasis on problems of security. Longo, secretary of the Social Democratic Party, expressed the hope that negotiations would lead to the formation of a government with the widest participation of political forces.

Spadolini, of the Republican Party, said he favored an emergency program based on a few essential points, a policy against inflation and terrorism, and a coherent Western and Atlantic solidarity.

Rippa, secretary of the Radical Party, attacked mismanagement and demanded reforms of the penal code and the police.

Zanone, of the Liberal Party, affirmed that it was necessary to seek a convergence of views of five democratic parties on a government program and that it would be a grave error to dispose of solidarity between the lay parties and between them and the Christian Democrats.

Basically, one can begin to see, between the lines of these statements, the first skirmishes on the nonparty government or party government formulas, that is, the Christian Democrats with Republican support.

In about three quarters of an hour, Pertini will receive the Socialist Party delegation, after the meeting of its Central Committee. On Sunday, he could grant the mandate for formation of the new government. From the Quirinale, back to the studio.

PSI Position

[Excerpt] The Socialist Party's [PSI] position on the government crisis has been defined by its Central Committee. A report by Salvatore D'Agata.

The Central Committee concluded its meeting a few minutes ago. Bettino Craxi has received a mandate to negotiate Socialist participation in the government, provided--the document states--they agree on an emergency program corresponding to the requirements of the working people.

There must also be a political framework which, in its constituting elements and orientations, is in keeping with the democratic strategy of renovation and resumption of the policy of national solidarity, through an agreement with political forces which explicitly state their adherence to this policy.

The document was approved by 121 votes out of 208, that is, about 60 percent. The 80 abstentions came from the leftwing members of the Central Committee--the groups of Lombardi, Signorile, De Martino and Mancini. The small group led by Achilli voted against. The vote in favor, which determined Craxi's mandate, came from the leftwing group led by Gianni De Michelis.

DC-PSI Government Expected

[Text] It is expected that a mandate to form a new government will be given tomorrow. According to majority opinion, President Pertini will reportedly summon Francesco Cossiga to the presidential palace and confer on him an ample mandate which will not exclude any possibility of collaboration between the five parties which in various forms, either by direct participation or through abstention, supported the government which resigned a few days ago.

The most practical formula appears to be a Christian Democratic-Italian Socialist Party [DC-PSI] two-party government with the external support of the Italian Republican Party.

This meets open opposition from the Italian Liberal Party [PLI] and the Italian Social Democratic Party [PSDI] but meets the requirements laid down by the PSI Central Committee which, in the opinion of Fabrizio Cicchitto, who belongs to the PSI left, reportedly totally ruled out a five-party government.

Likewise, L'AVANTI in tomorrow's editorial will reiterate that the condition for direct Socialist participation in the government is that it be formed by parties which are not opposed to a resumption of the policy of national unity.

PSI CHAIRMAN SAYS LIMITATION OF POWERS LED HIM TO RESIGN

ID211041 Rome AVANTI in Italian 14 Mar 80 pp 1, 14 LD

[Unattributed report: "Lombardi Resigns as Chairman, Submits Letter to Central Committee"]

[Text] Comrade Riccardo Lombardi has announced his resignation as Italian Socialist Party chairman in a letter sent to the Central Committee yesterday. After pointing out that he accepted his election, overcoming the reluctance inspired by unresolved disagreements, soas to help prevent the conflicts from degenerating into splits, Lombardi states: "I was therefore keen to state at once that I regarded the appointment not as a position but as a working task, emphasizing its impoverished nature, over and above the rhetorical and incorrect interpretations which did not please me then and do not please me now. The experience of the past 2 months leads me to conclude that even the most basic preconditions are lacking for me to work effectively in the manner I have stated. The powers conferred on the Central Committee chairman by the party statute are practically nil and in my opinion this is as it should be, because executive responsibility is the exclusive province of the secretary and a governing diarchy would be an even worse solution than a possible autocratic leadership , against which the statute provides the party with all the necessary instruments for defending itself.

"But if, while ruling out--I repeat--any confusion of powers, the chairman is deprived of full and prompt acquaintance with the proposals and initiatives adopted, especially with respect to other parties, and of the usual means of access to them, his role is reduced to that of an inactive and purely symbolic representative, whose endorsement can even be assumed for anamalous forms of conduct or 'private wars' incorrectly waged on the party's behalf. Under such conditions, which are unfortunately the conditions which really exist, the chairman's role is reduced to the only role deducible from the statute, namely to preside over the Central Committee, which means deciding on the order of speaking for those comrades who have asked to speak. I do not consider such a role (as 'speaker' rather than 'president,' to relate it to institutions hallowed by use) humiliating in the least, but I do not believe I have any special aptitude for performing it. I therefore ask you, dear comrades, to accept my resignation as chairman and to regard it as irreversible."

Lombardi's letter ends with the following post scriptum: "I would point out that this letter bears no relation--and could not, in view of its date--to the debate and decisions of the party Directorate meeting convened for tomorrow, 14 March."

PCI'S NATTA ADDRESSES CENTRAL COMMITTEE ON DOMESTIC ISSUES

[Unattributed report on PCI Secretariat member Alessandro Natta 13 March report to PCI Central Committee meeting in Rome: "A New Political Leadership and a Major Moral and Social Reform"]

[Text] Alessandro Natta began by stressing that since last fall there has been a worrying deterioration in the international situation and the Italian crisis has become even more acute. Let us say at once, he added, that the Christian Democratic Party [DC] has not managed to provide an answer equal to the tragic nature of the problems. This is the fact--a negative one for the entire country--which emerged from the DC Congress and National Council session; and this too is the underlying motive for our clear and severe criticism of the positions of the majority of the DC.

Having summed up the various aspects of the international crisis (NATO's nuclear rearmament, the USSR's military intervention in Afghanistan, the U.S. policy of reprisals) and pointed out the lines of initiative and struggle expounded by Enrico Berlinguer in Florence, Natta proceeded to stress how the Communists have sought, and must continue tenaciously to seek, the roads to a political solution of problems decisive to the fate and progress of the world and of our country, while pointing to practical and valid bases--within the framework of Italy's and Europe's alliances--for an effort and commitment by a broad democratic and popular alinement in defense of supreme assets such as peace and interests vital to both West and East Europe. We have also stressed the importance of the fact that stances similar to ours have been adopted in Italy and Europe by other political forces, especially socialist and social democratic forces, by trade union movements and by religious organizations, primarily the Catholic Church. We intend to continue moving in all directions, taking every opportunity to extend our relations with the socialist countries, the nonalined countries, the communist parties and the democratic and progressive forces on the various continents.

This is all the more necessary, he pointed out, because we must not fail to see the danger of the current trends in Europe and our own country toward a passive alinement with the U.S. leaders' most extreme stances. The Cossiga government's conduct, vacillating between bursts of Atlantic fervor and Europeanist caution, cannot be said to have had any other inspiration.

The events which in the past few days have brought to public attention--in a disturbing and unprecedented manner--the problems of morality in public life and in the management of public affairs can easily create a heavily pessimistic, catastrophic view of the national situation. We must of course avoid the distorted and unreal picture of an inexorable collapse, of a general disintegration. But this does not mean that the crisis has not reached a point of extreme gravity. You only have to consider the fact that the positive efforts and results which did occur in 1979 in production and exports have continued to be undermined and largely nullified by the growth of inflation. The fact is that the struggle against this fundamental threat to the Italian economy and society cannot be brought to a positive outcome by the sole use of a monetary policy. If we have returned to a very critical situation and to alarming prospects, it is because we are effectively taking for granted--and increasingly so--the refusal and inability, which have become accentuated since the democratic cooperation phase, to pursue a line of programming and development, to deal with the central issues of energy, industrial conversion, transport and construction.

The trade union movement's initiative and the 15 January great strike drew our attention once more to the fundamental issues of a policy of developing production and employment nationwide and in the South. The demonstations of struggle have confirmed the strength and combativeness of the working classes, their faith in organization, their awareness that they must reject the existing attempts or temptations to attack the trade unions' role and prestige. At the same time we must realize the difficulties which the trade union movement has been encountering in its consistent pursuit of a general policy of economic and social transformation. The debate which we as a party opened on this subject (with the labor conference and Chiaromonte's article) had and still has a very obvious and clear aim: We intend to contribute to the development of the general view of the country's interests and development which has been and still is characteristic of the Italian trade union movement; we intend to commit ourselves fully to the advance of the process of trade union unity and autonomy. In this connection Natta also appealed to the party to insure that the 29 March demonstration is a strong element of struggle--a unitary struggle, our struggle, the struggle of the workers, of Communist Party members, young people and women.

3--Steadfast Political Commitment Against Terrorism

With regard to terrorism, the Communists have confirmed again recently a clear-cut and rigorous choice of approach and political commitment. Natta declined to go back over the reasons--which have been fully and enthusiastically discussed--behind the stance and decisions adopted by our leadership and parliamentary groups on the antiterrorist decree. No questions and no doubts about the effectiveness of a law or about the inconsistencies or defects of that specific law--which we did undertake to review, as a leftwing alinement--could ever have justified any concession to filibustering, the abandonment of an act of political will and unity by Italian democracy against the threat of a deadly enemy.

He preferred to stress two other points. First, that some new and positive factors have emerged in the antiterrorist struggle: the blows that have been dealt and the damage inflicted on the subversive network and organization; the steadfast and correct commitment--this must be emphasized--of the forces of order and the majority of the judiciary and in particular the more acute and widespread sensitivity, moral and political awareness and determination to stand up and be counted which have emerged following the latest barbaric events in Genoa, Milan and Rome among young people, the working class and the universities. And at the same time we must note that this attack is by no means defeated; that new thresholds have been crossed at a time when terrorist aggression has entered the factories, universities and homes; and that the episodes of widespread violence have increased, as have the attempts to ignite a climate of guerrilla warfare in social conflicts. The danger remains imminent and acute. As his second rapid observation he said that in lrder to deal with this there is a greater need than ever for unity, solidarity and intelligence in the political leadership for a process of regeneration in Italian society. What I mean, Natta added, is that even those who believe, as we do, that political motivations and objectives are prevalent and decisive in the pehnomenon of terrorism, even those who challenge sociological-type explanations or justifications--the argument of revolts, albeit insane, against the burden of injustices, distortions and social discriminations--certainly do not intend to isolate this battle from the overall remedial battle in the economic, social and moral fields.

4--"Moral Issue" and Crisis of the State

A moral issue has emerged very prominently over the past few days. This is undoubtedly an appropriate term and in any case it was a moral issue that was raised by the DC leaders who linked the policy of dialog and solidarity with a regeneration of their own party--a task of moralization, certainly, but more fundamentally a change in the DC's view of power and government methods--and who now rightly attribute the blow suffered at the Congress partly to the absence of courage and determination in this task.

The facts are objectively grave and disconcerting. What seems intolerable is the fact that following the sequence of scandalous events in past years--the rulings and kickbacks in the oil scandal, the national road board and Lockheed scandals--following the measures to restore moral methods to party financing, the referendum and the unmistakable warning from a considerable sector of public opinion, it has been possible for illegal and corrupt practices, such as the one which came to light in connection with the Caltagirone brothers' banktuptcy, to continue. What seems intolerable is that somethings like the Italcasse [Central Bank Financing Institutions] affair--and I am talking about both "illegal" and "legal" funding--has taken place in recent years; that new clouds have gathered and been allowed to gather over illegal and hidden financing to political individuals and groups in connection with the National Hydrocarbons Board's contract with Saudi Arabia!

What is profoundly disturbing and worrying is the feeling that there are obscure ulterior motives behind the delays in taking any measures, the sudden manipulated revelations and the political utilization of immoral practices: the "scandal" being a means in a relentless battle within the parties--just some of the parties, let it be clear--and particularly within the DC! What is worrying are the questions which arise regarding the conduct of certain sectors of the judiciary, the exercise of investigatory and judiciary power, in connection with cases such as the Sindona case; the impression is of a political involvement, of a dangerous clash among groups within the judiciary authorities themselves in connection with a problem such as the Italcasse problem. And perhaps we should consider once again what the real reasons were behind and the intended political objectives of the charges brought against the most prestigious officials of the Bank of Italy last year.

It must be said, Comrade Natta stated--and we do say, with the strength and determination which we draw from being a workers party and with the right due to us from the clear correctness of our conduct and unquestionable political morality, which no cowardly insinuation by a Donat-Cattin or IL POPOLO can affect--it must be said that there must be a prompt and complete clarification of this confusion; the guilty parties must be identified and punished! We demanded and secured Evangelisti's resignation, but one certainly cannot believe that everything has been settled in the political field by the prime minister's pitiful justifications and defenses, the specious and grave arguments about the inadequacy of public financing and the nonexistence of the currents as politico-organizational entities.

We agreed to the postponement of a measure such as the increase of public financing funds, however essential and just for a party such as ours which certainly has not benefited from Italcasse's illegal funding or subsidies from the Caltagirone brothers. The extraordinary and enthusiastic effort being made by Communists throughout Italy on L'UNITA's behalf and the further effort which we will soon be urging for the election campaign enable us to state with a clear conscience that the principle of political morality inherent in public financing must be defended, while making the regulations more democratic and the legal controls more rigorous, as we have already proposed to the Senate. Therefore we will display no hesitation or tolerance with regard to anyone in this task of moralization. [paragraph continues]

We are willing to seek and to implement more thoroughgoing measures to guarantee and monitor correct practices and conduct, even among individuals--party leaders, parliamentarians, administrators--in political life. We are willing to consider opportune modifications to the law governing banking activities, naturally provided that this in no way implies validation of offenses and swindles.

But the "moral issue" is of much broader significance and implicates the DC--but in greater and more specific political responsibilities. The problem is not, of course, a universe composed of corrupters and corrupted which spares nobody--neither political leaders nor the public administrators of the economic bodies and the banking system--and eventually no area of production, business, or public administration, from the center to the periphery! Such a picture, styled on the late Roman Empire, is a petty distortion of reality and prevents an understanding of the real problem. Just as it is misguided--and we are amazed to see Senator Valiani moving in this direction--to generically ascribe the troubles to "partyism" or to the extension of state involvement in the economy.

The real issue, Natta observed, is the fact that over the past decade, partly as a result of the struggle, the advance and the attainment of more desirable positions of strength and government by the workers movement and our party, the crisis of a power system based on the symbiosis and confusion between the DC and the state, between public and private interests, has accelerated and exploded. This is the crisis of the conception of public involvement in the economy and of a government which has been dominated by partisan interests, the partisan distribution of power and a grave distortion of the relationship between political power and the centers of economic and financial power. Behind the "moral issue" there emerges the crisis of the "welfare state," Italian-style and DC-style--that jumble of corporative and favoritist practices, that aid doled out to categories, groups and bodies compensated for in political and government terms. This situation has undoubtedly left scope for the adventurers--the Sindonas and the Crocianis--and for the inept and unskilled. But it would be very wrong to lump everyone together, for instance to extend one's moral suspicions or condemnations to all the professional abilities and skills, intelligence and experience of the leadership forces present in the fields of industry, finance and public administration.

The pressing need to remedy and correct--over and above the duty to improve morals--is therefore to alter the conception of government methods--truly a need for a new state policy.

Indeed, one cannot conceal the dangerous link with other manifestations of the Italian crisis and with the multifarious signs of an institutional crisis. The fact that, even a mid a storm such as the one which has raged over the past few days, the DC decided to observe the rules of distribution among the currents in appointing Evangelisti's successor (and the same happened with the reshuffle following Malfatti's resignation!) is not merely an indication--as some have observed--of imperturbability or effrontery, but more seriously, of the very outlook and mentality whereby power is identified and should continue to be identified with the DC. But this precisely is one of the causes which now prevent us from having governments capable of governing in accordance with a unitary approach and on the basis of a real and effective sharing of responsibility! The same applies to Parliament, where the abuse of filibustering and the abuse of decree-laws are like a pathological symptom of a delay in renewing the nature and procedures of legislation, the structures and regulations.

5--How Can Italy Be Governed Today?

The references to the international situation and the state of the country led Comrade Natta to stress that there is still a discrepancy--which has increased again following the 1976-78 period--between the present kind of political leadership and the scale and the dangerous nature of the crisis, the pressing need for a task of regeneration and reform and expectations and possibilities. [paragraph continues]

Because--I repeat--it is true that there are in our country great and vigorous capacities for enterprise, hard work and production; the power of the healthy forces, the workers and productive sectors is great, and so is the power of movements--such as the young people's and women's movements--in which the aspirations to and thrusts for change can encounter difficulties or take various forms, while remaining profound.

Next Natta again emphasized the fundamental discrepancy between the acknowledgement of the emergency, the acknowledgement of the need for a policy of regeneration and solidarity and the inability to create the political conditions for this objective--the inability, that is, to resolve the political prob.em which for over a decade, and increasingly since the mid-seventies (when the kind of capitalist developments and the power and government system based on the DC's centrality and the discrimination against the PCI emerged, has been at the root of the political instability and the increasing difficulties in governing Italy.

What does governing Italy mean? How can Italy be governed today? People have asked. We have not posed the issue purely in terms of a parliamentary and government majority. It is possible to guarantee governability if we promote and carry out a process of renewal, and it is to this end that it is essential that a broad democratic social and political spectrum participate and that there be a change in the leadership forces and groups. Of course a policy of solidarity and democratic cooperation is not confined to a government alone; the government is an aspect, not the essence, of a policy, as we have said. But nobody can conceal the decisive significance of the political solution because the government is the guarantee of a change, if it intends to pursue one; it is the principal driving and directional force in a political and moral movement and a unitary trend and effort throughout society, if this is considered necessary; it is the specific foundation and guarantee for a program of reform, if this is considered possible.

Natta observed that it is no accident, for that matter, that the DC Congress debate centered on this problem of whether or not a form of government cooperation with he PCI is possible and that it was on this problem that the DC split and remained split also at its National Council meeting. However, he said, I do not feel that the conflict between the two alinements can be dismissed as a subtle dispute over a formula or an adverb. In fact the various approaches to the Communist issue have more clearly demonstrated the conflict--which characterized the DC back in 1976-68--over the significance and importance of the solidarity policy, over the policy both necessary and possible for governing Italy. The importance of Zaccagnini's and Andreotti's stance lay not only in the principled elimination of the discrimination against the PC, but in the acknowledgement of the value which cooperation with the entire left could have assumed with a view to advancing and developing Italian democracy. It was right--and is even more so now--to acknowledge the fact that part of the DC, significant not only for its strength but also for its political authoritativeness, has stated after over 30 years that a form of government cooperation with the PC is possible and that it fought for this thesis, avoiding clumsy compromises.

Of course we are not unaware--and this should be recalled--that if this policy failed to prevail, this was due partly to the hesitations and fears which have characterized the conduct of the DC leadership group since 1976, the excessive gradualism--characteristic also of Moro--with regard to the rapid course of the crisis and the obsession with unity which effectively obstructed the commitment to internal renewal and which gradually, especially following Moro's demise in 1978, caused a regression to the stances of the adversaries of the solidarity policy. [paragraph continues]

Though perhaps it should be acknowledged that a part was played in the weakening of this line and the dissolution of the majority by the polemics within the left and the uncertainties and limitations in the Italian Socialist Party's [PSI] unitary commitment, the fact remains that the decisive blows were dealt by the shortcomings and the denials of the innovative essence of the policy of cooperation. A responsible and explicit self-critical acknowledgement would have lent greater strength to a renewal of the solidarity policy. Nor, on the other hand, must we fail to mention that that proposal of negotiations without preconceptions was accompanied by such reservations that it offered broad scope for counterattack. The correctness of the method was unquestionable, but the political vigor was insufficient; there remained a discrepancy between amenability and political will.

Nevertheless, Natta continued, it was not this alone that governed the fact that a composite majority managed to unite and reject even the hypothesis, the possibility, of a government with the PCI, thus in fact nullifying the reality and essence of the very policy of dialog and solidarity. What are the underlying reasons? The causes connected with the real merits and essence of things must certainly not be considered artificial, though there have undoubtedly been some distortions; and though it might seen extraordinary that, following the 1977 and 1978 program agreements, Deputy Piccoli has rediscovered that there are in fact conflicts with the Communists on everything--foreign policy, economic organization, state policy and social policy--one must certainly not underestimate the influence exerted by outside demands and pressures, apart from the ones which emerged and were applauded at the congress itself: by the shifts in other parties (by the Italian Social Democratic Party, for instance, to anticommunist stances, stances of populist and corporative rivalry), and by the action of economic, political and journalistic pressure groups. Finally, a considerable sector of the DC probably assessed and calculated that the Socialist Central Committee's proposal of an emergency government was not in fact the last word, the expression of a steadfast and resolute desire, and that other assertions made and repeated by the PSI secretary (the references to the commitment to guarantee governability, the proposal not to create a crisis in the dark) could make it possible to evade the problem of relations with the left as a whole, of determining a a different approach to relations with the PCI solely on the basis of an alinement of which the PSI was also an integral member.

But the underlying reason for the entrenchment, the stubbornness, the "no" to the PCI, was, Natta said, the DC's fear: the fear that instils the belief that the mere acknowledgement of the possibility of PCI government participation implies a risk, with regard to the coming elections, which must not be run! The main reason is the preoccupation, the fixation with "centrality." It is the fear that cooperation with the PCI could challenge the conception of political power, alliances and coalitions based precisely on the DC's "centrality" or predominance, on its assumed identification with democracy and on the criterion of the essential power of sanctions over the other parties and to coopt them into more or less subordinate roles. A great deal of emphasis was openly placed on this idea of "homogenization" at the congress, sometimes in familiar coarse tones (the PCI's "recovery" to "democracy", to "the West") and sometimes in somewhat more refined forms ("the DC wants the PCI to evolve," acknowledges the new factors in PCI policy, but it cannot yet be considered fully mature) and it was also used to a large extent as a key for interpreting the fortunate course of republican Italy. "Centrality" has been a powerful unifying force.

Let it be clearly understood that these theses conceal a real fundamental problem. When the majority of the DC states that the conditions or a sufficient degree of homogeneity for an emergency government are lacking, it is rejecting an element of economic and social change, the idea of a new phase in our country's democratic development, and at the same time refusing to question its partisan attitude toward government and the dishonest use of power, in the belief that it can continue to assert this arrogant but narrow-minded and decadent view of its own role, even at the cost of a further general election.

As far as we are concerned, the answer is inevitable and clear: The PCI cannot be assimilated and coopted to this system of power. It is by no means the adverb "still" which constitutes the obstacle to negotiations. Inview of such an attitude we must wage the most open political battle. It is obvious, therefore, that as far as we are concerned, there are no possibilities for understandings or cooperation with a DC such as the one reflected in the attitudes and stances of the majority and the new leadership group, and there will be no such possibilities unless the DC undergoes a real change not only of political attitudes but also of mentality and conduct; unless it fully acknowledges the pluralism and equal status of the democratic forces; unless the concept of the democratic state and the innovative blueprint of the Constitution are fully brought to life.

7--Our Strategy Not in Question

The outcome of the DC Congress, Alessandro Natta stressed, was a grave and negative factor, not only because of the prejudice against our party, the rightwing attitude and reactionary intentions of the advocates of the Preamble [opposition document presented at DC Congress] but also because there was no program or political indicator equal to the gravity of the situation, no responsible plan on which to base an answer to Italian society's demands for change. It cannot be said that the DC's leadership role, which has been asserted to excess, has emerged from the critical troubles of past years. The precariousness and uncertainty of the political situation are still great. I do not believe, he added, that we should rule out the possibility that there are forces, both within this DC majority and elsewhere, aiming at a further aggravation so as to risk an election battle, which would be a risky option for the DC, partly because of its overtones of political radicalization.

If these considerations are well founded, what should our response be? What conclusions should we draw from this phase with regard to our own line? For one thing, we must not consider closed the political phase which began in the mid-seventies and has developed since then. Nor must we consider stronger now than in early 1979--when the majority split--the opposition and obstacles to a democratic unity policy among the fundamental political and social forces. Within the alinement which evoked the solidarity formula there has undoubtedly been a polarization and a conflict of stances: There have increasingly emerged--partly on the basis of the 1979 results--moderate-centrist type trends and center-left suggestions. Similarly, we must not underestimate the fact that the DC Congress confirmed the soundness and responsible nature of the reasons--concerning basic policy, the approach to relations and leadership methods--which, between late 1978 and early 1979, led us to challenge and end the democratic majority experiment.

At the same time, Comrade Natta continued, we must bear in mind the evolution in our relations with the PSI, the attitudes within the trade union movement concerning the need for a policy of unity and democratic cooperation and the fact that one can by no means consider the DC Congress battle complete or underestimate the importance of the step forward in the positions of the DC left and Andreotti.

Therefore, it is not a matter of calling into question the strategy of building democratic and popular unity, a broad social and political bloc, backed by the strength of the workers movement and the left but whose involvement extends beyond these, in an open relationship, to workers, popular sectors and production forces of different, Catholic and democratic, orientation. The main issue is one which we have already discussed at previous Central Committee meetings: how to carry this policy forward. We must strive to gain mass backing for this blueprint for change. [paragraph continues]

This means that the Communists intend to continue their critical activity and political battle with regard to the DC, taking into account that party's internal dialectics and contradictions, with the following two precise objectives: to achieve a balance of forces more favorable to our party and to the left; and to bring about a change of approach and political direction within the DC.

8--This Government and PCI's Opposition

Comrade Natta preferred not to return to the political solutions in which this plan for a major social transformation and a new kind of democratic development could be reflected. We have considered and we still consider the emergency government a necessary transition, he said, but I would like to point out that one distinguishing and decisive aspect of this proposal was the participation of the entire left, including the PCI, in the country's leadership.

Now that this hypothesis has been ruled out by the DC Congress, any possibility of our party participating in political and program negotiations has obviously disappeared. At the DC National Council meeting Deputy Piccoli returned to the idea of negotiations and an open verification among the constitutional parties for possible future program and majority accords, excluding, of course, a government with the PCI. We felt that this was intended to express a purely internal significance. Is this not the case? If so, we must believe that the sense of modernization and responsibility is disappearing. What kind of meetings, whether collective or bilateral, is the DC talking about? We repeat once again our refusal to become involved in initiatives which can now only mean wasting time, an extension of dubious marking time, or at least a response merely to the DC's own convenience or calculations. It is pointless and even implies a lack of respect to ask us to hold discussions on something which is not even clear--whether on programs, on formulas for governments of which we would in any case not form part or on the fate of the Cossiga government. Therefore we would like to state right now, out of a sense of duty to clarity and to political honesty, that we will not lend either direct or indirect, even partial, support to possible new government solutions excluding our participation. It is to be hoped that nobody will tell us again that our stance is excessively rigid.

Natta explained that we are adopting the stance which we consider most correct and strongest precisely so as to impart impetus and vigor to the struggle for a democratic coalition policy and government. We are certainly not shelving this objective. We do not feel in the least indifferent or alien to the process which can lead to this outcome. We do not intend to act in accordance with the summary and oversimplified idea that one government is as good as any other or to refuse to assess in detail and specify, in the institutional forum of Parliament, the nature of our opposition with regard to the goals, programs and structures of the various ministries. Unless one has a radical and extremist view of opposition, one must be well aware and must acknowledge that we have vigorously combatted this government's approaches and decisions in essential areas, starting with foreign and military policy; and that we have used mass initiative and parliamentary action to gain positive results with regard to major social issues (pensions, evictions). Our verdict has been reasserted in increasingly severe and clear-cut terms in political and parliamentary forums; it has been expressed on every important occasion, whether in connection with the government's conduct in the National Hydrocarbons Agency affair, its conduct with regard to antiterrorism, its grave shortcomings in economic, energy and educational policy, up to the recent debate on Italcasse.

At this point it must be said that our opposition is even more decisive with regard to the further centrist characterization which the DC Congress has imparted to this government and that our opposition would become even more rigid and intensive if this government remains in office. [paragraph continues]

We do feel, however, that following the PSI's decisions and the Socialist floor leaders' formal act of withdrawing their abstention, the government now lacks the parliamentary foundations on which its existence rested. Does Deputy Cossiga not realize this? Does he not realize that it is his duty to clarify an untenable and anomalous position which benefits neither his own prestige nor that of the institutions? Now he must make a clear political decision on the basis of the consultations which he has conducted over the past few days with the secretaries of the governing parties.

9--Development of Relations With Socialist Party

Next Natta pointed out that a government crisis and the quest for a new solution undoubtedly concern and involve relations between Communists and Socialists. It must be stressed that in the most recent phase, while their differing parliamentary stances might have affected certain decisions (particularly, I feel, on the NATO missiles issue), they did not, however, prevent significant instances of convergence (on the antiterrorist measures, for instance, and again a few days ago on discussions on the Mafia problem) and of the formulation of joint programs. The opportunities for unified initiatives are now more open, with regard to foreign policy as well, thanks to the stances expressed by the PSI and the recent Socialist International meeting.

It is obvious that the country's situation demands--and this is our aim and intention--a broad development of cooperation between the parties within the mass movement and local government; it demands a strengthening of the unitary struggle for a policy of reform and progress and for an increase in the strength of the left.

We have considered positive the PSI's advocacy of an emergency government with the participation of both leftwing parties as the only consistent and valid expression of a policy of solidarity, though there has been no lack of contradictions and uncertainties in the pursuit of this objective. However, there is no doubt that the DC's negative reply and the reasons for its refusal now objectively create a different situation for both parties. Their shared demands and interests certainly make opportune a joint assessment of the state of affairs and of the prospects, and this was the aim of the secretaries' meeting. There must also be--and it is important that this continue--a quest for points of agreement on aspects of a government program and political and parliamentary initiatives, and a joint commitment must be developed to resolve the country's fundamental problems, even if the two parties' stances should prove to differ.

It is, we believe, the shared desire of the entire workers movement and leftwing to keep open and to carry forward the prospects for regeneration and democratic unity, to stand firm on the fundamental objective of the participation of all the working class forces in the country's leadership. The essential thing is that these demands be reflected in the stance and conduct of our party and the Socialist Party.

10--Stronger Initiative: Mass Policy

Now, more than ever, the party's initiative and struggle must proceed from the real and fundamental problems, must be based on the specific contents of a plan for development and reform, must answer the demands of the workers and peoples masses and must have the scope, breadth and unitary imprint of a major political movement. For the sake of the clarity of the direction and aims of our opposition battle, Natta stressed first that the basic lines and political options which we have formulated and intend to defend are not dependent on the party's political and parliamentary position. They have been and always will be determined on the basis of the condition and demands of the workers and the people; they also reflect our view of the general interests and of the democratic progress in Italy and Europe.

What I mean, he added, is that we are not advocating a particular program or policy to facilitate our government participation or to which we will only be prepared to commit ourselves in such an eventuality, while another policy and another program must apply to our battle in Parliament. In any case, this unity and consistency of line, program and decisions have been reflected very prominently during this troubled period and on exceptionally important international and domestic issues--on the major options of detente, disarmament, security, democratic order and economic development.

The point which must be stressed above all others, however, is the organization and development of the mass political initiative and movement. In this regard there is still a shortcoming, a problem, which we must resolutely surmount. Even on very heartfelt issues, such as pensions, we have encountered and are still encountering difficulties and even deafness in organizing propaganda campaigns and mass initiatives. I would like to stress this criticism. Florence undoubtedly demonstrated the party's great awareness of and sensitivity to the problems of detente, disarmament and cooperation. There has been and there still is a broad and enthusiastic debate within the party on the leadership's stances and proposals. There is an undeniable awareness of the importance of our political line and platform, of the opportunities open to our initiative. Nevertheless, Natta observed, our mobilization and involvement have lacked the necessary breadth and impetus in view of the continuing gravity of the situation.

In fact, the lesson of recent events should convince us of two things: First, the need for continuity in the campaign and struggle on issues such as disarmament and the reduction of and block on nuclear weapons. We must not now or ever weaken our stand on this point, not even, clearly, during the coming election campaign. The second point is the need for mobilization and the involvement of the people's masses in connection with international and foreign policy issues. This has always been a precise aim in our party. It is becoming more pressing now, if we want to safeguard and bring about a return to the detente process and work for the policy of cooperation and balanced development to which not only peace but the prospects for our country's and Europe's regeneration are linked.

It is therefore necessary that the results and achievements of the research and the debate--including the ones I have mentioned, but also other no less important ones: the proposals for the energy plan, the chemical industry and state participations sector, for instance--be brought rapidly to people's attention and be put to advantage, certainly, too, in the open formulation of programs for the regional and local elections, which is becoming a political factor of extraordinary importance and democratic significance; but above all they must be used to organize mass campaigns and movements.

11--Options and Proposals on Fundamental Issues

To this end the Central Committee's attention should center on certain issues and objectives which are particularly pressing and important. With regard to domestic policy, I have already mentioned our party's fundamental approaches and options concerning the steadfast defense of democratic order, of the system of freedom, of the constitutional principles and framework. We intend to honor our commitment to produce a proposal to amend the antiterrorist decree, with the twofold aim of eliminating legal provisions which could be restrictive and dangerous to the principles and guarantees of freedom and of rendering the instruments of defense and struggle against terrorism still more incisive and effective. The police reform must be brought to its legislative conclusion. The parliamentary committee of inquiry into the Moro case must be rapidly reconvened, so that the investigation can at last be started and completed within the prescribed time limit.

The regeneration of the state--in the direction of efficiency and democracy, administrative correctness, prompt decision-making and the extension of popular participation and supervision--is primarily a political issue, of political will and approach, of political practice and conduct. In Natta's opinion, the struggle must now be directed particularly and primarily toward the complete definition of the laws governing local government and local finance (the DC's delays and obstacles clearly had the aim of influencing and dealing a blow to the activity of leftwing administrations, particularly in the major cities). Second, we must translate into specific proposals our policy on greater responsibility, higher professional standards and greater mobility and democracy for the reform--the most important and pressing reform--of public administration, from the central structures to the public bodies, public services and local government. In particular, there must be a responsible reorganization of the financial administration if we want to conduct a specific and effective struggle against tax evasion and at last place our country's tax and fiscal system on foundations of fairness, correctness and efficiency. Within this context we must resolve the serious and difficult problem of public employees' contracts.

Recent events in the courts have prominently brought to the country's attention the problems of justice and the judiciary. It must be said that negative repercussions have been caused in the administration of justice by the confused succession of contrasting and conflicting legislative decisions and the series of contradictory interpretations from the executive concerning matters on which there should be the utmost responsibility and clarify of direction. It is within this framework that we must assess the recent events concerning acts committed by certain offices of the judiciary in Rome, which have so deeply disturbed public opinion. Awaiting the results of the higher judiciary council's current inquiry into the matter, while we stress the need for unclear situations to be resolved, we emphasize that these events directly call into question the government's leadership, because the involvement of the judiciary always takes place after other bodies within the administration have fallen short in their task or have strayed from their duties through incorrect political conduct.

In the legislative field the organizational reform of the judiciary can no longer be deferred, and in this context there must be an immediate and updated definition of the judges' responsibilities. We ourselves have promoted some legislative proposals which we consider pressing with a view to beginning this reform. With the same end in view, we feel the pressing need to decriminalize minor offenses. It is also essential to create the conditions for the prompt implementation of the new penal procedure code, with a view to effectively and comprehensively handling delicate issues such as secrecy during preliminary investigations and decisions affecting personal freedom.

In the economic and social field, Natta repeated that the gravest threat is still from inflation. Let this be clear, he added: Our party is clearly and resolutely hostile to devaluation--a serious measure against which we must issue a warning, because it would exacerbate the inflationary spiral, thus dealing an even heavier blow to the workers, especially in the South, to pensioners and to old people. It is a serious measure because it would be certain to aggravate social tensions and make even more explosive situations in southern areas and cities which are already barely tolerable.

More than ever, therefore, we must fight for policies of planning, production development and cutting unemployment, making use of laws which have to a large extent remained inperative, for the proposals I mentioned for a new and responsible energy plan, for a tax policy which will insure broader resources for production investments and at the same time, by means of suitable tax cuts, improve the workers' lot, for a price policy which cannot continue to be based on the principle of absolute freedom but which demands a more incisive control on the formation of prices and action to contain the prices of essential commodities, most importantly, but also of certain basic industrial products.

To be more specific: It seems to me that the first positive results of the mass campaign on pensions must encourage a resumption and development of the initiative to prompt a rapid approval of the bill to reform the pensions system. We propose to the party a new mass campaign on housing, based on a combination of proposals, including legislative proposals designed to bring about a resumption of construction activity, partly by means of a housing savings scheme and especially by implementing the 10-year plan; to remedy the illegal practices through appropriate modifications to Law 10 in areas and situations where the phenomenon has affected the requirements of low income brackets; and to reform the low rent housing institute.

In the fiscal field, we confirm our desire for and commitment to duty in southern Italy, whose importance must also be stressed in connection with the existing crises (in Sicily and Calabria) and the elections. I believe that we must direct our attention particularly to Naples and Calabria. Furthermore, Parliament must approve the reform of the farming agreement, so long awaited and so long sabotaged by the conservative forces. Last, an observation on the problems of nature, the environment, the countryside and designated green areas. The Communists have in the past waged major and memorable battles on these problems, following natural disasters or disasters caused by speculation, uncontrolled urbanization and ignorant negligence. There is a heritage of experiences and ideas. But there must be a new impetus. We cannot leave to anyone else the defense of collective and essential interests such as these.

12--Approach to Election Campaign

In the last part of his report Natta dealt with issues connected with the election campaign which, he said, will be all the more effective the better we succeed in basing it on facts, results, and struggles as well as proposals and political propaganda.

The Directorate proposes to convene the National Council on 2-3 April to discuss the approach to the elections. There are some things which should be said now, however, since it is not impossible, indeed it is to be expected, that the elections will be moved forward. The political importance of these elections, which was already obvious, has now been increased. If there is a government crisis they will become more important still. If this happens we must take care not to await its solution before launching our campaign. On the other hand, I do not believe that we should impart the character of a purely political confrontation to this campaign.

But the party absolutely must have a clear awareness of the importance of the elections. Furthermore, the specific topic of the consultation is no less important: The net result of the decentralization process, the exhausting and difficult transition to a different concept and organization of the democratic state; the net result of the decade from the attainment of the regional system to the autonomist reforms of recent years, which have not yet come into effect; the net result of a major experiment for our party and the left as a whole, during the 5 years when we put our capabilities as a leadership force to the test on a large scale, beyond the traditional and consolidated positions of government in the red regions. This was a real "test," and I believe that our party has passed it successfully!

The stakes are clear and high and demand an extraordinary commitment, Natta stressed, adding, however, that one fact has not yet been clearly and fully understood by the entire party, namely that the battle is still entirely open, that is, that the comparison with our record and the DC's record (and this applies to both North and South) provides us with advantages, arguments and weapons which we must use to the full; that events in 1979 tell us that we can not only consolidate but extend the area of leftwing democratic administrations in the regions and municipalities.

We have set an important and new example in the administration of public affairs, not only through the qualities of honesty, responsibility and dedication which have been and still are characteristic of our party, but also through a political outlook, program and method which gave priority to the demands for renewal, planned development, correctness and democratic participation. Is it really of little importance that we have guaranteed the stability of the leftwing democratic administrations for the past 5 years? It is enormously important. Let us not be intimidated by those who are now saying that "honest government" is not everything, that honesty, correctness and moral and political rigor are insufficient. We must strongly emphasize this clean and evident picture of our administrations. We must portray it as an indication and possibility of more thorough change in view of the persistence, on a national and local level, of favoritist practices and instances of immorality and corruption.

But it is not solely a matter of honest government. We have tried to impart a new character to local government through the broadest development of popular and democratic participation; through a policy of activeness in the regions and municipalities, aimed at tackling the problems of economic, urban and social development on the basis of planning, and involving the social forces in the most open manner. On the credit side in general we can point to a great capacity for achievement, for a combination of tasks, for legislative decisions and initiatives of a value and quality--in agriculture, education, public services and culture--which constitute a new and fruitful factor in development.

The general objectives which we must set ourselves, Natta concluded, are first, a resumption and strengthening of our party's positions throughout Italy for the confirmation and clearest assertion of its role as a national leadership force; second, the progress of the left, of a change in the balance of forces between the DC and the left. Consolidating and extending the leftwing democratic councils; using PCI-PSI unity everywhere to create real changes in the administrations and in government aims and methods: These are the guidelines and watchwords which we propose for the spring regional and local elections.

GOVERNMENT CONSIDERS ASKING FOR CSCE POSTPONEMENT

LD231655 Madrid in Spanish to Europe 1130 GMT 23 Mar 80 LD

[Text] According to the Madrid paper EL PAIS, the Spanish Government is studying the possibility of postponing for some months the official opening of the second phase of CSCE due to open in Madrid next November. It appears that Foreign Minister Marcelino Oreja will raise the subject at the next ministerial meeting of the Council of Europe to take place in a few days in Lisbon.

The possibility of deciding on a postponement of the conference is linked with the aim of relaxing international tension which has been centered in Europe since the invasion of Afghanistan and the emergence of the issue of the Olympic boycott. At the same time such a postponement would offer an opportunity to the new U.S. administration emerging from the presidential elections to fully participate in the preliminary discussions on the conference.

According to the newspaper, Spanish diplomatic circles point out that the Madrid government's wish is that the second phase of the conference not be turned into a forum for denunciations, which would adversely affect a detente process already harmed since it was initiated in Helsinki and later hit in Belgrade by the ideological clashes between the Russians and the Americans. The view held by Spanish diplomacy is that the EEC countries might well adopt at the coming Brussels summit a joint stance on the Madrid conference. Apparently, France has certain reservations about the conference.

CATALAN PARTY LEADERS COMMENT ON ELECTION RESULTS

[Text] A note issued by the Centrists of Catalonia [UCD] press office says the election results indicate a severe setback for the Socialists, the big losers in these elections, and for all the Marxist forces including those who presented themselves as independents and nationalists.

Rafael Arias Salgado, secretary general of the government party, also described the Socialists as the big losers and said this morning in Madrid that their defeat can be explained as the consequence of the mistaken autonomy policy pursued by the PSOE [Spanish Socialist Workers Party] in Catalonia. Speaking of his own party, he said it is maintaining its standards in previous elections regarding seats won translated into numbers of votes.

Juan Raventos, leader of the Catalan Socialists, said the elections show there has been a move to the right in Catalonia, and he attributes the drop in votes for his party to the fact that the burden of the economic crisis has weighed on a section of the Socialist electorate and pushed the vote to the right. He stressed the drop in votes for the government party but declined to make any comment on the possible political complexion of the future Executive Council of the Generalitat.

The PSUC [Unified Socialist Party of Catalonia] also issued a note this morning in which it described the election result as an important step toward full institutionalization of autonomy through parliament, and as the expression of a single community which wants self-government. The note draws attention to the high abstention rate and the powerful defeat of UCD, and repeats its proposal for unitary policies and for a unitary president.

DENMARK

DEFENSE MINISTER WANTS INTRODUCTION OF DEFENSE BILL

LD211115 Copenhagen BERLINGSKE TIDENDE in Danish 18 Mar 80 part 1 p 2 LD

[RITZAUS bureau report: "Minister Wants Defense Bill Now"]

[Text] Defense Minister Poul Sogaard would like to see the introduction of a bill for a new defense plan during the present Folketing term. He said this Monday afternoon at a press conference in Holbaek, where the minister inspected Holbaek Barracks as part of a series of visits to work places. The barracks will be at risk if part of a new defense plan requires the closure of the 2d Sjaelland Brigade.

"I am counting on a resumption of negotiations between the invited parties," the minister emphasized. "The government wants to examine the progress made hitherto. No one has been excluded, and no one has left the negotiations voluntarily."

However, the minister admitted that there is a large gap between the wishes of the Radical Liberal Party and those of the Conservatives regarding a new defense plan.

"It is wrong to discuss percentages," the minister said. "Instead we must look at the tasks that we can cope with. It will cost 3.5 billion kroner to act according to the framework contained in the plans from 1973 and 1977 and according to the wishes which have come from NATO and President Carter. No politician can imagine that we can act thus," the defense minister said.

["JB." report: "New Defense Structure Wanted"]

[Text] Defense talks should concern themselves more with new structures and an investigation of priorities than with the economic framework, Defense Minister Poul Sogaard said yesterday evening at a meeting in Holbaek. The defense minister emphasized that Denmark will not have a "miniversion of the defense forces of a great power," but rather a defense system "which meets our needs and obligations and which can fulfill the tasks which our society places upon it."

"The defense force has 40,000 employees. Wage costs alone amount to 70 percent of the running costs and 58 percent of the total budget. And in previous defense settlements, which are valid for 4 years, with their frozen economic framework this has meant difficulties with the purchase of new equipment and with the levels of staffing. It is therefore essential that in the next few months we talk more about structures and priorities than discuss by what percentage the budget is to be increased," the defense minister concluded.

Jorgensen Comments

[Unattributed report: "Anker Jorgensen Unsure About Defense Settlement"]

[Text] Prime Minister Anker Jorgensen would like to see a defense settlement before the summer recess, but he doubts whether it will be possible. He said this after a ministerial meeting yesterday, when he was asked to comment on Defense Minister Poul Sogaard's wish to complete negotiations before the summer.

FINLAND

DEFENSE MINISTER OPPOSES PURCHASE OF SOVIET REACTOR

LD211103 Stockholm DAGENS NYHETER in Swedish 19 Mar 80 p 6 LD

[Correspondent report: "Minister Wants To Halt Purchase of Reactor From Soviet Union"]

[Text] Helsinki, Tuesday 18 March--Finland's defense minister, Lasse Aikas, Central Party (KP), says "no" to plans to buy a 1,000-megawatt nuclear reactor from the Soviet Union. He considers that instead Finland ought to concentrate on alternative domestic energy sources.

Minister Aikas said in a speech recently that Finland is approaching the top of the international league in the production of nuclear energy. Therefore, it seems strange, to say the least, that a further sharp increase in the nuclear share of total energy production is planned.

He is wholly of the opinion that the power to make final decisions in matters of energy policy, especially in all questions of nuclear power, should be transferred to the Finnish parliament.

NORWAY

SOVIET PRESS ATTACKS WILL NOT CHANGE 'LOW-TENSION' POLICY

LD201325 Stockholm SVENSKA DAGBLADET in Swedish 15 Mar 80 p 6 LD

[Ingmar Lindmarker report: "Norway on Soviet Campaign: Criticism of No Significance"]

[Text] Oslo--Harsh Soviet criticism will have no significance for the future treatment of the question of contingency stockpiling of American weapons in Norway, Foreign Minister Knut Frydenlund told SVENSKA DAGBLADET on Friday.

The Norwegian foreign minister also said that plans will not be affected by the tense international situation after the intervention in Afghanistan, thereby repudiating both American and Soviet press reports.

Frydenlund made his statement in Oslo just as NATO troops got into top gear in the exercise Anopak Express in north Norway Friday. So far the rumblings of Soviet propaganda against the maneuvers have drowned out the firing practice of the 9,000 or so foreign soldiers who are taking part.

"It is indisputable that the present Soviet propaganda campaign only strengthens the Norwegian people's support for NATO," Frydenlund said. "And, unaffected by the attacks, we will follow the procedure which we have drawn up with the Americans."

The foreign minister did not want to comment on reports in Oslo that the Americans have shown greater interest since the Afghanistan crisis in the contingency stockpiling in Norway of heavy equipment for a brigade of Marines.

Reports in the American press that negotiations have entered their final phase have, however, been denied here. A preparatory military study of the project, which was completed last fall, is now being assessed in the Defense and Foreign ministries and then it will be taken up at staff level between the Norwegians and Americans. Political negotiations have thus not even begun. Knut Frydenlund also said that it is impossible at present to know when such negotiations can begin.

In the last month the Soviet mass media has almost daily accused Norwegian political and military chiefs of increasing tension in north Europe in various ways. Frydenlund considers, however, that he must distinguish in his work between what is written in the press and official policy, where the Russians' approach is less outspoken.

"I am hopeful about the Russian proposal for negotiations to define the border in the Barents Sea," Frydenlund said. "I hope it means that the Russians have the same attitude as we do toward the situation in the northern areas, that is, a desire to solve the problems by negotiation and to insure that the exacerbation of the international situation does not adversely affect relations between Norway and the Soviet Union."

The long series of Soviet press attacks and the Barents Sea initiative have led to considerable uncertainty in Norwegian opinion regarding Moscow's intentions. Whereas Knut Frydenlund is acting on the initiative for opening new negotiations, Reiulf Steen, trade minister and chairman of the Labor Party, is less enthusiastic. Steen told SVENSKA DAGBLADET that a precondition for the success of the self-imposed policy of low tension in north Norway is that the Russians understand and accept it. The aims of the policy cannot be achieved if it is subjected to continued attack.

"Low tension" is partly the absence of foreign troops and atomic weapons from Norwegian territory in peacetime, and partly limitations on the NATO allies' ability to hold exercises and operate in the far north. The Norwegians want to avoid at all costs provoking the Russians and instead to contribute to the preservation of detente in Scandinavia.

"There could arise a situation here when purely military arguments could weigh extremely heavily," said Steen, who as recently as December had talks in Moscow on the international situation with the top ideologist in the Politburo, Mikhail Suslov, and other officials. "The only counterargument we would have in such a case is to point out that the low-tension policy has brought results. We are dealing with a region that is one of the most strategically important in the whole world, and therefore a buildup of tension would be dangerous."

Both Steen and Frydenlund say that the policy followed hitherto must be continued. According to the foreign minister, the low-tension policy is such a firm element in Norwegian foreign policy that it will not be affected either by Soviet press attacks or by the increase in international tension.

NORTH SEA OIL ESTIMATES 'SHARPLY INCREASED'

WA211515 REUTER in English 1459 GMT 21 Mar 80 WA

[Text] Oslo, Norway, March 21, REUTER--Norway today sharply increased estimates of its recoverable offshore oil reserves and said it would earn 56 billion dollars in taxes and royalties over the next five years. A Finance Ministry spokesman said the earnings figure was based on Norway's plans to increase taxation on oil companies operating on the Norwegian continental shelf. Under existing tax rules the income is estimated at 46 billion dollars.

The Petroleum Directorate estimated the reserves south of the 62nd parallel at 4.5 to 5.5 billion tons of oil equivalents, compared with last year's estimate of 3.9 to 5.1 billion.

Oil Minister Bjartmar Gjerde told a press conference that reduced estimates of oil and gas reserves in the North Sea Ekofisk Field by the Phillips Petroleum Company yesterday did not affect Norway's estimates of oil reserves and income. "The estimates made by the companies have always been significantly higher than those of the Norwegian Government," Mr Gjerde said.

SWEDEN

REFERENDUM APPROVES DEVELOPMENT OF NUCLEAR ENERGY

LD240848 Helsinki Domestic Service in Finnish 0800 GMT 24 Mar 80 LD

[Text] Sweden is preparing to commission new nuclear power plants following yesterday's referendum in which the majority of Swedes gave their support to the use of nuclear energy. Prime Minister Thorbjorn Falldin declared last night that he will respect the referendum result even though he personally is against nuclear energy. It is believed that the referendum results will prove awkward for Falldin since the antinuclear policy of the Center Party, of which he is leader, only secured 38.6 percent of the votes. A total of 58 percent of those who voted supported alternatives one and two which stand for the development of nuclear energy. The referendum result means that Sweden will have a total of 12 nuclear powerplants.

PRIME MINISTER SPEAKS IN ANNUAL FOREIGN POLICY DEBATE

LD201251 Stockholm SVENSKA DAGBLADET in Sweden 13 Mar 80 p 4 LD

[Elisabeth Crona report: "Foreign Policy Statement on Disarmament: Sweden Wants European Conference"]

[Text] Sweden is prepared to host a European disarmament conference. The government will discuss the question with other countries. This news was announced by Foreign Minister Ola Ullsten during the annual foreign policy debate on Wednesday. Another announcement to the Swedish people and to the many foreign diplomats sitting in the Riksdag gallery was that Sweden will soon set up diplomatic relations with Zimbabwe and establish an embassy in Salisbury.

But the starting point for the government's declaration which introduced the debate on foreign policy was the Soviet intervention in Afghanistan:

"Before Afghanistan the Soviet Union had never entered another country with its own troops to strengthen its position in the Third World," Ullsten said. "The invasion probably means the end of the type of detente policy which was introduced during the early seventies."

The declaration advocates a concerted program for European disarmament. Ullsten believes that the idea for a conference on the subject has become urgent.

In carefully worded terms the declaration touched on the security situation in Scandinavia:

"Our contribution to the preservation of the pattern of security in Scandinavia includes the task of maintaining a strong defense force."

The foreign minister then criticized Israel's settlement policy and called it "a growing threat to the Israeli Government's international reputation":

"We therefore urge the Israeli Government to follow the UN appeal to halt the settlements in the areas occupied since 1987." [as published]

"It is as friends of Israel that we make this exhortation," he added.

Regarding Zimbabwe Ola Ullsten said: "The elections there show that the process of liberation in southern Africa cannot be halted. Attempts to delay this process only prolong the suffering and increase the risk of a bloody final solution."

ROLANDHIS OUTLINES DEVELOPMENTS IN NATIONAL ISSUE

NC211015 Nicosia Public Information Office in English 20 Mar 80 NC

[Press release of speech by Foreign Minister Nikos Rolandhis at a Rotary Club dinner in Limassol on 20 March]

[Text] Speaking at the opening session of the Commonwealth heads of government meeting in Lusaka, in August 1979, the prime minister of Singapore, Lee Kuan Yew, inter alia said:

"For the first time in human history wars are not fought in isolation. They are part of an inter-reacting world.... The whole of humanity is passing through one of its most turbulent periods of change in its history. There are no precedents or examples from the past. Science and technology have created a completely different world."

The Cyprus problem is a problem which concerns a very small country which, however, is situated in an important area and consequently could not avoid and has not avoided the inexorable laws set out in the above extract. The invasion of Cyprus, the war, the occupation, are an eruption of one of the many craters scorching the universe with their lava. The volcanic mass at the bottom is the same for all. Our country has been devastated by international upheavals and the hypocricy of man who has been continuously building temples to justice and morality, but is using them to store arms and lethal weapons.

There is no point in making a historical analysis of the Cyprus problem, for it is something that you all live with every day. The Cyprus people are facing a problem which the United States secretary of state, Mr. Cyrus Vance, on February 5, 1980, one day before my latest meeting with him, described as "a thorny and difficult one." What is the reason for this? Is it our continuous declarations that we are ready to go to the negotiating table in goodwill, on the basis of what has already been agreed? Is it the statements we have been making since June 1979, i.e. since the matter was first raised, that we are ready to discuss at the negotiating table all matters to be put forward by the other side, including bizonality and the security of Turkish Cypriots? Is it the rapprochment measures we have announced? Or is it the statements by the other side that bayonets will not be removed by peace talks, the cries for the declaration of a state and for legalisation of the faits accomplis of partition--cries echoed in Cyprus over the last year?

The problem is thorny and difficult. The question is who is cultivating the thorns. Goodwill and flexibility or bayonets and demands for partition?

Some may say that our flexibility is not enough. Though the Turks have not so far proposed anything bearing even a semblance of federation, while we have presented proposals and we are ready to discuss everything, some may argue that we have to go still much further. We must, it is supported, accept proposals practically equating the 18 percent to the 82 percent of the population and dividing the two communities.

In such a case I am afraid, dear friends, we will reach to the other extreme, that is a national rigor mortis.

"The end of all political efforts," Dag Hammarskjold once said, "must be the well-being of the individual in a life of safety and freedom". This is our target too, our line, our path. It is a difficult path, as I shall explain later on, and its end is hidden behind the enigmatic Turkish mask and the bayonets all along the Attila line. However, in order to make a better and ind-depth appraisal of our problem and reach conclusions, it is expedient to look into the facts of our political problem. As in all cases, the method of pinpointing and evaluating the facts frankly and honestly is the safest. All of you, who have done me the honour of coming here tonight to listen to me, are politicians, scientists, businessmen, or executives and you know very well, each from your own experience, the importance of finding out the facts.

I shall, therefore, proceed to examine the main elements and facts affecting the Cyprus problem:

Question One: Turkey

The first essential prerequisite is to know our opponent, that is Turkey, who, by the presence of her troops in Cyprus has created the problem. It is a country ninety times bigger than Cyprus both in area and in population. Since the beginning of the century, that is for 80 years now, the Turkish Army has been directly involving itself in the internal affairs of the country. Thus a deeply-rooted military establishment has been created in Turkey. For years now, the country has been rocked by political instability, religious fanaticism, economic disorganisation and internal anarchy and insecurity. Political murders are committed at a rate of 2,000 a year. These murders have recently included the killing of soldiers. The present minority government of Demirel relies on Erbakan's and Turkes' votes. Next Saturday polling will start for the election of a new president of Turkey. However, it is doubtful whether after the election there will be political stability in the country, given that Erbakan has already stated that he will withdraw his support from Demirel one month after the election of the new president.

The recovery of the economy of the country seems problematic, despite the gigantic campaign for aid launched in the Western countries. Turkey needs $3.5 billion a year for oil, $1.7 billion for iron, steel and fertilisers, $2.5 billion to set the wheels of the economy moving. This adds up to a total of $7.7 billion. Moreover, since the population has been growing at a rate of about 1 million a year, investments should be made to create new jobs for 400,000 people annually. These investments require a capital amounting to $2 billion. Finally, Turkey has an external debt of $18 billion and interest on this debt amounts to $2 billion a year.

In the military field, the new American-Turkish agreement initialled in Ankara on 10 January 1980, provides for:

(A) Renewal of the requipment of the Turkish Armed Forces in accordance with NATO standards. It should be noted that the Turkish Army is 500,000 men strong.

(B) Supply of 172 aircraft to Turkey and aircraft spare-parts worth $50 million.

(C) Supply of new Leopard tanks and armour as well as other arms and electronic equipment.

(D) Operation of the very important monitoring bases which form part of the 84 bases of the NATO ADGE [Air Defense Ground Environment] system, stretching over a distance of 6,000 klm from Norway to Turkey.

The country is considered very important for the Western alliance and for this reason the aid provided by Western countries every year takes the form of a rescue operation.

Question Two: Greece

Greece is no doubt the counter-balance strengthening our struggle. Her presence in Eastern Mediterranean and the importance of this presence make the world community and Turkey in particular attach greater importance to the Cyprus problem and view it more seriously. The fraternal feelings of the Greek people and the leading and enlightened personality of Mr Karamanlis are a source of inspiration and hope for Cyprus. The existence of a well organised Greek Army, the political and economic robustness of the country and the present note-worthy position of Greece in Europe, give Cyprus a dimension disporportionate to its size.

Question Three: Our Geopolitical Area

Greece, Turkey and Cyprus, although belonging to two different political worlds, all three border on an area which might become the scene of most spectacular developments in the 1980's. Situated at the crossroads of three continents, on the borders of the two world blocs, in proximity to the whirlpool of Arab political struggles and the now emerging openings of Islam and at a stone's throw from the largest known oil deposits in the world, all three countries cannot but be in the focus of attention of the protagonists of political developments. Every move, every change, every upheaval in the area covered by the three countries, could prove a catalyst or fatal to the interests of the big powers.

This is why our arguments to those who pull the strings aim at broadening their interest and extending it to cover the stability of the area instead of limiting it to Turkey. This is an argument found to be sound and accepted by foreign governments. Some high-level influence has been used in the direction of Ankara. The only thing achieved so far has been to restrain the present situation and avert further aggravation. Our efforts will be continued. Every new pressure on the levers of influence gives a new impetus and a new hope.

Question Four: National Survival and Efforts for a Solution

If we are to hope for a solution to the Cyprus problem we must first survive nationally and economically. The foundation for our national, political and economic survival, under occupation conditions, is the resolutions of the United Nations and the recognition of our state by all countries in the world. These resolutions, for which we are deeply grateful to the nonaligned and socialist countries, serve the above sacred purpose.

Can there be a solution through these resolutions? The honest answer is that as things are today, there can be no solution. For as proved time and again, no one can set the U.N. executive mechanisms in motion.

Therefore, since the United Nations resolutions are not implemented and since a military confrontation in the light of the facts I referred to earlier is utopian, the only way out is that of the intercommunal dialogue. Unfortunately all our efforts in this field have so far failed, because Turkey's military supremacy is not used only for military oppression but also for political coercion.

Mr Denktas, barricading behind Turkish tanks, feels he can open his mouth and say whatever he likes. To agree today and to retract tomorrow. To make promises and break them. To judge, criticise and censure at will. To jeer at world bodies and their decisions. To stall or make haste depending on his interests. To respect nothing. To open every now and then Pandora's box, not caring about the consequences.

This situation is really disappointing because in practice the solution must come from an agreement between the two parties and its viability will depend on mutual respect and the understanding to be displayed under the roof of the federal state.

I would not like to reach conclusions before referring to the Western framework, which some circles have recently turned into a bastion of struggle. I am not going to analyse the framework, because this has already been done, but I shall say certain things on the matter reflecting the government's position.

(A) The government position on the plan is that set out in the press release of January 21, 1980. I repeat it:

"The government has rejected the Western framework as a basis for negotiations because of its content. But it accepted to discuss it as a non-committing working paper together with other proposals, provided that the resettlement of the Varosha inhabitants would take place parallel to the start of the talks. This is clear from the minutes of the talks the minister of foreign affairs, Mr Rolandhis, had with the U.N. secretary-general, Dr Waldheim, and the U.S. deputy-secretary of state, Mr Christopher.

Finally, Dr Waldheim, under whose auspices the talks would take place, prepared and presented to both parties a plan of his own, in which reference is made both to the American framework and the resettlement of the varosha inhabitants.

The Waldheim plan was immediately accepted by the government."

(B) As clearly stated in the said press release, both Dr Waldheim and Mr Christopher were informed of our position, as explained in the press release. I gave both of them written texts containing the above views.

(C) There has never been a question of accepting the framework even as a non-committing working paper, outside the U.N. framework, nor was such a thing ever asked of us.

(D) It was never Mr Denktas's intention to allow return of the Varosha inhabitants without significant political exchanges that would bind Cyrpus and all its people forever. This Mr Denktas made absolutely clear on January 9, 1979, by setting conditions and demanding lifting of the so-called economic blockade and for political truce, in reply to the provisions of the Waldheim plan for Varosha. In other words, Mr Denktas more or less told us:

"If you allow me to sell freely the oranges, the potatoes and generally all products belonging to your farmers, if you allow me to legally open your hotels and your industries as well as the ports and airports of the country, if, in short, you accept that I rightfully hold what I have taken and even if moreover you abandon your efforts at international organisations so that you may one day cease to be a government and we both may end in becoming two equal separate administrations, then and only then shall I consider the Varosha issue."

It is a pity really, that some are trying to impress the unfortunate Famagusta refugees, by saying that the Turkish side, which continuously speaks of bayonets and faits accomplis and has for years now been propagating the idea of partition, could ever accept to open Varosha without nationally disastrous exchanges, inspired merely by goodwill.

These are the facts. On the basis of these facts I shall give you my conclusions:

1. A solution to the Cyprus problem through military confrontation must be ruled out. Such an attempt would lead to the complete destruction of Cyprus.

2. The U.N. resolutions are essential for the maintenance of our existence as a political and economic entity, but there is no way to implement them, at least as things are today.

3. Turkey is a difficult and inflexible negotiator. The political weakness of its government from time to time, anarchy and economic chaos make her more reluctant to take serious political decisions. Her geographical position is such that others rush to secure for her plenty of economic assistance.

4. Greece is a dynamic presence and a political prop for us.

5. Our geographical position is valuable and for this reason we shall not manage, no matter what we do, to keep foreign interests and concern away from our country. The eye or the eyes of some "big brothers" will always be turned to our area.

6. In spite of these difficulties, an effort must be made to find a solution to the Cyprus problem through the intercommunal talks, without deviation from our agreed targets for a sovereign, independent, territorially integral, non-aligned, bicommunal and biregional federal state. We must, however, bear in mind that the military superiority of the other side is translated into political inflexibility which sometimes borders on irrationality. I agree with those who shout that we should solve our problem soon. But in order to solve it we must reach an agreement with the other side. We cannot solve our problem by agreeing with ourselves.

7. As long as the talks are kept within the framework of the United Nations we should not rule out help from other countries. On the contrary, we must ask for it.

8. If this time too Mr. Denktas continues to speak of bayonets and partition and the secretary-general's effort fails, then I believe that the whole situation should be reassessed by the National Council. It is the duty of the party leaders to set out to the president and the government their positions in a responsible, clear and straightforward manner. The views of the Greek Government must also be heard and assessed. As a competent minister I underline that the national dangers are grave if Turkey means what she says and is seeking to attain it. Therefore, instead of slogans, political verbalism and empty rhetoric, it is preferable and advisable for parties to set out their positions to the government and to co-operate in the struggle for the salvation of their country. And this struggle needs a practical and realistic approach on the one hand and awareness of the values of life and our responsibilities to history, on the other.

KLIRIDHIS APPROVES BIZONAL, BIREGIONAL FEDERAL SYSTEM

NC240922 Istanbul GUNAYDIN in Turkish 20 Mar 80 p 5 NC

[Report by Resat Akar from Nicosia]

[Excerpts] The Greek Cypriot opposition leader, Glavkos Kliridhis, has stated that he approves of both a biregional and bizonal federal system as a solution to the Cyprus dispute.

Kliridhis told GUNAYDIN that any settlement to be agreed upon in the Cyprus dispute should give the economic and security problems of the Turkish Cypriot community and those of the Greek Cypriot community equal priority. He added: "By the term bizonal, I mean that there will be two separate regions, one being administered by the Greek Cypriots and the other by the Turkish Cypriots, as well as a central federal government in which both communities should be represented."

Mr Kliridhis advocates a federal system in which there should be freedom of movement. This is the only point on which he differs from the Turkish Cypriot interpretation of federal system. Mr Kliridhis added that he continued to believe that although the Cyprus issue appears to be difficult, a settlement could be found provided that the intercommunal talks are based on good will.

Stating that another meeting between Denktas and Kiprianou could be useful in starting the intercommunal talks, Mr Kliridhis added: "Instead of having separate talks with UN Secretary General Kurt Waldheim, the two leaders should sit at the conference table and exchange views. I believe many differences could thus be eliminated." Replying to a question as to whether he thought Kiprianou was capable of filling the vacuum created by Makarios' death, Greek Cypriot opposition leader Kliridhis said: "Kiprianou has definitely failed to fill that vacuum. As I have said on several occasions, the Kiprianou government should resign and new general elections should be held. There is no other way out."

TURKISH PAPER ARRANGES KLIRIDHIS-CAGATAY MEETING

[Report by Resat Akar from Nicosia]

[Text] GUNAYDIN has arranged a meeting between Mustafa Cagatay, National Unity Party leader and TFSC prime minister and the main Greek Cypriot opposition party leader, Glavkos Kliridhis, in Nicosia sometime next week.

Responding to a call from Mr Kliridhis, leader of the Democratic Rally Party and former Greek Cypriot negotiator in the intercommunal talks, TFSC Prime Minister Mustafa Cagatay said: "I am prepared to meet Mr Kliridhis on the premises of our party on a date to be specified by GUNAYDIN. I wish to believe that such a meeting will be useful in that it may register certain developments in the Cyprus dispute."

Following the positive response of the TFSC prime minister to such a meeting, Mr Kliridhis thanked GUNAYDIN for taking this initiative which could bring about an amelioration in the Cyprus issue; he said: "The Honorable Cagatay's positive approach has pleased me. I believe that this meeting, being arranged through your mediation, will be very useful and that it will arouse deep worldwide interest. I am prepared to meet Honorable Cagatay at a date and place to be fixed."

The leader of the main Greek Cypriot opposition party added that he has already begun preparations with his experts so that all aspects of the Cyprus dispute may be tackled.

[Excerpt] Mr Glavkos Kliridhis, the leader of the Greek Cypriot opposition [democratic] rally party, said that he would respond to an invitation from Mr Cagatay to meet him in the north as leader of the ruling Turkish Cypriot "National Unity Party" if an invitation was communicated to him.

Mr Kliridhis was commenting on a report by the Turkish Cypriot Bayrak Radio quoting Mr Cagatay, who is the leader of the National Unity Party and the "prime minister of the self-proclaimed Turkish Federated State" in the north, that he could meet Mr Kliridhis at the National Unity Party headquarters as the leader of the party.

The Rally Party leader told the Cyprus MAIL that he has had no communication with Mr Cagatay, but during a TV interview with the Cyprus broadcasting corporation he had suggested that meetings between the leaders of the parties on the two sides would create a climate of understanding conducive to a peaceful settlement.

Recently he had a call from a Turkish journalist, Mr Kliridhis said, who reminded him of the suggestion and he replied that he stood by the idea.

Asked what his stand now would be, Mr Kliridhis said that if a communication was received he would respond, accepting the invitation.

Mr Cagatay's statement coincided with the publication in the Turkish mainland AYDINLIK of an interview of Mr Kliridhis with its correspondent Erdogan Ozbalikci.

WORLD ISLAMIC CONGRESS OFFICIAL BACKS TURKISH CYPRIOTS

TA231914 (Clandestine) Bayrak Radio in Turkish to Cyprus 1530 GMT 23 Mar 80 TA

[Text] The secretary general of the World Islamic Congress, In'amullah Khan, said that the Muslim Turkish Cypriot community is not a minority. He added, These people want to live in their own region, in peace. They do not want to usurp the rights of the Greek Cypriots.

In'amullah Khan, who is in the Turkish Federated State of Cyprus to attend the eighth session of the World Islamic Congress, which will begin in Gazimogasa [Famagusta] tomorrow, told TRT that the World Islamic Congress wants all the problems of the Turkish Cypriot community to be resolved peacefully. He also said that he was in the Turkish Federated State of Cyprus to advance the Turkish Cypriot view, which envisages the existence of the two communities in their own regions peacefully and with neighborly relations.

RALLIS, U.S. EMBASSY REACT TO KARAMANLIS LETTER ISSUE

[Text] The Foreign Ministry describes the issue of the alleged Karamanlis letter to Carter as nonexistent and ridiculous.

However, as a ministry statement mentions, because provocations continued again yesterday, Minister G. Rallis made the following statement:

"This entire story confirms the theory of the absurd because they are asking the government to do something which they can do. Either they have the letter, in which case it is their duty and in their interest to publish it, or they do not have it, in which case everything that has been reported was reported for reasons for which the government is not aware."

In addition, a U.S. Embassy spokesman yesterday announced the following:

"We do not consider it right to comment on a serialized correspondence or anything else that is reported as diplomatic correspondence."

PAPER WARNS AGAINST FOSTERING GREATER ANTI-WEST SENTIMENT

[Editorial: "Margins Are Narrowing"]

[Text] In testimony before the U.S. Senate Foreign Relations Committee, U.S. Assistant Secretary for European Affairs Vest, in reply to a question by Senator Claiborne Pell said that Greece's return to the Atlantic alliance's military wing under the terms and conditions that were in force before its withdrawal in August 1974 was not possible. He added that at least a segment of the Atlantic alliance's council would object to Greece's return under the 1974 terms and that, after all, the "administrative structure" since then had changed. He said that "it concerned a complex issue and that agreement was required by all alliance members on operational arrangements."

If we are not wrong, this means that from now on the Atlantic alliance as such, and not merely Turkey, precludes Greece's return to the alliance's military wing under terms and prerequisites which would simultaneously support the alliance's interests and guarantee Greece's sovereign rights and security in its national area. Of course, from the moment when, reneging on the original Haig-Davos agreement, the alliance's military leadership adopted the Turkish demands which were embodied in the later Haig and Rogers plans which were rejected by the Greek Government, the alliance placed the dispute between itself and Greece. The new element contributed by Assistant Secretary Vest's statement the day before yesterday was the formalization of this "position" of the Atlantic Alliance (specifically of the power which dominates the alliance) toward the question of our country's return to the military wing. This element is constructive in the sense that it contributes to the clarification of affairs and positions of all interested parties.

At this point we shall not repeat everything which at times--even recently--we have stressed on this issue. What we shall say is that the margins of time for a final solution of the issue one way or another are now very narrow. Greek "positions" are known and "declared" and consequently, Greece does not intend to undertake an initiative or submit any proposals. It is up to the Atlantic alliance, if it wants and if it has something essentially different from the "plans" it has so far proposed and which Greece has rejected, to undertake an initiative. [paragraph continues]

That is, it must propose something that will agree with Greek "positions" as they were crystallized in the original Haig-Davos agreement and which both serves the alliance--as it emerges from their original acceptance before Ankara's "veto" interfered--and guarantees Greece's legal rights and security. The proposals--if there are any--must be submitted within a reasonable time because the futile perpetuation of the outstanding issue is not possible, nor does it serve anyone or anything.

However, let the interested parties beware--if not for any other reason, at least so as not to work in vain and waste their time. The Greek Government will agree to nothing that will constitute even a possible or "forcible" design on Greece's legal and acquired rights, its security and sovereignty in its national area or the existence of greater Hellenism. It will not accept "discounts" on the substance and it will not be lured by possibly "sweetened" proposals which through skillful formulation may appear acceptable, but deep down could hide traps and in any event would not correspond to the substance of legal and legitimate Greek interests.

Let the "interested parties" also know something else which recently we have repeatedly noted: Their bias, that is, toward Turkey, and especially the adoption or even toleration of Turkey's hegemonistic designs against the Greek area, cultivates justifiable anti-Western feelings among all Greek people including the conservative and traditionally pro-Western segment of the people and the equally conservative and pro-Western ruling class. The relevant process started at the time when some of our powerful "friends" and "protectors" and the alliance of which Greece is a member adopted the well-known position toward the enslaving 7-year dictatorship and, subsequently, toward the Turkish aggression in Cyprus.

Their position on the issue of Greece's relations with the alliance and on Turkey's position toward our country naturally deepens and broadens these processes which--we reiterate--are not localized among only one segment with a definite political-social ideology and position, but extended to the whole of Greek society and its leadership. This transformation could be concretized into political action through the formation of a corresponding political reality in Greece--even if the majority were to remain with the rather or relatively conservative segment of the political world which has been (and still is) the agent of the country's heretofore basic international orientations.

ATHENS NEWS REPORTS GREEK-TURKISH DISPUTE OVER AIR RULES

[Text] Greece and Turkey have disagreed over the interpretation of international regulations governing the flights of military aircraft in the FIR, with Greece supporting the view that "military aircraft have to submit flight plans before entering the FIR".

The Greek view was stated by authoritative circles in Athens, commenting on a Turkish Foreign Ministry statement on the issue.

The statement issued by the Turkish Foreign Ministry referred to the Greek press reports of March 19 on the Turkish exercises in the Aegean which, according to the statement, had said that Turkey had not notified Greece of the flights of the Turkish war planes, that Turkey had not sought the Greek Government's permission for the exercises, that the Greek airspace had been violated, and that some Turkish planes had been stopped by Greek fighter planes.

The Turkish planes, the statement said, carried out exercise flights during the maneuvers, code-named "Sea Wolf-'80'" in the Aegean international airspace. According to the ICAO [International Civil Aviation Organization] international regulations, the Turkish planes do not have to notify their flights in advance, before entering the Athens FIR area, the Turkish statement asserted, adding that the Greek claims "are unfounded and untrue."

It further asserted that the Greek press reports were based on Greece's "unilateral position, which runs counter to the ICAO regulations." The Turkish aircraft flew in the international air space and did not enter Greek air space, the statement said, adding that the claims that the Turkish aircraft were chased by Greek planes "have absolutely nothing to do with reality."

Commenting on the Turkish statement, authoritative Athens circles pointed out that "this is the Turkish interpretation, which Greece does not accept, of the international regulations."

Greece, the circles added, has strong arguments supporting its view that military aircraft have to submit their flight plans before entering a FIR. The circles said also that Greece has not claimed that Turkish planes were stopped by Greek fighters, but merely that they were identified.

Wednesday's government statement on the violation of Greek air space over the Aegean by Turkish war planes was yesterday described as "soft, diplomatic, formal and kind" by the main opposition PASOK party.

It is clear, a PASOK announcement said, that such a move of a broad military form by the Turkish Air Force "had the consent of those who have inspired the Rogers plan", and that it was designed as a test for the implementation of that plan, with a view to creating faits accomplis.

The PASOK statement asserted that the government shouldered enormous responsibilities "by adopting methods of secret diplomacy in matters concerning the survival of the Greek people."

PAPANDREOU'S MANHEIM SPEECH CAUSES 'CLASH' WITH GOVERNMENT

AT231844 Athens I KATHIMERINI in Greek 23 Mar 80 pp 1, 3 AT

[Text] A severe political clash with the government was caused yesterday by A. Papandreou at a time when all parties suspect the existence of a destabilization effort in progress, originating in unknown centers overseas. It is indicative that EDA [United Democratic Left] Chairman Ilias Iliou stated yesterday that according to indications the questioned text of Karamanlis' letter to Carter was fabricated in Ankara. At the same time--as a result of the statements by Vest on the Aegean--similar statements were made by other parties while Foreign Minister Rallis, speaking at a "New Democracy" gathering on the island of Khios, appealed for national unity of spirit. The reason for this political clash was provided by yesterday's speech by Papandreou at Mannheim, West Germany. He launched a severe criticism against the government's policy both on domestic and foreign issues. The government's reply was equally severe and lengthy, expressing its regret because "the PASOK chairman is not satisfied with undermining the government's task but he also slanders the government overseas."

Referring to foreign affairs, the PASOK chairman said the Greek Government must not only cease all form of dialog on our return with NATO but it must also denounce both NATO and the United States for the policy they follow at the expense of our sovereign rights.

He then accused the Americans of attempting to limit our sovereign rights in the Aegean and that these tactics are revealed by the recent statements of the U.S. Undersecretary Vest.

Karamanlis and his government, Papandreou added, have the elemental duty to abandon all forms of dialog and must warn the Americans to start preparations for the evacuation of their bases. At the same time he also accused the government of not answering the questions raised by the revelation that the Haig-Davos agreement provided for reducing our national airspace from 10 to 6 miles.

Addressing himself to Prime Minister Karamanlis he said the prime minister has two duties: One--to fully and basically brief the nation on whether there is a preparation of solutions which would fundamentally weaken the present status in the Aegean and on whether the recent Turkish Air Force exercise is a form of implementation of these preparations.

Two--to stop immediately any discussion with NATO and with Turkey and to delcare that Greece withdraws from NATO this time finally and irrevocably.

At the same time Papandreou also referred to the recent reports in TO VIMA about assurances to the Americans allegedly provided by a "person in a high position" about limiting national airspace.

On domestic affairs he severely criticized the government's economic policy and repeated that the crisis could be dealt with through implementation of his party's program.

The Government Reply

On being asked about the speech by PASOK Chairman Papandreou in Germany the government spokesman made the following statement:

"One is surprised that the PASOK chairman is not tired of continuously repeating the same things, things which have tired even his own followers. He has received mouth-closing replies on all these contradictory statements.

"Papandreou continuously talks of protecting national dignity. He must at long last come to realize that the government and the people have always protected our sovereign rights even with arms when it was necessary.

"Naturally the government does not pursue the policy of 'sink the Hora' which, when used on secondary issues, which in any case cede no rights to third parties, could lead to adventures with unknown consequences. In any case Papandreou himself new forgets some of these slogans which he has used in the past.

"He talks to us about strengthening national sovereign rights over Aegean international airspace. Papandreou knows very well how the issue stands but he insists because he also knows that the government is not likely to endanger existing national position in an effort to follow him in a demagogic dialog.

"By following a strictly press reportage procedure he distorts even the words of the press report itself according to which 'persons in high government positions' allegedly supplied certain assurances to the United States. And now he talks of 'one person in a high government position.' Neither the singular nor the plural tense justify any supposed revelation.

"'New democracy' has a monolithic unity. What the government says on national issues particularly, is repeated by all its members. Perhaps Papandreou, judging others on the basis of his own example, dreams of a parallelism between the disagreements which exist within PASOK and the unity of spirit which is characteristic of the government's action.

What Papandreou said in Germany is of the very same quality. However, Papandreou also referred to the country's economic program and to PASOK's program. One could observe that since PASOK lost its credibility as a result of its profuse promises to all and sundry, it is now attempting to gain the public's confidence by trying to reclose the bags of Aelous' winds which it unleashed.

In reference to Greeks abroad, the PASOK chairman, like a new miracle worker, provided with his usual ease simple and disoriented solutions to complicated and complex problems. On its part the government awaits with great interest the presentation to the Chamber of Deputies of the draft bill he is announcing. If, however, Papandreou believes that magic will solve the various problems of emigration, vote, education and so forth, he is not only mistaken but he is also deceiving every single Greek taxpayer because, naturally, it is the taxpayer who will have to pay what Papandreou so earily promises, in order to create sensations.

It is truly sad because the PASOK chairman does not limit himself to undermining the government's task at home but he also makes the mistake of slandering it overseas.

KKE OPPOSITION RAPS 'TOTAL DEPENDENCE' ON USSR

DEMIREL COMMENTS ON LOANS, DEFENSE AGREEMENT, ELECTIONS

TA211919 Ankara Domestic Service in Turkish 1600 GMT 21 Mar 80 TA

[Begin Demirel recording] The country is on the way to ending shortages and reviving its economy. The result of the work we did within the past 3 or 4 months is promising. The Central Bank is functioning again. Some $600 million has been transferred, some $1.5 billion has been used to purchase oil, and we have so far secured sufficient resources to solve our problems. The FRG has decided to extend to us the $250 million of the $300 million, which it will confirm during the OECD meeting on 26 March, as a bridging loan. I hope that this money will reach our coffers today. [end recording]

Demirel said that Denmark has also adopted the solution of extending a bridging loan to Turkey and that other countries will adopt the same policy. Pointing out that the IMF will release a further $50 million slice of the loan and thus a $101 million portion from various banks will also be available, Demirel announced that the $200 million World Bank loan will be approved on 25 March. Demirel noted that an $800 million loan will have been secured in addition to the $700 million which is urgently needed for the implemented economic stability program. Noting that Turkey's targets are production and investment, Demirel said that his government will transform Turkey so that it considers its future as well as its present.

Replying to questions, the prime minister expressed the hope that the defense cooperation agreement with the United States will be signed by 31 March. In reply to another question, Demirel said that Turkey has entrusted a large section of its army, its police force and its gendarmerie with the prevention of anarchic incidents and that the press should assist the state on this subject.

On Dialog With Ecevit

[Text] Prime Minister Suleyman Demirel held his weekly meeting with President Fahri Koruturk. After the 1 hour long meeting at 1100, Demirel gave information to reporters on various issues. On the issues of presidential elections Demirel said the following:

[Begin Demirel recording] A regime is composed of rules and regulations. A president cannot be elected through a dialog. A dialog can be established when the time is ripe. I do not say that I do not wish to establish a dialog. However, the election has not yet begun. It will begin tomorrow. If there are various methods which might facilitate the elections within the democratic principles, then we might resort to them. However, as I have already pointed out, the Turkish Grand National Assembly has been able to solve all of Turkey's significant problems to date. This issue will also be solved. I am not the one to elect a president, the new president. In other words, the Grand National Assembly is going to elect the president. I do not control the willpower of the parliament. It is not controlled by anyone else either. Therefore it is impossible to bring together these two people to elect the president.

Even [presumably the nation's] preferences are not yet clear. Had the preferences been clear then one could consider following a course leading to various results. However, the preferences are not known at the moment. I do not know them, neither does any one else. If the dialog is nothing but a show for the public then this institution will lose its future effectiveness. A dialog is not an end in itself. It is rather a means to an end. In other words, it is a means to help facilitate the elections. If the dialog becomes an end in itself then the elections are cast aside. [end recording]

ECEVIT STRESSES IMPORTANCE OF ELECTING PRESIDENT ON TIME

[Text] In a news conference he held today, main opposition party leader Bulent Ecevit summarized the RPP's views regarding the election of a new president:

[Begin Ecevit recording] The RPP has made moves and held contacts in a bid to facilitate the speedy emergence of the Grand National Assembly's will on this issue. It is clear that our initiative is not related to the wish to cast a shadow over or direct the will of the parliament. Since the election will be held through a secret ballot, this is not even possible. In our opinion, the necessary and important thing is to facilitate the emergence of the free will of the parliament through interparty and intergroup dialog. It is probably beneficial to conclude the election of the president within the 15 days stipulated by the Constitution, that is before the end of the Honorable Koruturk's term. If the results are not known until then, then the doubts and discussions which could result from this could needlessly aggravate the issue of the presidency. This is our concern.

I believe that the authority of the president should not be belittled. In our present atmosphere of crisis, the importance of the presidency and the authorities of the president are even greater. It is still early to say that the presidential election will constitute a new cause for crisis or that it will add a new dimension to the existing crisis. I am not pessimistic on this subject. However, we tried and we are still trying to fulfill our duty concerning the speedy conclusion of this election in view of the present situation. [end recording]

PARLIAMENT POSTPONES ELECTION OF PRESIDENT TO 25 MARCH

TA221307 Ankara Domestic Service in Turkish 1300 GMT 22 Mar 80 TA

[Text] Ballots were not cast at today's joint session of the Republican Senate and the National Assembly because no presidential candidates were nominated. National Assembly President Cahit Karakas, who was chairing the session, said that casting of ballots will begin even without any nominations provided there is no opposition. Following the opposition of various members, Karakas adjourned the meeting until Tuesday, 25 March, when the presidential election will be held.

NSP CLAIMS DEMIREL WANTS PRESIDENTIAL ELECTION DELAY

[Text] National Salvation Party [NSP] deputy leader Fehmi Cumalioglu said that it was obvious that the presidential elections, which began in parliament today, would go on and on. In a written statement issued in Ankara today, Cumalioglu said that it was leaked to his party a while ago that Prime Minister Demirel would prefer to have the election of a president delayed so that Senate President Ihsan Sabri Caglayangil could act as president for a while.

That is why a presidential candidate was not nominated, the NSP deputy leader said, and added: All of the candidates who are being mentioned have characteristics jointly accepted by the Justice Party and RRP governments. In fact, the leaders of both these parties are waiting for directives from the West about a presidential candidate. Cumalioglu pointed out that Ecevit had invited Demirel to discuss cooperation on the election of a president. The NSP deputy leader added: However, this dialog started behind the scenes a long time ago. The mutual accusations are being staged to deceive the nation.

NAP COUNCIL ISSUES STATEMENT ON DOMESTIC SITUATION

[Text] A statement issued by the Nationalist Action Party [NAP] General Administrative Council says that all party interests should be cast aside for the presidential elections and that a very responsible attitude should be adopted on the issue. The NAP General Administrative Council met under party leader Alpaslan Turkes today and discussed the country's various domestic and foreign problems. The decisions made by the council were announced to the press by Turkes. Explaining the council's views on the presidential elections, Turkes said the following:

[Begin Turkes recording] The president to be elected should have the comprehension and will-power necessary to materially [as heard] and spiritually represent the Turkish nation and the state and to abide by the spirit of the Constitution. All party interests should be cast aside and a solution should be sought with a high sense of responsibility. One should bear in mind that if a president cannot be elected Turkey might face a very grave and serious situation. Therefore, I believe that a president should be elected in a reasonable period of time in order not to give an opportunity to domestic as well as foreign enemies. The NAP will adopt a unifying, conciliatory and constructive attitude and will view the official candidates from this aspect. [end recording]

The Administrative Council statement also referred to economic issues. Reading the statement, Turkes said that artisans, workers, peasants, civil servants, retired personnel, widows and orphans were shouldering the burden of the economic measures because they were not supported by well timed and necessary supplementary measures. He said: The tax reform bill should urgently be discussed in accordance with a sense of justice. The bill envisaging exempting from taxes those earning the minimum wage should be enacted. Money should not be printed without support. The floor prices of basic agricultural products should be reasonable. The government should review fertilizer prices and should take conciliatory measures.

The statement pointed out that schools and government offices in various provinces are occupied by armed communist bandits and that certain schools, primarily the Gazi Training Institute, and youth and sports academies are continuing to train Marxists to work against the unity of the state and the nation. The statement noted that many civil servants, workers and policemen were unjustly treated during the Ecevit government and that their rights have not yet been restored. Noting that this was one of the reasons for the unrest, the statement called for rectifying these injustices.

KORUTURK CONDEMNS ATTACKS AGAINST MEMBERS OF ARMED FORCES

[Text] President Fahri Koruturk said that those who think that they can intimidate the Turkish nation and members of the Turkish Armed Forces through bloody attacks are actually preparing their own bitter end. President Koruturk issued a statement in connection with the attacks directed against members of the Turkish Armed Forces.

In his statement Koruturk said: My dear citizens, we have observed that traitors who act against the unity of our nation and our democratic system have, following their attacks against various vocational and other groups, for some time been engaging in bloody plots against the members of the heroic Turkish Armed Forces, the apple of our eye.

After the martyrdom of four soldiers in Adana and Istanbul, First Lt Omer Koc was killed in an armed attack in Diyarbakir the other day. This has increased our grief. There is no place on this sacred soil for those who are devoid of all human feeling, for the perpetrators of the attacks directed against members of the Turkish Armed Forces who serve the nation under the most strenuous conditions and who at all times risk their lives with exemplary discipline in order to secure the tranquillity and happiness of the nation for those who are devoid of any human feelings. Those who think that they can intimidate the lofty Turkish nation and the precious armed forces through bloody attacks are preparing their own bitter end.

Recalling that the citizens have important responsibilities, the statement added: I want my dear citizens to preserve their belief that the terror that a handful of hired terrorists are trying to create will be surmounted and that the desired atmosphere of tranquillity and security will be achieved. I expect my dear citizens to effectively fulfill all their duties and responsibilities in activities aimed at achieving this end. I pray for God's mercy for first Lt Omer Koc and for all those who have been killed in anarchic incidents. I extend my condolences to their families and friends.

SECURITY DIRECTOR GENERAL ANNOUNCES RESIGNATION

[Text] Security Director General Rafet Kucuktiryaki announced his resignation at a news conference in Ankara today. Noting that anarchy and terror was mounting and that the police force was divided when he began his duty as security director general 3 and ½ months ago, Kucktiryaki said that during his term in office he tried to insure the prevalence of law and order in the country. Noting that he also tried to improve the force's equipment during this period, Kucuktiryaki added that important steps have been taken in the fields of training and organization. Recalling that allegations concerning him in the press were also voiced by a former minister, Kucuktiryaki called on those who made the allegations to prove them.

Replacement Named

[Text] Ankara, 22 Mar (AA)--Director General of Ankara's Security Department Rafet Kucuktiryaki announced his resignation today while denying allegations that he was a close friend of Husayin Ugurlu, who was branded by certain dailies as a major arms smuggler. Kucuktiryaki was replaced today by Deputy Under Secretary at the Interior Ministry Ismail Dokzoglu.

In a press conference today, the outgoing security chief, who remained in office for 3 and ½ months, said he tried to put an end to divisions among the policemen and that the corruption claims by certain dailies were groundless. Refuting claims that some of the policemen had been appointed to posts incompatible with their educational background, Kucuktiryaki admitted indirectly that he had presented his resignation some time ago when his nomination for several posts had been rejected by higher authorities.

SALZBURG GOVERNOR SCORES DECISION TO CLOSE U.S. CONSULATE

[Special DIE PRESSE report by Ewald Koenig: "'Terrible Blow' to Haslauer: U.S. Consulate in Salzburg to Close"]

[Excerpts] Vienna--Before the end of this year the U.S. Consulate in Salzburg is to be closed forever: U.S. President Jimmy Carter has to economize. Although the consulate was closed "forever" once before (in 1963), this time its closing scheduled for 30 September seems to actually be final. To Salzburg's Governor Haslauer the decision came "as a terrible blow, the more so as we had been assured that the consulate might be raised to a consulate general." He regarded that as necessary in the interest of maintaining the world-political balance, Haslauer told DIE PRESSE, pointing out that the Soviet Union had established a very large consulate general in Salzburg. "Now we have launched a new wave of massive intercession, [interventionen] because we know that both Congress and the State Department in Washington are on our side," Haslauer said, adding that he had been waging an embittered struggle against Carter for as long as 2 years.

PLO DELEGATION HAD 'SECRET VISIT' WITH FOREIGN OFFICE

LD211459 London AL-HAWADITH in Arabic 21 Mar 80 p 11 LD

[Text] A PLO delegation paid a secret visit to London during the first week of this month, during which it met with a number of British Foreign Office officials. The Palestinian delegation was led by [speaker of the Palestinian National Council] Khalid al-Fahum and included Faruq Qaddumi, Khalid al-Hasan, Hani Sa'id and Mahmud Labadi. After London, the delegation visited Bonn and Paris for talks with officials there. London sources have stated that the visit came in the wake of the British Government's support for French President Valery Giscard d'Estaing's statements during his Gulf tour.

GOVERNMENT OFFICIALS, OLYMPIC ASSOCIATION HOLD TALKS

[By Tom McMullan, PA political staff]

[Text] A heavyweight turnout of ministers at a meeting with the British Olympic Association [BOA] today showed the government's determination to persuade athletes not to go to Moscow. Sir Dennis Follows, BOA chairman and Mr Dick Palmer, secretary, were asked to go to the Foreign Office where they were met by Foreign Secretary Lord Carrington, Environment Secretary Michael Heseltine, and Foreign Office Minister Douglas Hurd. The meeting, called so that the BOA could hear the government's arguments for a boycott of the Moscow Olympics, lasted 40 minutes. Afterwards, Sir Dennis said: "I was asked to bring the views of the government to my committee, which is due to meet on Tuesday next. I do not want to go into any further details now." Mr Palmer said: "This was an exchange of views. I would not say we learned much that we did not know." Mr Hurd's presence was thought to indicate that the government was arguing the merits of the alternative games, discussed in Geneva earlier this week. Mr Hurd, who represented Britain at that meeting, has already said governments would want the sporting bodies to organise the alternative events.

DENKTAS ADDRESSES WORLD ISLAMIC CONGRESS IN CYPRUS

[Text] The Eighth Session of the World Islamic Congress began in Gazimagosa [Famagusta] in the Turkish Federated State of Cyprus [TFSC] today. Representatives from some 40 Islamic countries and 7 Islamic organizations are participating in the meeting, which is being chaired by former Syrian Prime Minister Maruf ad-Dawalibi. Turkey is being represented by a delegation headed by State Minister Muhammed Kelleci. The United Nations has also sent an observer to the meeting.

In a speech he delivered at the opening of the congress TFSC President Rauf Denktas said that the fact that the World Islamic Congress chose northern Cyprus for the meeting has displayed the real place of the Muslim Turkish Cypriot people's just cause in the heart and mind of the Islamic world. Expressing the wish that Islamic solidarity be the primary issue whenever the Cyprus problem is mentioned, Denktas said: We are not asking you to support an unjust cause.

According to the TRT Cyprus bureau, Denktas noted that the Turkish Cypriot cause does not contradict the principles of the nonalined nations, the international laws and the UN Charter. Stating that the Turkish Cypriots wish to defend their just cause at international forums, and that they hope that the Islamic cause will assist them on this subject, Denktas added that the fact that this meeting is being held in northern Cyprus will strengthen the efforts to attain a just solution, which is acceptable to the two communities on the island, through intercommunal talks.

The messages sent by various Islamic countries' presidents and premiers to the Islamic congress were read after Denktas' speech.

In his message Prime Minister Demirel pointed out that the choice of the TFSC for the World Islamic Congress meeting is honorable and said: I am confident that the meetings of the congress will constitute a very valuable opportunity to review the joint problems of Islamic countries and to strengthen the solidarity among them.

In his message RPP leader Bulent Ecevit said: I believe that the cooperation and solidarity among our nations, which is based on fraternal ties, could be an important factor in insuring the continuous well-being and peace for mankind through the establishment of a just order in the world.

The reading of the messages was followed by Ad-Dawalibi's speech. Later, the report prepared by World Islamic Congress General Secretary In'amullah Khan was submitted to the congress.

The report, which addresses the Cyprus problem as well, states that the Turkish and Greek Cypriot communities on the island have their own characteristic historic, geographic, religious, cultural and social structures. The section of the general secretary's report on Cyprus expresses the following views: We want both communities to live honorably in their own region and we are in favor of the establishment of a federal Cyprus state. If this peaceful and just solution is unacceptable to the Greek Cypriot community, then the Turkish Cypriot side will be faced with the sole alternative of unilaterally declaring its independence.

The report also mentions in detail the attitude of the World Islamic Congress in the face of various world issues.

The Eight Session of the World Islamic Congress, in which the issues of peace, Islam and the problems of the human race will be discussed, will last 5 days.

Speech by Turkish Minister

[Text] The eighth session of the World Islamic Congress is continuing in Gazimagosa [Famagusta] in the Turkish Federated State of Cyprus. Problems concerning Islam, peace and humanity were discussed in today's afternoon session.

Minister of State Muhammad Kelleci, who is representing Turkey at the congress, chaired part of the afternoon session. In a statement at the meeting, Kelleci said that the Turkish nation and the state believe that justice should apply to all irrespective of class, race and religion.

He added that Turkey is against those who aim against the fundamental rights and freedoms of communities. Noting that all nations should adopt these principles [of justice and equality] if world peace is to be secured and if the problems of humanity are to be solved, Kelleci said that the peaceful and tranquil coexistence of all nations depends upon the just implementation of fundamental rights and freedoms.

TRT Cyprus bureau reports Kelleci as having said: The world should be saved from detrimental beliefs and practices, which aim against beliefs, unjustly kill people, oppress future generations, attack property rights, destroy freedom, disregard justice and plot against established and legitimate order through instigating anarchy and terrorism. A determined community with a strong will is necessary to fulfill this obligation. This community is the Islamic one.

Former Syrian Prime Minister Maruf ad-Dawalibi, who is chairing the eighth session of the World Islamic Congress, praised the Cyprus peace operation launched by Turkey. He added that, sooner or later, Jerusalem will also be liberated through a peace operation similar to the one launched by Turkey and that the Islamic world was determined on the issue.

The eighth session of the World Islamic Congress will last 5 days.

KREISKY INTERVIEWED ON PLO, AFGHANISTAN

DW241228 Munich Bayerischer Rundfunk Network in German 1745 GMT 22 Mar 80 DW

[Excerpts from reporter Bielmeyer interview with Austrian Federal Chancellor Bruno Kreisky, place not given--recorded]

[Text] [Kreisky] The recognition of the PLO is connected with the recognition of the right to self-determination for the Palestinians. I cannot say whether they will decide in favor of a state of their own or in favor of a federal state. I do not want to prejudice it at all.

[Question] Can one rightly assume that you are concerned that the Camp David agreement not end in a one-way street?

[Answer] It is certainly correct that I am most worried that the Camp David agreement will suffer because the second important part, the Palestinian problem, has not been solved in any way. I cannot imagine that the Camp David agreement will be able to function if that problem has not been settled, particularly since it looks so bad. One cannot give the Palestinians the feeling that one considers the matter settled. I consider the Middle East problem as a problem that can be solved, the solution of which would have been possible long ago if more readiness for understanding had been shown on both sides.

[Question] Do you see an end of detente policy between the East and the West in the coming years because of Afghanistan?

[Answer] I believe that at present detente policy is a policy that must expect a strong wind to blow into its face. The Afghanistan conflict has caused the matter to deteriorate dramatically. That invasion of a foreign country has excited the world and particularly those states which had the greatest confidence in the Soviet Union. In addition, there is that constant burdening of detente policy in the Middle East. Naturally one cannot have constant confrontation in a region like that and pretend in Europe as if all that did not exist.

[Question] In saying this you have touched on a hot problem for discussion: The divisibility or indivisibility of detente.

[Answer] Surely detente policy can be divided, but one cannot expect it to remain unburdened.

[Question] What are the intentions which the Soviet Union signals with Afghanistan, an aggressive foreign policy which not only applies to that particular region but possibly also to Europe and other parts of the world? Or is this but the expression of a weakness of the United States which at the time was rather involved with Iran?

[Answer] No. It is my firm conviction that events took place in Afghanistan proper which caused the Soviet Union to intervene, these people not having reckoned that this intervention would entail such consequences. The whole representation that the Soviet Union wants to make a thrust through to the Gulf and so forth in my opinion is wrong and exaggerated as it tends to give the whole matter a dimension which it just does not have. It will suffice, and that is bad enough as it is, that a small state is being treated as it is.

I do not think that the Soviet Union has any appetite today for implementing far-flung plans; the world has become too difficult for the Soviet Union for that. It needs preconditions other than those that currently exist.

[Question] Do you share the view of those who believe that by this Afghan intervention the Soviet Union has brought considerable trouble for itself in the Third World?

[Answer] Well, it did not help. On the contrary, I believe that it did make an impression indeed.

[Question] Would you advocate the view that Austria's neutrality could be a model for other European states as well, including a reunified Germany?

[Answer] I do not think so. I believe that this is a solution which was especially suited for a small state under the special preconditions which prevailed in Austria.

PLANS TO SET UP PLO GOVERNMENT-IN-EXILE IN VIENNA RUMORED

AU2411135 Vienna KURIER in German 22 Mar 80 p 3 AU

[Report by "H.N.": "Latest Speculations Around Yasir 'Arafat and Austria: Vienna as Seat of a PLO Government-in-Exile?"]

[Text] A new Middle East rumor is keeping Austrian diplomats busy: The Austrian capital, Vienna, might become the seat of a Palestinian government-in-exile. Chancellor Kreisky denies it, but diplomats do not exclude such a development.

This political bomb, which could also shed a new light on the latest revaluation of the PLO by Austria, exploded late Thursday evening [20 March] in a panel discussion [Club Zwei] of the Vienna Domestic Television Service second program. There Heinz Ostrein, Middle East correspondent, who had flown in from Cairo, declared with reference to Egyptian President As-Sadat's spokesman and to rumors circulating in quarters close to the president:

--That Egyptian Premier Khalil and "Foreign Minister" Qaddumi at a secret meeting in Paris had reached agreement on the early establishment of a government-in-exile;
--That Vienna may become the seat of such a shadow cabinet of the Palestinians under Yasir 'Arafat;
--That Bruno Kreisky himself might possibly take PLO chief 'Arafat with him to Cairo on the occasion of his forthcoming visit to Egypt, to bring about a reconciliation with As-Sadat.

Chancellor Kreisky himself, who was abroad on Friday, declared in reply to a KURIER question that he had "no knowledge" of a PLO wish to establish a future government-in-exile in Vienna--"I cannot imagine what reasons it could have for such a step," Kreisky said, adding that it was "one of the usual grotesque rumors."

Diplomats at the Vienna Foreign Ministry, however, on Friday regarded the early establishment of a PLO government-in-exile as "probable" and the choice of Vienna as its seat at least as "possible." Such an arrangement would "bring problems" for Austria, they said, but added that they "would be able to cope." During the TV discussion, Ambassador Bauer, head of the Foreign Ministry political division, declared: "We do not have the slightest intention of becoming the Capital of the revolution--but nothing is inconceivable."

The establishment of a Palestinian government-in-exile is in the air, according to the concurrent statements of numerous diplomats. It is felt that the PLO will make that decision "as soon as it can be certain of obtaining some sort of recognition, like that by Austria, from [other] European states."

Chancellor Kreisky has left open the date of his planned Cairo visit, so as to be able to quickly react to topical developments. Originally, this trip was planned for the end of April, but lately this date proved inexpedient because of the ultimatum for the conclusion of the autonomy negotiations expiring on 26 May.

Pahr Denial

[Andreas Unterberger report: "Pahr: No Talks About PLO Government-in-Exile"]

[Excerpt] Vienna--On Friday [21 March] Foreign Minister Pahr, in a talk with DIE PRESSE, denied that a PLO government-in-exile could have its seat in Vienna. "That is purely hypothetical," he said. "A government-in-exile presupposes the existence of a state. Moreover, there have been no talks regarding thie matter."

CARDINAL KOENIG REVIEWS BEIJING VISIT, PRC CHURCH

AU241428 [Editorial Report AU] Several Vienna papers in German on 22 March 2980 give extensive coverage to a press conference of Cardinal Archbishop Koenig after his return from a 10-day visit to the PRC at the invitation of the Chinese Association for Friendship With Foreign Countries.

DIE PRESSE (page 2) quotes Koenig as having summed up his impressions by saying: "I have not found anything that would have caused me to doubt the sincerety of the religious reconstruction under state supervision. But of course one can define the term freedom of religion in different ways." According to the paper, Koenig said that he made this trip with the knowledge, but not on the orders, of the pope, and that his interlocutors in political talks were Xiao, head of the Commission for Religious Affairs in the State Council, and Ulanhfu, head of the Front of Ethnic and Religious Minorities.

DIE PRESSE says in this context: "After these talks, 'certainly many questions still remain unresolved,' Koenig said. The cardinal attributed the PRC's noticeable interest in the church to its intention together with the 'counterblow against the gang of four also to repair the damages caused by the Cultural Revolution, and to the desire to demonstrate to the world public that there is tolerance toward religion.'"

"His talks, in Latin, with the bishops of the 'patriotic church' have convinced Cardinal Koenig that these believers--who are uniformed about the Second Vatican Council--'want to be Catholic' but that, as he was told, unity with the world church for them lies in belief rather than in the institutional aspect. In his talk with DIE PRESSE the cardinal added that it was certainly wrong to draw a parallel between the patriotic church of China and, say, the 'peace priests' in the CSSR."

"'Unfortunately it was not possible' to establish contacts with Catholics outside of the patriotic church. He had been officially informed, though, that there are Catholics in prison 'because of political offenses,' among them two bishops (one of whom is Kung In-Mei of Shanghai). A unification of the patriotic church with Rome is 'out of the question at the moment'; in the relations [of the Vatican] with the PRC neither his, nor Cardinal Echegarays' visit 'have set anything in motion that was not in motion before,' the cardinal said."

WIENER ZEITUNG (page 3) gives the names of Koenig's Catholic interlocutors in the PRC as the new Beijing Bishop Michael Fu Tieshan, "secretary general" of the Patriotic Church, Bishop Yang Gaojian of Changde (Hunan), and Bishop Franciscus Wang Xueming of Inner Mongolia. According to the paper, Koenig said these bishops gave him the impression "that they are Catholic and want to remain Catholic."

"The Vatican was informed of the consecration of Bishop Fu last December, Koenig said. The Holy See's negative reaction, in his opinion, came as quite a blow to the Chinese Government, since Beijing reserves for itself the right to decide how to run the church."

According to WIENER ZEITUNG, Koenig denied Beijing reports that he had celebrated a mass or "presided over a mass" in the PRC. All he did, he said, was to attend a mass in Nanjing celebrated by the local bishop. "He said that to his regret he was unable to contact Catholics loyal to the Vatican."

As to the number of Catholics in the PRC, 3.5 million prior to 1949, the cardinal was able to get information only regarding the Beijing diocese: It still has about 3,000 believers, he said.

According to KRONEN-ZEITUNG (page 1), Koenig gained the impression that the situation of the religious communities in the PRC has improved. "He said that Xiao, chairman of the Commission for Religious Affairs, assured him: The churches destroyed during the Cultural Revolutions are being reconstructed at the expense of the state. Actually the Vienna cardinal was able to inspect one of the renovated churches in Nanjing.

The paper stresses that the cardinal, regardless of whether he talked with representatives of Buddhists, Muslims, or Catholics, was never given an opportunity for a dialog in strict privacy. According to KRONEN-ZEITUNG, Cardinal Koenig will go to Rome to deliver a report on his PRC trip to Pope John Paul II right after the bishops conference that is to be held this week in Vienna.

STARIBACHER TO VISIT MOSCOW FOR TRADE TALKS

AU241608 Vienna KRONEN-ZEITUNG in German 22 Mar 80 p 1 AU

[Text] Vienna--Trade Minister Staribacher is to visit Moscow in April to boost Austrian exports to the Soviet Union. In 1979, Austria bought 3.4 billion schillings worth of goods more from the USSR than the Russians bought from us. The cause of the imbalance is our energy imports. Another topic of the coming Moscow talks is Soviet natural gas deliveries.

TRADE AGREEMENT, LOAN CONCLUDED WITH USSR

Deficit To Decrease

AU211215 Vienna Domestic Service in German 1100 GMT 21 Mar 80 AU

[Text] An agreement on an expansion of Austrian exports to the USSR was signed in Vienna today. The commodity exchange between the two countries has developed to Austria's detriment in the past few years. Austria's trade balance deficit increased to more than 18 billion schillings in the period between 1973 and the end of 1979.

10 Billion Schilling Loan

[Special DIE PRESSE report: "10-Billion Loan for Exports to the USSR"]

[Text] Vienna (-IS)--In order to reduce its high deficit in trade with the USSR through expanding its exports, Austria has now granted the Soviet Union a 10 billion schilling loan. The agreement on an additional credit line to that extent, usable until 1985, was signed in Vienna yesterday [21 March]. [paragraph continues]

In the framework of the agreement, Austrian banks will finance capital goods deliveries to the USSR with the government assuming liability. The loans will be refinanced by the Austrian Kontrollbank. The new agreement is in compliance with Austria's international obligations toward the OECD both regarding duration and interest rates (7.75 percent). The Soviets wanted to pay only 7 percent interest. Small and medium enterprises are to participate more than in the past in the deliveries to the USSR. In 1979 Austria's deficit in trade with the USSR was 3.4 billion schillings against 3.5 billion schillings in 1978; imports went up 15.8 percent to 10.3 billion schillings and exports rose 26.9 percent to 6.8 billion schillings [figures as published].

ROESCH CONCLUDES ARMS DEAL WITH SAUDI ARABIA

AU241152 Vienna Domestic Service in German 1100 GMT 24 Mar 80 AU

[Text] Saudi Arabia--The talks in Riyadh between Defense Minister Roesch and his Saudi Arabian counterpart, Prince ibn 'Abd al-'Aziz, ended today. Yesterday the two ministers concluded an agreement providing for a large delivery of Austrian rifles and submachine guns for the Saudi Arabian Armed Forces.

After the conclusion of this first arms deal Austria is to supply, in addition, armored vehicles and antitank guns for tests by the Saudi Arabian Army. According to the official press agency in Riyadh, the arms will be shipped to Saudi Arabia as early as next month.

INTEREST RATES--On 20 March the executive committee of the Austrian National Bank General Council decided to raise, effective 1 April, the discount rate by 1.5 percent to 6.75 percent, the lending rate by 1.5 percent to 7.25 percent, and the basic interest rate by 1 percent to 5 percent. [Vienna DIE PRESSE in German 21 Mar 80 p 20 AU]

HOTELS FOR POLAND--The Austrian Mischek Prefab construction company on 17 March received a Polish order for the construction of three hotels with 140 beds each, worth 180 million schillings. The three hotels, which are to be completed by Christmas, will be completely furnished and equipped by the Austrian company. The prefabricated parts will be produced at the company's plant in Gerasdorf near Vienna and will be delivered to Poland by special trains. The project will be financed with the aid of Austrian export loans. [Vienna ARBEITER-ZEITUNG in German 19 Mar 80 p 6 AU]

LE SOIR REPORTS SENATE DEFENSE SPENDING DEBATE

LD241415 Brussels LE SOIR in French 13 Mar 80 p 2 LD

[P.B. report: "Disagreement Among Ministers on the Amount of Military Spending"]

[Excerpt] From one of the places reserved for the Senate's important guests General Close gloomily watched the debate on the 1980 national defense budget. Like all visitors, he took care not to betray his opinion by a gesture or movement. However, there was a different reason for his presence. General Close was to be the protagonist of a question regarding "the measures taken toward him"--a question which was postponed until Wednesday.

All the major subjects raised during recent stances--the aggravation of international tension, the failure of the professionalization plan, and rising fuel prices and its effects on the air force and navy were raised by all the speakers.

As the Liberal spokesman Mr Decamps stressed, there are inconsistencies between what Defense Minister Desmarets and Budget Minister Spitaels say. The figures quoted by the two men on the size of our military effort do not coincide.

Disagreement on the Figures

These different interpretations of the statistics became clear when Mr Sweert, representing the [French-speaking] Socialist Party quoted figures which place us fifth among NATO countries in the volume of defense spending, above the Netherlands, Canada and even Britain. Even if, as the defense minister claims, this position is not wrong, it is unreliable since it was reached by taking spending outside the defense sphere such as pensions and even the police force into account. For Mr Desmarets, the national defense budget, which amounts to 82.4 billion, represents 6.5 percent of the state budget in 1980 which places us a long way below the Netherlands (9.6 percent of state spending), France (16 percent), the FRG (17.7 percent) and the United States (23.1 percent).

"It is impossible," he said, "to talk of an excessive effort or one which is beyond our means."

Confirmation for the Chiefs of Staff

The minister said that professionalization has been seriously disputed. The aim, he said, is to maintain an army which is operational both quantitatively and qualitatively. The problems encountered in implementing the plan are due to the lack of money for recruiting enough volunteers and paying their supplementary allowances resulting from the introduction of the 40-hour week. It should be pointed out that a soldier's job, which consists of continuous training including emergency exercises, has a specific character which cannot be compared with any other category of civil servants.

Another point on which the budget and national defense ministers disagree is the impact of rising fuel prices on training. Mr Desmarets, who supports the warnings initiated by the chiefs of staff, thinks it is a serious matter. In 1980 the increase will be 63.5 percent for fuel bought in Belgium and 97 percent for fuel bought in the FRG.

The conservation regulations for which provision has been made in the three branches of the armed forces cannot be fulfilled. The air force will have to fall below the minimum threshold of 150 hours flying time fixed by General Deemet. In the navy it will be impossible to exceed 33 days navigation per year. As for the army, it will have to cut the number of camp periods from 22 to 12 and introduce a plan to rationalize the use of vehicles.

The minister announced that conservation in the use of munitions is also planned but, he added, there are limits to how many cuts can be made. If the defense budget is treated as a "package" it is not possible to carry out transfers [from one section of the budget to another] ad infinitum. Staff costs make up 50 percent of the budget and amount to 40.5 billion, running and reequipment costs both make up 25 percent and amount to 20 billion each.

NETHERLANDS

DEFENSE MINISTER ACCEPTS BUDGET SPENDING CUTS

LD241555 Rotterdam NRC HANDELSBLAD in Dutch 18 Mar 80 p 3 LD

[Correspondent report: "Defense Ministry Realizes Need for Retrenchment]

[Text] The Hague, 18 March--Despite the current NATO agreement on an annual real budget increase of 3 percent, the Defense Ministry will also have to make a contribution to the additional reduction of expenditure which the cabinet intends to make in the 1980 budget.

Defense Minister Scholten is still negotiating with the Ministry of Finance on the scale of this contribution--the sum of several hundred million guilders has been mentioned semiofficially--especially with respect to the size of the compensation for inflation [prijscompensatie].

Explaining his budget for this year (10 billion guilders) in the first chamber, Scholten said this afternoon that the actual current 2.9 percent real increase in his budget "will not be able to remain unaffected." He said that he regards this as "not an easy course" and that he is prepared for the fact that he will soon have something to explain to his NATO colleagues.

"But as a member of the cabinet, I fully endorse the need for cuts," stated Scholten, who for the rest vehemently disagreed with the Socialist Uijen, who actually wanted more to cut than the extra 3 percent.

Speaking about international balances of power, the minister warned against a Western "overreaction to Afghanistan." But he also said that detente is only possible with "an overall balance of power" between NATO and the Warsaw Pact, and moreover that "detente is not a divisible concept" (for instance, applying only in and to Europe--ed). The Soviet Union takes a different but mistaken view.

Scholten announced that he will soon give details in a "situation report" about the number of F-16's still to be ordered (as a result of peacetime losses). This report will also establish a connection with the decision on the replacement of the NF-5.

He said that, despite personnel shortages in 1979, recruitment for the armed forces can be described as successful.

NO EARLY PROSPECT OF SCHMIDT VISITS TO GDR, USSR SEEN

LD211301 Hamburg DPA in German 1126 GMT 21 Mar 80 LD

[Text] Bonn--According to government spokesman Boelling, a definite date for Chancellor Schmidt's visit to the GDR is still not in sight. Replying to questions in connection with the chancellor's statement in his report on the state of the nation that this visit should take place "as soon as possible," Boelling told a news conference in Bonn today that the chancellor wanted to put his political intentions on record before the Bundestag.

Boelling drew attention to the international situation, which is such that neither a journey to the GDR nor a visit to the USSR by the chancellor "is likely within the very near future." Concerning a visit to Moscow, the government spokesman said that it is up to the host, party chief Brezhnev, to put the invitation in specific terms. Between the chancellor and Honecker on the other hand, Boelling said, it has already been agreed in principle that Schmidt would go to the GDR.

JORDANIAN CROWN PRINCE ARRIVES IN BONN FOR TALKS

[Text] Bonn--Crown Prince Hasan, the regent of Jordan, arrived in Bonn today for talks with Federal Foreign Minister Hans-Dietrich Genscher. As the Foreign Ministry reported, the son [as received] of the Jordanian ruler, who is accompanied by his family, will fly on to London on Tuesday. According to Jordan, this short working visit is meant for holding a general political exchange of opinion. Hasan will also talk with bank representatives.

Genscher Meets With Hassan

[Text] Bonn--In a talk lasting several hours with Crown Prince Hasan bin Talal of Jordan, Federal Foreign Minister Hans-Dietrich Genscher underlined the particular urgency of a settlement of the Arab-Israeli conflict. The son [as received] of the Jordanian ruler was in Bonn on Monday on a short working visit. Genscher's ministry stated that in the talk he explained the German position and stressed that the Palestinian people's right to self-determination has to be realized within the framework of a comprehensive solution. Hasan reported on the decisions taken by the conference of Islamic foreign ministers in Islamabad in February. The Foreign Ministry stated that the two sides assessed German-Jordanian relations as excellent. The crown prince, who is accompanied by his family, flies to London on Tuesday.

DEFENSE MINISTER APEL INTERVIEWED ON SECURITY ISSUES

[Friedhelm Kemna and Ruediger Moniac undated interview with Federal Defense Minister Hans Apel in Bonn]

[Text] WELT: You will be going to Japan, New Zealand and Australia, Mr Minister. How important is this trip in the strategy of the West for the management of the Afghanistan crisis?

Apel: The trip was planned before the Afghanistan crisis. But it does gain a new dimension today because the countries I am scheduled to visit are our friends and share with us the responsibility for peace in the world. Specifically this means that I will be talking in all these countries not only about defense policy and security policy, but also about the commitment of all of us to contribute toward the economic development of the countries which otherwise will look for their friends elsewhere.

WELT: What are the specific demands you will make regarding these countries?

Apel: I do not think that it befits a guest to make demands; yet surely it will be necessary to point out that there are minimum standards for safeguarding one's own defense and for participating in development assistance, which may well be asked of prosperous countries. I expect to be asked critical questions in return, because our EC agricultural policy definitely causes serious problems for third parties.

WELT: In what context could the Japanese contribution be defined--since Australia and New Zealand have already declared their readiness to support the U.S. strategy?

Apel: What matters to me, above all, is to concentrate our considerations on the need for economic assistance to the countries which are economically weak and, hence, susceptible. Surely all countries, ourselves included, could do more in this respect, also in their own interest. Besides, each regional power must assume a share in the responsibility.

WELT: Is there any possibility of cooperation in the field of arms technology as well?

Apel: We have already had quite pleasant and positive experiences with the Australians. All three countries are open to German arms exports, they are not in areas of tension. But I am not a salesman for German arms.

WELT: The Afghanistan crisis has forced NATO to practice more solidarity, verbally as well as in concretely implemented policy. Can we as Germans actually afford to lie around and wait to see what demands the Americans will make on us concerning a stronger involvement to guarantee our common security?

Apel: We have not been lying around. We have taken charge of the executive management of the aid to Turkey, and we will intensify our development aid. Aside from that, we have two projects in Brussels waiting to be dealt with which are of considerable importance. One of them is NATO's long-term defense program, the other bears the label of NATO infrastructure program. They are, in fact, two programs which involve high costs. I shall leave AWACS aside because AWACS has been financed although with difficulty. What matters is to put these projects into practice on schedule. In concrete terms what all this involves is not really making plans any longer--the plans as well as the pertinent decisions are there--what is now essential is to put them into practice. If anything additional is to be done beyond that then those who make the demand must implement it in NATO. There have not been any demands so far, though, and this is why I am against standing at attention, as it were, and reporting that we are receptive to additional demands. This could only enhance the impression among some NATO partners that they can be satisfied with a lesser involvement.

WELT: Let us proceed to the aid to Turkey which, as far as the German contribution is concerned, is part of the Defense Ministry's reponsibility. In an interview granted to NEWSWEEK the SPD chairman criticized the Americans for not being prepared to participate in this assistance in the desired way.

Apel: We have adopted a decision in the cabinet which is quite unequivocal. In the new aid program for Turkey we will do exactly as much as the United States will do. I think this is a respectable position indeed; because both the gross national product and the population figure in our case are clearly lower than those of the United States. Yet the United States has budget problems, and to that extent this issue has not been settled by a long way.

WELT: We are prepared to raise DM300 million. The Americans have offered 200 million [currency not given]. So there is a shortage of 100 million.

Apel: If the Americans stick to their last offer we would have to reduce our offer accordingly. And this does not yet cover the whole problem. So far other NATO partners have shown readiness to help only within limits, even though the aid to Turkey is definitely a joint NATO affair. In other words, in this respect, contacts in NATO must be intensified and the efforts stepped up.

WELT: In his government statement Thursday the chancellor once again pointed out that the FRG is prepared to assume new burdens within the framework of division of labor. Mr Minister, does the Federal Government have any additional tasks in mind that must yet be tackled, tasks beyond what has so far become known, for instance, additional frigates in the Atlantic?

Apel: If at all, what can only be involved, I believe, is the field you referred to in your question. But even in that case I would continue to insist that this be jointly dealt with in NATO. I must also point out that the financial framework for the coming years is so tight that extra tasks which NATO--and thus we--must assume will, in the long run, spell extra funds for the defense budget because we have not--to stay with that example--envisaged any additional frigates in our medium-range finance planning.

WELT: Will the Germans have to make more sacrifices in the future?

Apel: Actually there cannot be any talk of more sacrifices. In view of a gross national product of DM1.3 trillion, DM1 billion in the broadest sense of the word is not a sacrifice this year. But shifts of accent will certainly become necessary, also with regard to the finances between the Federal Government and the laender.

WELT: The Americans have hopeful ideas with regard to possibilities, particularly with regard to the FRG on the problem of mobilizing trained reserves. Do you consider that hope to be warranted, and how do you assess these possibilities?

Apel: With regard to the field of the army, we are on our way toward increasing the 33 brigades to 36 brigades. That is part of army structure number four. On this occasion the six homeland protection commands will be reshuffled to become brigade-like units. Arms and equipment exist for that purpose and the degree of personnel present will also be higher.

We will use our reservists better than before. But this in particular will cause problems because the people are even more opposed to military maneuvers than to being drafted for compulsory military service. But we will embark on that course. Only then will we have exploited our opportunities. It is, therefore, important that all NATO states critically examine whether they can hold to the structure of their professional army, not least of all because having a professional army means having insufficient reserves.

WELT: You make the reservations that the people do not accept military maneuvers. But the security situation must be reassessed because of the world political crisis. Does that not mean that the people must realize the necessity for such maneuvers? Don't the younger people have to be prepared to serve for a longer period in a couple of years because of the consequences of the birth control pill?

Apel: It is always so with sacrifices. Everybody likes to hear the word and likes to repeat it. But when he himself is involved, he asks very critical questions. We must draft more reservists than before, even if protests come from chambers of industry and trade and enterprises, those involved themselves or their trade unions. We must simply maintain the potential we have in training. As regards the issue of prolonged compulsory military service time, it is one of several possibilities for handling the decreasing number of young conscripts in the middle and end of the eighties.

WELT: If you were once again to become defense minister in the next legislative period, would you then demand prolonged compulsory military service within the available period of 4 years?

Apel: If that is necessary then the people must be informed in time, seriously and honestly, because it does not make sense to dodge issues. I am not a coward. What is necessary will be said and also implemented.

WELT: The German desire with regard to the alliance includes the reintroduction of compulsory military service in America. What is the relationship between what is desirable and what is possible?

Apel: I think that we will be tested from Moscow's point of view with regard to the seriousness and persistence of our own efforts aimed at securing the defense capability and thus the military balance. That would particularly involve soldiers. The alliance as a whole would run the risk of losing credibility and thus also ability to act if it does not live up to all challenges--arms, equipment, more reserves, compulsory military service--so that visible signals will arrive in Moscow which will make it possible to continue the policy of treaties on that basis.

WELT: Let us discuss the Bundeswehr, Mr Minister. The troops have been receiving new arms for months: Leopard-2, Alpha jet, Tornado. Experts know that these complicated arms systems are very expensive. If technical developments continue like that, it will become more and more difficult to pay for new arms. How do you plan to get out of this vicious circle?

Apel: Some radical thinking is necessary here, some thinking from the root, so to speak. All Western industrial nations are urged to get that process of thinking going as soon as possible. We have some preparatory work under way because we are facing costly decisions in connection with the fighter plane of the nineties and a new combat tank. It must be clarified, first, what is militarily necessary, and what is economically possible. The simple continuation of trends from the past automatically is ruled out.

WELT: Can you say in what direction this development of arms will go in the future generally?

Apel: It is too early for that. But the abilities of missiles which are guided from far away to destroy with one strike a very expensive system must become even more the center of considerations. No army of the world will be able to fully renounce planes and tanks. They are part of the army's presence and also of the defense capability. But here are possibilities which must be critically examined down to the problem of manned or unmanned flying objects.

MILITARY EXPERT URGES IMPROVED ANTITANK MISSILES

[Commentary signed Ein.: "Arms Merry-Go-Round"]

[Text] The Soviets are manufacturing another tank model, the T-80, the fourth new development within 20 years. Experts say that this tank is considerably superior to its predecessors, such as the T-72 and the T-64, with respect to speed, armament and armor. The Russian engineers have developed a steel protection compound which Western defensive weapons presumably cannot pierce. Especially when it comes to missiles against tanks in combat, the T-80 stands every chance of survival. It must be granted that tank versus tank combat will always play a decisive role in armored battle, and types of tanks like the German Leopard or the U.S. XM-1 tank need not be afraid of a quality comparison with Russian models. Yet, considering the numerical superiority of the Red armor, the main burden of antitank defense would have to be assumed by the "Dragon," "Tow," and "Milan" missiles. Yet these weapons systems are not strong enough to destroy the T-80. So what do we do? The Soviets have given the arms merry-go-round another push. NATO must improve its missiles or it will not be able to deter credibly.

U.S. ANTI-INFLATION PROGRAM'S IMPACT ON FRG ECONOMY WEIGHED

[Rudolf Herlt commentary: "A Tough Carter: Fighting Inflation"]

[Text] All German politicians who have visited Washington recently have made the same observation, namely that the president's advisers are measuring the quality of Carter's decisions with the yardstick of whether or not they will improve his election prospects. Since they advised him to declare inflation as enemy number one, and to announce a package of harsh and unpopular countermeasures in the midst of the election year, they certainly must have the feeling that the Americans are sick and tired of the sweet poison of inflation.

They are not mistaken. Price increase rates of 18 percent have scared even the Americans, because they recognize that they have lived beyond their means. They are ready to follow a president who shows determination to cope with this modern scourge of mankind. Carter has left no stone unturned.

His demonstration of determination is impressive. It impresses more than the measures do themselves. Carter has concocted a medicine which normally does not yield votes: cuts in budgetary spending, an import tax on crude oil that is to be passed on to the consumers via the gasoline price, and finally restrictions on the availability of consumer credit. Nobody can say beyond any doubt that this is precisely the right dosage. The crucial question is: Will the president succeed in breaking the Americans' inflation mentality and in putting an end to the constantly growing price increase rates? We in the Federal Republic in 1973 came to know how difficult that is. The price we had to pay at the time was a stabilization crisis.

At the end of such a titanic struggle the economy, as a rule, is so weak that it is not able to achieve major growth accomplishments. This could be a matter of no consequence to us if the American economy were not at stake. The political and economic ties and links between the United States and the Federal Republic are so close and sensitive that almost nothing can happen over there without our profiting or suffering from it. The concern is no not unfounded that the Western world once again, as in 1975, could be dragged into a whirlpool of world recession if Carter's fight against inflation were to run into a crisis. This--admittedly--would be a high price. But it would have to be paid because jobs and economic progress in the long run can be secured only by stable money. Wherever inflation continues, unemployment becomes a constant problem.

But it must not necessarily be as bad as in 1975. The starting position is better today than at that time. Nobody can assume that high energy prices are a passing phenomenon as was the case at that time. Today the dependence on oil must be alleviated by energy saving and transition to other sources of energy. This is impossible without gigantic investment programs. In most of the Western countries companies today are earning more than they did at that time. They are in a position to build new installations and introduce new techniques. And, after all, the parties to the wage agreements in the majority of countries no longer are as naive as they were in those days, when they believed that even after transferring part of our prosperity to the oil countries they would be able to make the same demands as they did before.

Even if Carter's anti-inflation policy is successful, the dollar will still cause us trouble for a certain while. Ever since the announcement of the Carter program it has displayed unusual strength. The Federal Bank does what it can do. It sells billions of dollars out of its large reserve of foreign exchange with a view to at least putting the brake on the rising exchange rate. The situation regarding German interests has reversed itself. Unlike half a year ago, today we are interested in a dollar that is not too strong, because a weaker dollar lowers import prices and helps the Federal Bank in its fight against soaring prices. As a matter of fact, prices for oil and other raw materials at present carry their special weight. Compared with this the disadvantages inherent in a weaker dollar in exports have little weight.

Irrespective of the rich ammunition the Federal Bank has available in its foreign exchange reserves, it cannot reverse the exchange-rate trend. But our experience has shown that this will not be necessary, for so far every anti-inflation program announced by Carter has lasted no longer than two months--until the forces producing the dollar's exchange-rate increase abated. Everything has its limit. This, however, is no passport for the Federal Government and the Federal Bank. Both must continue to respect stability as the utmost economic-political goal--even in an election year. This will determine whether Bonn will be able to check the dangers emanating from higher oil prices and the strength of the dollar. Otherwise a new wave of inflation will thwart even any modest growth.

LE MONDE SEES LEAN TOWARD 'NONPARTICIPATION' IN OLYMPICS

[Francois Janin article: "The Moscow Games--Toward French Nonparticipation"]

[Text] A recent precedent--the cancellation of the Springboks South African rugby team's French tour--makes it easier to understand why [French Sports Minister] Soisson and [French Foreign Minister] Jean Francois-Poncet disagree on this affair too. Almost to the very last minute Mr Soisson had maintained with reference to the Springboks team that the decision to receive them or not depended on the competent sporting authorities. Mr Francois-Poncet had to state that the South African tour was "inopportune" and to reintroduce the visa requirement for Mr Soisson to come round to his viewpoint.

The national sports movement, forced to bend this decision, had given the impression of remaining seemingly united, from the French National Olympic and Sports Committee [CNOSF] to the minister, and did not depart from the rule of keeping sport separate from politics. The minister of youth, sports and leisure, like the CNOSF, the rugby federation and a section of public opinion, gave the impression that he was bowing to political necessities.

Is there any reason why the same scenario should not be repeated today with regard to the Moscow games? In France, as in the FRG, as Chancellor Schmidt pointed out on Thursday, 20 March, it is believed that "conditions are not right for taking part in the Olympic games." Recently the president of the republic described the Red Army's invasion of Afghanistan as "unacceptable." The reason why no French decision has been taken officially is probably that the tactical choice of awaiting the final date in the second half of May for accepting the invitation to the games offers every advantage. Announcing nonparticipation the day before the closing date will limit the range and especially the duration of hostile reactions to this decision in all reports.

Mere Spartakiad

Is it possible to go to Moscow and break solidarity with the West? That is the question which the French Government must answer. Is it possible to serve as a support--hostage--for reduced games, in fact a mere spartakiad? On this point the German and French approaches differ considerably. The FRG, like the United States, Britain, Australia and many other nations, is virtually forced by Atlantic solidarity to rally to the boycott camp. Since the end of the war the FRG has systematically shown solidarity with U.S. decisions. Moreover, since the beginning of the Olympic crisis--sparked off by the Soviet Army's entry into Afghanistan--Mr Helmut Schmidt has stated that "since the United States shows solidarity with the FRG in Berlin, it would be impossible for the FRG to take part in games in Moscow from which the United States was absent."

Subsequently, the FRG and France above all played for time without cherishing too many illusions on the outcome of this delay. This is true to the extent that German Olympic Committee President Willy Daume has just admitted that he could not disregard a government order for a boycott. He explained this in Brussels this Saturday, where the European national Olympic committees held a meeting.

France's position is more practical and, in theory, less dependent on the Americans. It is also rather more hypocritical. At no point has there been any intention to boycott the games, in other words to join a movement hostile to the Soviets. The official stance has always been not to take part in competitions devoid of their significance and which have become a mere spartakiad. Hence this nuance: nonparticipation rather than a boycott. [paragraph continues]

It seems that for the French foreign minister Olympic games without the United States, China, Japan, the FRG, Britain, many Commonwealth countries, around half the African and Middle East countries, the Netherlands, Portugal and several other European countries would indeed be more like a spartakiad than the great athletic confrontation which the Olympic games should be. For the Americans in any case the matter is settled. In the absence of assurances they have certainly received enough support to be virtually certain that the boycott solution advocated by President Carter is on the verge of victory.

MOSCOW OLYMPICS ORGANIZERS CALL ON L'HUMANITE EDITORS

[Unattributed report: "Moscow Olympics Organizing Committee Visits L'HUMANITE"]

[Excerpt] The Moscow Olympics Organizing Committee, which is in France at the invitation of the France-USSR Association, was received by L'HUMANITE's editorial staff on Tuesday. This amicable reception centered on the defense of the Olympic games, with PCF Central Committee member Marcel Zaidner deputizing for Charles Fiterman--who had to beg off yesterday--on youth and sports questions.

GISCARD, MOROCCAN KING DISCUSS MIDEAST AT PRIVATE LUNCH

[Text] King Hassan II of Morocco, who is on a private visit to Paris, lunched privately with President Giscard d'Estaing. On the menu were the Middle East and the Palestinians. The Elysee expressed satisfaction at the complete identity of views between the two countries. Hassan II will meet with Giscard again on Wednesday and then Thursday.

FRANCOIS-PONCET, DENMARK'S OLESEN CONSULT ON EC SUMMIT

[Unattributed report: "France and Denmark Show Equal Attachment to Community Principles"]

[Text] French Foreign Minister Jean Francois-Poncet called on his Danish colleague Kjeld Olesen in Copenhagen on Wednesday, 19 March. Their last meeting was in Paris in November 1979. This visit by Mr Francois-Poncet, following his visit to The Hague with Mr Raymond Barre the previous day and preceeding his talks with Belgian Foreign Minister Henri Simonet in Paris this Thursday, is part of the preparations for the next European Council meeting in Brussels on 31 March-1 April.

According to our Copenhagen correspondent Camille Olsen the two ministers reviewed the main points on the Council meeting agenda. They noted that Denmark's position was very close to France's on a number of questions.

"We both want to find solutions to the problems posed by Britain," Mr Francois-Poncet said after the meeting, "but we are equally attached to the principles on which the Community is based." The French minister indicated that, among the points of agreement were "Community preference, market unity and the view that the agricultural markets should be organized and that financial solidarity, which is the basis of this organization, is inseparable from the Common Agricultural Policy."

Our correspondent adds that Mr Francois-Poncet and Mr Olesen also examined the international situation, particularly the consequences of the Soviet invasion of Afghanistan, and the French minister informed his Danish colleague of the results of Valery Giscard d'Estaing's recent visit to the Middle East. He further explained the significance which Paris attaches to the president of the republic's proposal for Palestinian self-determination at a dinner, following which he returned to Paris.

PCF POLITBURO ISSUES COMMUNIQUE ON MARCHAIS ALLEGATIONS

LD241045 Paris L'HUMANITE in French 19 Mar 80 p 3 LD

[Text of PCF Politburo statement: "A Strange Distribution of Tasks"]

[Text] The PCF Politburo published the following communique yesterday:

The PCF Politburo has taken stock of recent developments in the plot against Georges Marchais and, through him, against the whole party.

The theory--long since refuted--that Georges Marchais volunteered to work in Germany has completely collapsed. Another theory was launched amid a great uproar 10 days ago, backed by supposed "proof" from Augsburg: Georges Marchais is supposed to have returned to Germany after May 1943, that is, after the date when he in fact escaped from that country to hide in France. The "proof" has turned out to be valueless, and this new theory has disintegrated. The lies and falsifications thus appear quite openly. An avalanche of documents and testimonies confirm Georges Marchais' statements from which he has never wavered.

But since the truth of these matters has appeared clearly, the campaign is turning in another direction. For 3 days LE NOUVEL OBSERVATEUR, LE MONDE and LE MATIN have been propounding a new theory: From his earliest youth Georges Marchais was apparently a Comintern official! Meanwhile, the Socialist Party official daily bulletin (18 March) highlights "some uncertainties, a certain haziness and ultimately a few blurred moments" in Georges Marchais' past, and it considers that "the fact of Georges Marchais' probable candidacy in the presidential election exposes him...to all kinds of attacks and utterly justifies the journalists' curiosity." Even today LE MATIN is trying to give credence to the theory of the PCF secretary general's dependence on the Soviet Union by depicting his stay at the Moscow Central School in 1954-1955 as "incontestable."

The documents and testimonies that L'HUMANITE gathered in a few hours and publish here annihilate these inventions and confound the slanderers once again.

At each development in this undertaking the Politburo notes the strange distribution of tasks among all those for whom Georges Marchais is a target. For 10 years the rightwing in government has been in possession of all the means for establishing the truth. Not only has it not produced this information, it has let the slander develop and even promoted it. Thus, the shocked protestations of Valery Giscard d'Estaing and Jacques Chirac appear to be what they are: A belated ruse designed to cover the disorderly retreat of the liars, an attempt to rid themselves of this false move and a maneuver to make people believe in the solidarity of the so-called "political class."

The affair was started by a newspaper editor--Jean-Francois Revel--whose links with Francois Mitterrand are as well known as are those with Giscard d'Estaing. It was sustained by most of the information media, including the Socialist press organs and those close to the Socialist Party. These same press organs are now relaunching it.

Such are the items of information and opinion that the Politburo insisted on submitting to the citizens of France--in the face of the unleashing of relentless attacks. It will be the task of tomorrow's Central Committee meeting to make a deeper analysis of these facts and to draw the necessary conclusions from them.

PCF DISSIDENT FISZBIN TO PUBLISH BOOK ON LEFT UNION

[P.J. review: "Mr Fiszbin Analyzes the Crisis in the PCF Paris Federation"]

[Text] In a book to appear soon, Henry Fiszbin, former first secretary of the PCF Paris Federation, explains the circumstances of his decision to leave the Paris Federation Secretariat in January 1979 and the PCF Central Committee in November the same year. Mr Fiszbin, who is still a PCF member, believes that the Paris Federation crisis illustrates "the downgrading of consensus within the party." He wants to alert party officials and PCF members to this downgrading.

The PCF has long been committed to a strategy which has encountered difficulties both outside and inside the party itself. PCF leaders have had to fight on several fronts: namely, the still disputed alliance with the Socialist Party [PS] and relations with the Comintern, both battles having repercussions within the party in the form of conflicts between the various tendencies which divide the members. This strategy has encountered an imbalance caused by the progress of the left union in favor of the PS. Mr Fiszbin believes that, since the June 1977 PS Congress in Nantes, the PS leaders have shown their determination to exploit this imbalance in their favor.

Since then, Mr Fiszbin believes, the very bases of the alliance have been questioned and the possibility of a split suggested. The former Paris official believes that, at that time, most Communists were aware of the situation and of the effort needed to pressure the PS into "returning to its earlier commitment." For Mr Fiszbin the period from the September 1977 split to the March 1978 election was a battle which the PCF leadership did not despair of winning. However, the left's election failure called for reflection on how the battle had been waged and, moreover, on the reasons why this confrontation had become inevitable.

Mr Fiszbin explains how discussion within the Paris Federation on these two questions immediately after the electoral failure emphasized the broad agreement on the PCF's orientations, apart from criticism on the implementation of these orientations. From this he concludes that the debate was positive, but that the leadership decided otherwise. It sought unreserved approval, perhaps because it overestimated the membership's hostility to the stances it had been forced to adopt. It persisted in this demand during preparations for the 22d Congress of May 1979, and, fearing that the Paris membership might be large enough to refuse this approval, it decided to set about bringing their federation into line. Mr Fiszbin believes that this was a futile attempt which caused the PCF a problem which it would have preferred to avoid.

BERLINGUER, BRANDT MEET; COMMUNIQUE ISSUED

[Augusto Pancaldi dispatch: "Brandt and Berlinguer: Wide-Ranging Conversation on International Crisis"]

[Text] Strasbourg: Willy Brandt and Enrico Berlinguer met late Wednesday afternoon in Strasbourg and had an in-depth exchange of viewpoints on problems concerning Europe and the international situation. The conversation lasted about 2 hours. Yesterday morning the following communique was released simultaneously in Bonn and Rome:

"In their capacity as members of the European Parliament, PCI Secretary General Enrico Berlinguer and SPD Chairman Willy Brandt had a wide-ranging conversation in Strasbourg on 12 March on European and international issues. The meeting centered on the grave dangers threatening the detente policy and the efforts being made to contain the arms race. The problems of North-South relations were also discussed."

As will be recalled, the SPD chairman, who is also the Socialist International chairman and promoter of the North-South Committee (an idea close to Willy Brandt's heart for some time, and which our party also supports, identifying it as one of the indispensable paths for resolving the world crisis and establishing a new international economic order), should have met with Berlinguer in Bonn at the end of January, at the moment of highest tension prompted by the Soviet military intervention in Afghanistan, whose condemnation by the PCI was reasserted at that time to the European Parliament by Berlinguer himself.

Parliamentary and electoral commitments obliged Willy Brandt to postpone the talk, which he viewed within the framework of the normal exchanges of opinions and information which have already been in progress for some time between the parties. In his message to the PCI secretary general, Brandt in any case confirmed his wish for the meeting to take place, saying he was sure that it could be held during and within the framework of one of the upcoming European Parliament sessions. As we said at the beginning, the meeting did take place on Wednesday, and it proved to be cordial and useful, as it could not fail to be, like all forms of constructive dialog among the various components of the European left aimed at rebuilding the old continent's workers movement and between the leaders of two political groups which, despite their differing responsibilities and positions, both have a decisive influence on the political life of their respective countries and of Europe, whether EEC or otherwise.

The fact that the two sides considered it unnecessary to comment on the communique or to discuss at length the manifold topics raised and discussed (as shown by the fact that the talks lasted 2 hours) has, we feel, two entirely valid reasons: a mutual and understandable reticence in the present situation, and the desire to make the meeting informal--not sensational, that is, since it is not the only one that has been held--and "normal," in short, consistent with the normality which should apply, as all our party's international activity shows, to the development of relations and constructive convergences among all European popular and democratic forces.

In this context, it should be pointed out that, especially at the latest sessions of the European Parliament, some highly important convergences have emerged among the French, German and Belgian socialist forces and the Italian Communist and associated groups on the major issues of peace, disarmament and the essential continuation of the East-West dialog as the precondition for maintaining detente in Europe and throughout the world.

On this point in particular, we feel--and the communique emphasizes--that Willy Brandt and Berlinguer found a vast area for analysis and comparison of views at a time when, amid moderate-conservative and dangerous stances, the Bonn and Paris governments are tending to differentiate themselves from the U.S. line and to suggest an autonomous policy based on the awareness that the only alternative to detente is, at best, cold war. It is not even necessary to recall that Brandt was the chancellor of "ostpolitik" that he has remained loyal to and continues to guide his political activity in accordance with that decisive option for European stability and security; also there is no need to recall the principles on which the PCI's action is based.

The news of the meeting, which was announced yesterday morning with the publication of the communique, has promoted great interest in political and journalistic circles at the European Parliament.

PCI'S BOFFA EXTOLS POTENTIAL EUROPEAN ROLE IN MIDEAST

LD211559 Milan L'UNITA in Italian 14 Mar 80 p 18 LD

[Giuseppe Boffa article: "Gulf Area New Border Between United States and Europe"]

[Text] It was not merely Giscard's tour which suddenly brought the Middle East back to the center of diplomatic attention, just as it was not merely the Soviet intervention in Afghanistan which created the grave tension in the Persian Gulf (or Arabian Gulf, as the Arabs in fact prefer to call it). Rather, there has been a whole chain of events. The diplomatic initiatives caused by the Afghan crisis and Giscard's tour are its important links, but the sequence is lengthier: There is FRG Foreign Minister Genscher's less conspicuous visit to Cairo, there is the impending breakdown in the Israeli-Egyptian negotiations, to which the two sides now seem resigned, and last there is U.S. diplomacy's sensational turnabout on the Palestinian issue at the United Nations.

It is difficult at present to say what will emerge from the intense activity, of which the French president's initiative was undoubtedly the most spectacular aspect. The Middle East and the Persian Gulf--as everybody knows--mean, above all, oil. It has come about that a difference of interests between Europe and the United States has taken shape on this very sensitive matter--a difference which, wisely, nobody has dramatized, but which nevertheless remains real. Middle East oil is of far more "vital" importance to Europe than to the United States: In fact the latter, once it has reduced the waste for which it has been criticized for some time by the Europeans and Japanese, will be able largely to dispense with it. Europe cannot do so. This is why a distrust of the way in which Washington is handling the region's problems arose in Europe. This has subsequently intensified in light of recent developments.

These problems are of two kinds: The first is the conflict, which has now lasted over 30 years, between Arabs and Israelis. After many hesitations, the Americans decided to resolve it on their own and in the first person. This gave rise to the Camp David agreement. This was received in Europe with some skepticism but also with a generally favorable inclination. Today the effect of that move is becoming exhausted without the Middle East problem having approached a solution. The reason lies in the inability (or the deliberate failure) to involve in the initial agreement the parties which were deliberately excluded from it--first of all, of course, the Palestinians.

The recent episode whereby Carter 48 hours later retracted the vote by his representative at the United Nations against the Israeli settlements in the occupied territories probably has electoral origins in the United States and threatens--judging by the latest reports--to cost the admittedly able Secretary of State Vance his post. But it certainly does not increase the confidence of the parties concerned in the farsightedness and consistency of Washington's diplomacy. Unfortunately, the outcome of an intensification of the crisis would threaten to be a new explosion of the conflict.

Then there is the second kind of problem. Over the last 2 years the Americans have been confronted by an earthquake in the group of loyal states on which they could rely in the region. The earthquake had its epicenter precisely where the main pillar of the U.S. Middle East alliances--Iran--stood, but, as last November's events demonstrated, it is threatening to spread elsewhere. For this reason--that is, in order to counter feared local rebellions--Washington has set up its "quick-reaction" forces and redeployed its ships, raising not more than 2 months ago the possibility of a direct intervention in Iran. However, not even these measures are sufficient to reassure the Europeans. On the contrary, they alarm them, since the first effect of any armed conflict in the area would be that of blocking the supply of oil.

Short-Lived Simplifications

The Soviet intervention in Afghanistan has introduced a new factor. The legitimate emotion which this has provoked helped Carter, among other things, to finally launch the military plans already drawn up for the region, without even consulting his European allies, despite the fact that their interests were dramatically at stake. Giving or not giving support became at that time a kind of test of virility and strength--a test of "solidarity." But these simplifications are usually short lived. In the first place, there was nobody who was in favor of the Soviet intervention: Everybody was opposed to it. So it had nothing to do with that. Second, as it became enmeshed in Afghanistan, Soviet policy itself could see the prospects offered by its influence in the Middle East, which has lasted for a quarter of a century, diminishing--at least for the present. Last, the U.S. military measures themselves proved to be far from appropriate to their declared aim--that is, countering a possible thrust by the Soviet Union (a point which debates in the United States have themselves very quickly brought to light)--while being well designed for suppressing local revolts in that way which, as we have seen, certainly could not reassure the Europeans.

Incidentally, it must be said that the recent Soviet proposals (merely outlined in Brezhnev's latest speech and later set out in greater detail in the press) of an overall appraisal of the energy problem and of the security of theoil supply routes were not unskillful, either, precisely because they took these contradictions into account. Among other things, those proposals did not seek at all, as some newspapers have claimed, to exclude the United States from the discussion of the problems which have arisen--a plan which would be totally unrealistic. On the contrary, they were suggesting negotiations within the context of Helsinki, in which the United States is fully present. No government has so far rejected them. The problem of reconciling interests and stances on the two sides of the Atlantic does in fact exist. But it is precisely up to the Americans and Europeans to demonstrate that they can resolve it within the framework of their bilateral relations or on a broader basis.

Within this context French diplomacy has acted on its own account with Giscard, who has resumed De Gaulle's style and methods for the occasion. But--more silently--German diplomacy is also acting. The terms of the French proposals are known--the Palestinians' right to self-determination, the setting up of a "homeland" for them, recognition of 'Arafat as a valid interlocutor, guarantees for the security of all states in the region and a further intervention by the United Nations. The hypothesis has been put forward that this could also become Europe's joint platform. This would be a very important new development which could finally give Europe that peacemaking role in the Middle East which it has so far lacked--a role which, if it is to be serious, cannot disregard the wishes of the peoples of that region. The Americans might resent this at first, but in the long term they would also benefit from it because they would be helped to free themselves from the fetters in which their Middle East policy is imprisoned.

If there is no joint European stance as yet, we Italians are the last to be able to be surprised, in view of the Rome government's total absence--an absence as a result of which we risk losing even those points to our credit which had been scored on the problems of the Middle East in a not-too-distant past. Unfortunately, an impotent and moribund government such as that which is in office today can do very little in the international field. But this is not the only reason for its reticence. When an attempt is being made to open up new wounds in the country, as is being done today, these terribly specific problems of the current international situation are shelved. There is a preference for discussing overall options with an ideological background, which are intended to be extenuating circumstances. But with these you cannot formulate a foreign policy and, even less, a European policy capable of answering the real dilemmas posed by today's world.

PCI DEPUTIES QUESTION GOVERNMENT ON PLO RECOGNITION

[Unattributed report: "PCI Urges PLO Recognition"]

[Text] Rome--The need for the Italian Government to invite Yasir 'Arafat to Italy and officially recognize the PLO right away, thus granting official status to the Palestinian organization's existing office in Rome, was emphasized in a question which a group of PCI deputies (headed by Alinovi and Gian Carlo Pajetta) put to the prime minister and foreign minister.

The question asks in particular:

"1--What initiatives the Italian Government intends to take to facilitate negotiated and global solution to the Mideast conflict, while asserting within the framework of the security of all states in the area, the Palestinian people's right to self-determination and an independent state, on the basis of a resumption of negotiations involving all the sides concerned, including the PLO, the Palestinian people's sole legitimate representative;

"2--Whether the Italian Government does not consider it opportune to this end to invite PLO Executive Committee Chairman Yasir 'Arafat to visit our country, following the statements made in Parliament by authoritative government representatives that there is no principled opposition to such a visit taking place; since other Western governments have already had meetings with Chairman 'Arafat and have established relations with the PLO in various ways, a further delay would seem inexplicable and reduce the credibility of our country's capacity for initiative;

"3--What measures the government intends to take to recognize the PLO's mission in Italy, granting it formal diplomatic status, as the representatives of all the democratic political forces have already requested several times."

The other signatories of the question, apart from Alinovi and Pajetta, were Comrades Antonio Rubbi, Bottarelli, Cecchi, Cecilia Chiovini, Giancarla Codrignari, Antonio Conte, Giadresco, Pasquini, Spataro and Tombadori.

A question was also put to the foreign minister by 26 Christian Democratic deputies (headed by Deputy Silvestri, chairman of the Committee of Friendship and Solidarity with the Palestinian People), who ask the government "whether the French president's initiatives, Austria's recognition of the PLO and Britain's announced desire to achieve a modification of UN Resolution 242 to strengthen the international community's commitment on the Palestinian people's behalf can be considered individual aspects of a more complex European initiative directed toward surmounting the present deadlock situation" and therefore ask "whether the government consequently intends to adopt similar attitudes, which are more necessary than ever for bringing nearer the prospects of a just, lasting and global peace in the Middle East."

BERLINGUER CONVEYS 'SOLIDARITY' TO MARCHAIS ON WAR CHARGES

[Unattributed report: "Berlinguer Telegram to Marchais"]

[Text] Rome--For some weeks a defamatory campaign has been underway in France against PCF Secretary General Georges Marchais, who is the subject of charges allegedly connected with his conduct during the Nazi occupation. The PCI secretary general has sent Comrade Marchais the following telegram: "The campaign of lies unleashed against you has angered me. I convey to you the Italian Communists' and my own affectionate solidarity.

UKRAINIAN BISHOPS' SYNOD TROUBLES USSR-VATICAN RELATIONS

LD241245 Paris FRANCE-SOIR in French 20 Mar 80 p 5 LD

[Carlo Rebecchi dispatch: "John Paul II Organizes a Synod of Ukrainian Bishops in Rome"]

[Text] Rome--A very difficult and perhaps explosive synod of about 20 Ukrainian Catholic bishops will be meeting in the Vatican next Monday around John Paul II: Whatever its outcome, it threatens, in effect, to expose a crisis, either in the church, or--and this could be more serious--in relations between the church and the Soviet Union.

Most of the 19 Ukrainian bishops living in the West (Europe, the United States and Australia) will take part in this Ukrainian synod. A certain number of Catholic bishops living secretly in the Soviet Republic of the Ukraine have also been invited, but it is still not known whether they will be able to attend. For security reasons and after Stalin ordered the closing of the Catholic churches in the Ukraine 32 years ago, they exercise their apostleship in absolute secrecy and do not even figure in the Vatican's almanac.

Apparently the synod's problem is very simple: The Ukranian Catholics are asking that their spiritual leader, Cardinal Slipyj, should be recognized under the title of patriarch, as the Second Vatican Council envisaged, in fact. The 87-year-old cardinal is not at all liked by the Soviet leaders. They imprisoned him at the end of the war and freed him only in 1963 after Pope John XXIII had interceded with Khrushchev. He has since been living in Rome and the 2 million Ukranian Catholics, who fled their country after religious persecution, have organized themselves around him.

Political Separatism

The Vatican, first through Paul VI and then through John Paul II, has always refused the Ukrainians' requests which would result in recognizing the existence of the Ukranian Church. There are at least two reasons for that. The Vatican indicates unofficially that the most important is the risk of a severe reaction from the Soviet Union. In fact, Rome predicts that the recognition of an autonomous Ukranian Church would certainly be interpreted by the Kremlin leaders and the Moscow Orthodox patriarchy as an act of religious and political separatism. As a result they would probably sever all relations with the Church of Rome. That would thus signify the failure of the Vatican's ostpolitik, and , it is thought, would provoke an inevitable tightening of the screws on the Catholics in all the communist countries.

Another cause for disagreement, but this time between the Vatican and the Ukranian Catholics, is the marriage of priests. Cardinal Slipyj wants exiled Ukranian seminarists to be able to marry before being ordained priests, as the Eastern Church permits. Rome is of the opposite opinion.

VATICAN RADIO NOTES MORE PRC, EAST EUROPEAN LISTENERS

[Text] Vatican City, March 25 (ANSA)--The number of listeners tuned in to Vatican Radio is on the rise in China and in the Eastern European nations, it was learned here.

The head of Vatican Radio, Father Roberto Tucci told newsmen here that for the past year around 30-40 letters a month arrive from listeners in China. Under Mao, not only did no letters arrive, but it was not even known whether anyone heard the Vatican broadcasts in that country, Father Tucci said.

In several African nations, Vatican Radio up until recently was the only means of communication between the Rome Church and African Catholics.

Diffuclties still arise in reaching Catholics in certain European nations such as Czechoslovakia, he said.

Last year the Vatican Radio received a total of 50,000 letters from nations around the world. These included around 5,000 from the Soviet Union, 7,000 from Poland, 2,000 from North America and around 400 from China. However, there has been a strong increase in the number of letters received here over the first three months of this year, Tucci continued. As a result, some 70,000 letters are expected by the end of the year, chiefly from Asia and Eastern Europe.

Father Tucci, a Jesuit, said that for the moment there were no plans for any Vatican television broadcasts. The expenditure would be too high and the utility too low, he said. He noted that the Vatican Radio has a budget twenty times lower than that of the British "BBC" and that it has only 300 people on its staff.

DC CONSIDERS FORMULA FOR GOVERNMENT COALITION

[Text] The Christian Democratic Party Directorate met today with the participation of Francesco Cossiga to indicate to the premier-designate the lines along which he should move in the formation of a new governemnt. Party Secretary Piccoli made a brief speech in which he stressed the importance of the position adopted by the Socialist Party in its decision to participate directly in a government in the spirit of national solidarity.

It is in this direction, said Piccoli, that Premier Cossiga's attempts should move, even though, he added, relations with the sectarian democratic parties--to which circumstances have given different roles to play--must remain within the ambit of a common policy.

It is in this direction, said Piccoli, that Premier Cossiga's attempts should move, even though, he added, relations with the secretarian democratic parties--to which circumstances have given different roles to play--must remain within the ambit of a common policy.

In a statement to journalists, Luigi Ciriaco De Mita, a member of the democratic minority, said that Piccoli's speech suggests as a possible government formula a majority that would include the Socialist Party and the Republican Party. Having received assurances that this interpretation was valid, said De Mita, we approved the secretary's speech.

Premier Cossiga has insisted on his determination to conclude the government crisis quickly.

PCI'S DI GIULIO REFLECTS ON SPLIT ON FOREIGN POLICY VOTE

[Unattributed report on PCI Directorate member Fernando Di Giulio 14 March speech during PCI Central Committee debate]

[Text] The recent parliamentary vote on foreign policy issues, Comrade Di Giulio began, merits some further considerations, both with regard to the overall development of events and with regard to the political significance of the outcome reached with the convergence on a unitary motion. We found ourselves faced with an initiative stemming from the rightwing forces within the Christian Democratic Party [DC], or at least forces within the DC which hold a regressive stance on foreign policy. It cannot be ruled out that this decision was heavily influenced by the German Christian Democratic leadership. The original DC motion (in parts it was coarsely provocative) was clearly designed to bring about a split in the unitary alinement which has been formed on previous occasions in connection with important aspects of Italy's international initiative. They were counting on a split in the democratic forces so as to bring about a change for the worse, a regression affecting the entire foreign policy line.

This was the fundamental political problem which the Communist group had to tackle with its initiative. It was clear that the objective had to be to thwart the DC rightwing's operation. An attempt in this direction should have been made--and in a determined matter, not simply as a principled request. A realistic consideration of the balance of forces led us to conclude that, if we introduced an alternative proposal, the DC motion would prevail. Indeed, the Socialists, Republicans and part of the DC group, who were willing to negotiate on the various positions, were not in a position to commit themselves to forming an alternative alinement to the DC motion.

With regard to this balance of forces, the promoters of the DC initiative (the part of the "preamble" alinement most directly linked to Fanfani) adopted an entirely recalcitrant position. Their objective--this should be repeated--was a split. This was evident throughout the complex phase which preceded the vote: On three occasions negotiations were begun, and three times they were interrupted. In fact the voting started amid a split which appeared impossible to heal. Only when the time came for it to examine its own motion did the DC resort to the most unusual practice of requesting an adjournment, declaring its willingness to negotiate--a solution (as later proved to be the case) which would delete from the resolution all the most obviously manipulatory and provocative parts. Was this a painless decision? On the contrary! A split occurred within the DC group, and the shift was caused by moments of harsh conflict within the party.

The unitary document which was eventually approved is the result of a subsequent series of deletations. Compared to other stances adopted in the past, it is certainly unsatisfactory, but this is not the yardstick which I believe we should use. Instead I would ask the following question: Does the outcome of this affair facilitate our international initiative or not? With this unitary vote, possibilities for action that the DC maneuver aimed to nullify remain open. Had we adopted a different stance, a winning alinement would have been formed by the DC, the Liberals, and the Social Democrats, supported by the "crutch" of the fascist group. It would have meant defeat. It would have been easier to explain and record, without arguments within the party, but nevertheless a defeat in the delicate and most important area of drawing up the country's foreign policy.

In any event, the furious reaction of the DC's most reactionary sectors adequately demonstrates the direction of the attempted maneuver and also the defeat inflicted through its essential neutralization. Realistically, we can state that a considerable number of the 60 "marksmen" who opposed the unitary solution belong to the DC group. But the problem also exists for us, and it must not be underestimated. This is the first time that discordant and breakaway attitudes--expressed in the secret ballot--have come prominently to light. We condemn these attitudes because they do not take due account of the party's need--which we consider decisive--to stand united and support political decisions and battles unitarily.

We know that there is always a price to pay for a political operation. In this case too we had to pay certain prices. Finally, an overall assessment must also take into account this vote's repercussions on the country's domestic policy. For the first time the Zaccagnini group in the DC secured scope for an initiative against the "preamble" majority; our relations with the Republicans were consolidated in this very important area; the DC rightwing saw its ambitious splittist maneuver largely neutralized. These are of course secondary consequences but they should not be underestimated.

CALTAGIRONE BROTHERS ARRESTED; ITALCASSE SCANDAL DETAILED

[Text] Rome, March 22 (ANSA)--Italian Minister of the Interior Virginio Rognoni commented last night on the arrest a few hours earlier in New York of two of the three Caltagirone brothers saying that "an order of justice was carried out. The police did its duty and cooperation at the level of Interpol was once again exemplary".

The Caltagirones are wanted in connection with Italy's biggest bankruptcy scandal. The whereabouts of the third brother, Camillo, is not known.

Arrest warrants for the brothers Gaetano, Francesco and Camillo Caltagirone on charges of fraudulent bankruptcy were issued after 27 of their contracting companies went bankrupt.

They were named in arrest warrants on charges of embezzlement and false testimony in connection with the investigation into the loans made by Italcasse to a number of companies without sufficient collateral. Italcasse is the central bank of all of Italy's provincial savings banks.

In recent weeks, another investigation, into "Italcasse's slush fund", led to forty arrests in the banking and industry worlds. The "slush fund" is believed to have been used to hand out sums of money between 1970 and 1977 to members of the political establishment to obtain backing and favors.

The spiralling Caltagirone affair also led to the resignation of a government minister. Merchant Marine Minister Franco Evangelisti was quoted in an interview with a Rome daily as admitting that he had received payments from the Roman contractors. Evangelisti partially denied the interview and said he was stepping down from the post in order not to obstruct government activity.

In 1977 the Caltagirone brothers asked judicial authorities to look into their position in the wake of the controversy triggered by their request for a large loan from Italcasse.

In June 1979 Italcasse asked that a group of companies owned by the Caltagirones be declared bankrupt.

The three brothers were officially interrogated by judicial authorities and they assured they would present documentation to demonstrate how their companies' books stood when Italcasse made its request.

At that point the Roman contractors disappeared from sight. Last December a civil court declared 19 companies bankrupt and ten more the following month.

On February 8 the arrest warrants for fraudulent bankruptcy were issued. But the three brothers had already fled Italy.

On March 4, arrest warrant were issued for the Caltagirones on charges on embezzlement and false testimony in connection with the Italcasse unsecured loans investigation.

All the arrest warrants were international and entrusted to Interpol which tracked down two of the brothers in New York. A New York judge ordered the two brothers held without bail pending an extradition hearing. Police said they were preparing to flee the country on a private plane.

NUCLEAR PLANNING GROUP APPLICATION TO BE ACCEPTED 'SOON'

LD210855 Lisbon EXPRESSO in Portuguese 15 Mar 80 pp 1, 20 LD

[Unattributed report: "Portugal Able to Keep Nuclear Secrets"]

[Excerpt] Atlantic alliance experts have concluded that Portugal has "sufficient security conditions" to be able to have access to NATO's nuclear secrets, following a test carried out in Lisbon in the middle of last year, EXPRESSO has learned from a reliable military source. The team of alliance experts visited the Portuguese capital at the suggestion of the armed forces chief of general staff, General Ramalho Eanes, and the outcome of the tests carried out at the time indicates that Portugal's recent application to join the Nuclear Planning Group will be accepted very soon.

A source close to the Ministry of Defense acknowledged this week that [Minister of Defense] Adelino Amaro da Costa is awaiting a formal invitation from NATO to take part, with his counterparts in the alliance countries, in the Nuclear Planning Group meeting scheduled for May in Bodo in northern Norway. Amaro da Costa's presence at this meeting would mark Portugal's entry into a body whose doors were close to it in 1974-1975 as a result of pressure from NATO circles which feared at the time that the alliance's nuclear secrets would not be in good hands.

U.S. TO DELIVER FIGHTER-BOMBERS TO AIR FORCE

LD210857 Lisbon EXPRESSO in Portuguese 15 Mar 80 p 1 LD

[Unattributed report: "Americans Decide To Deliver Aircraft to Portuguese Air Force"]

[Excerpt] The Portuguese Air Force will receive from the United States 22 Corsair A-74 fighter-bombers, worth $74 million, in April next year. These aircraft, which will be stationed at Monte Real, are being supplied under the agreement on the leasing of the Lajes (Azores) Air Base.

After almost 2 years of constant postponements, the Portuguese Air Force pointed out to the U.S. authorities that, despite respecting the reasons cited by Washington, the delay was beginning to exceed the bounds of Portuguese goodwill. According to a well-placed military source, the air force chief of staff, General Lemos Ferreira himself, played a decisive role in inducing the Americans to honor their commitments more promptly. "In keeping with his nature, the air force chief of staff was diplomatic but firm," the source told EXPRESSO.

LISBON VIEWS PROPOSAL FOR EARLY PRESIDENTIAL ELECTIONS

[Excerpts] At a luncheon a few days ago of leaders of the Democratic Alliance and of the Reformists' group, Sa Carneiro put forward a strategic proposal of great importance though somewhat controversial: The presidential elections should be brought forward and be held before the legislative elections. It should be said that the idea did not gain majority support at a meeting next day of the National Political Committee of the Social Democratic Party.

The idea is in keeping with the somewhat Machiavellian character of the political activity of the current prime minister. If adopted, it would force General Ramalho Eanes to make a rapid decision on whether or not to stand for another presidential term. It would also force the Socialists to hurry in choosing a candidate to support, be it Ramalho Eanes or someone else.

Finally, if the Democratic Alliance candidate emerged the winner, this would undermine the political weight of General Ramalho Eanes until the end of his mandate--that is, until 14 January, 1981.

In certain circles, it is believed that the fact that Sa Carneiro has put forward such a proposal shows that Democratic Alliance has finally chosen its presidential candidate. It is thought that his name may be announced on 25 April so as to divert attention from the customary presidential speech made that day, a speech that should, on past record, be politically important.

MINISTERS VISIT ALENTEJO, DISCUSS UNEMPLOYMENT

[Excerpts] In pursuance of a cabinet directive, a party of government ministers yesterday visited Alentejo for the second time. The party, including Agriculture Minister Cardo Cunha, Internal Administration Minister Eurico de Melo, and Labor Minister Eusebio Marques de Carvalho, afterwards held a news conference in the town of Evora.

The agriculture minister told the news conference that while his ministry respected the land reform area farmworkers' decision to lay down their tools and hold demonstrations on 26 and 27 of this month, it would insure that the industrial action does not take an undemocratic form likely to disturb the peace and safety of those wanting to go about their work.

He said it is time people stopped clinging to myths and dreams, to fixed ideas, and began thinking in terms of what Alentejo, like the rest of the nation, has to contribute to the economy of the country as a whole. He said that Portugal's forthcoming admission into the EEC is a major challenge which cannot be met with our present level of agricultural production.

The internal administration minister said that the ministerial visit was intended to enable the ministers to see for themselves whether the authorities are in a position to assure the people that law and order will be maintained.

The labor minister said that his ministry has facts and figures about unemployment in Alentejo, which, he said, is being deliberately exaggerated for political ends. He said the government has plans to alleviate underemployment in the land reform area, one of the measures being to provide for unemployment benefits, vocational training and (?re-employment) of the workers as well as creating new jobs in coordination with other organizations.

MINISTRY ISSUES STATEMENT ON LISBON DEMONSTRATIONS

[Text] The following is the text of a note just reaching our newsroom from the Internal Administration Ministry in connection with the incidents that took place at the end of a demonstration against the rising cost of living held in Lisbon on Saturday:

Despite warnings issued on the spot by the police, certain participants in the demonstration in Figueira Square on Saturday 22 March tried to extend their action to Franqueiros and Augusta streets, Comercio Square and Rossion, with utter disrespect for the legislation on street demonstrations. As troublemakers they sought to subvert the public order and provoke a confrontation with the security forces.

After the demonstrators announced their intention through the public address system set up at the venue in defiance of the police and with the clear aim of creating scenes of physical violence, they were legitimately stopped by the security forces from carrying out their aims.

As in other analogous circumstances, this is yet another instance of top leaders not being present at the scene, after calling for political violence and enticing citizens to disrespect the law, thus provoking confrontations which result in regrettable casualties.

Proceedings against the organizers of the demonstration for this clear breach of the law will be filed by the Lisbon police at the appropriate judicial court.

The internal administration minister confirms the government's firm commitment to enforce the laws, namely, those regulating the right of assembly.

Law-abiding citizens are assured that the public order will be maintained through a determined action by the security forces.

WORKERS' LEADER SAYS NATIONWIDE DEMONSTRATIONS PLANNED

LD241442 Lisbon Domestic Service in Portuguese 0001 GMT 24 Mar 80 LD

[Interview by unidentified reporter with Ernesto Cartaxo, member of the Secretariat of the General Confederation of Portuguese Workers-National Intersyndical (CGTP-IN) on 23 March, place not given--recorded]

[Excerpts] [Reporter] How does the CGTP-IN view the present social situation?

[Cartxo] In the opinion of the CGTP-IN, it is clear that the present outbreak of workers' struggles is basically due to the policies pursued by the government in various areas of the national life. These policies give us cause for extreme concern since in a little more than 2 and ½ months, the government has brutally caused the deterioration of the already difficult living conditions of the Portuguese workers and of the most underprivileged classes, and has been doing its utmost to destroy the main achievements of 25 April.

In the sphere of agarian reform we are witnessing a revolting and criminal offensive against this noble attainement of 25 April. In a little more than 2 months, the Sa Carneiro-Freitas do Amaral government has pillaged the cooperative farms of over 20,000 hectares of land and has actually liquidated a number of collective units of production. Over 20,000 farm workers have been made jobless since the beginning of the offensive against the agrarian reform. The farm workers who have justly opposed this policy have been subjected to barbarous beatings; not even their women and children have been spared.

With increasing forcefulness and insistence the workers are demanding a change of government, its replacement by a democratic government that will pursue democratic policies in the interests of the workers and of the country. This is why thousands and thousands of workers took to the streets in Lisbon and Oporto yesterday to protest against the government's policies. And on 25, 26 and 27 March, there will be nationwide actions of solidarity with the agrarian reform and its heroic defenders. Of course, all these actions have the support and active solidarity of the CGTP-IN in accordance with the resolutions of our third congress.

[Question] Would you say that this outburst of strikes could be seen as a kind of nonparliamentary opposition to the Sa Carneiro government?

[Answer] Obviously, in the social sphere it is indeed an expression of opposition toward the government's policies. Let there be no doubt about that because, as I have already stressed, the government's policies are directly at loggerheads with the interests and rights of the workers. And, naturally, within the framework of their rights, freedoms and guarantees enshrined in the Constitution, the workers will do their utmost to directly oppose the continuation of such policies.

[Question] Would you say that the CGTP-IN's pending application to membership of the European Trade Union Confederation signals a certain relaxation--if not a backing down--in the CGTP-IN's hitherto inflexible opposition to Portugal's membership of the EEC?

[Answer] I would not speak in terms of an inflexible opposition to EEC membership. Our position is that there should be a public debate, there should be public clarification, and this has been denied to the Portuguese people up to now. Portuguese workers and public opinion in general must be enlightened as to the pros and cons of EEC membership.

Regarding our application for membership in the European Trade Union Confederation, it is connected but not all that much with Portugal's application for EEC membership. It is part and parcel of our international relations policy.

[Question] Is it not true that the European Trade Union Confederation has conditioned the CGTP-IN's membership toward adoption of an unequivocal stand on the question of Afghanistan? Is there not a demand that the CGTP-IN voice its condemnation on the Afghan question?

[Answer] No. The question has never arisen in our contacts with the European Trade Union Confederation.

SOCIALIST PARTY ATTACKS GOVERNMENT COALITION

LD231430 Lisbon in Portuguese to Europe 0915 GMT 23 Mar 80 LD

[Excerpt] "The present cabinet is incapable of governing in a democracy"--that was the view expressed yesterday by the Socialist Party parliamentary group in a communique released at the end of a number of meetings held for 2 days in the city of Guarda. The Socialist Party parliamentary group also denounced, quote: The escalation of the reactionary forces' attacks directed against the Constitution and aimed at destroying the present democratic regime as a means to disguise the obvious fact that the government is no longer capable of governing with the workers and is, on the other hand, unable to govern without them. Unquote.

The communique goes on to say that quote: They will go on fighting and will even step up their struggle in defense of the Constitution and democracy, of the workers' interests and in defense of the rights and freedoms. Unquote.

After accusing the government coalition of, we quote, again: systematically blocking parliamentary proceedings and of impudently failing to observe the statute of the opposition, unquote, the Socialist MP's state that, quote: The increasing government control of the media and the manipulation of news reporting which is increasingly difficult to conceal, prevents, on account of silencing tactics and distortions resorted to by the government, the dissemination of the action being carried out by the opposition both in parliament and outside it. Unquote.

MINISTRY SOURCES DENY CONSIDERING CSCE POSTPONEMENT

[Text] Spain has not considered either suspending or postponing the European conference on cooperation and security due to be held next autumn in Madrid. This was stated by sources at the Office of Diplomatic Information of the Ministry of Foreign Affairs. The sources added: The progress of preparations is going according to schedule and consultations with the governments involved have been intensified recently. No country has, officially or otherwise, informed this ministry that it wants a postponement or suspension of the conference.

TALKS WITH U.S. ON BILATERAL TREATY TO OPEN 18 APRIL

[Text] On 18 April in Madrid preliminary talks between Spain and the United States will open regarding a possible revision of the U.S.-Spanish treaty which is to expire in September next year. Circles close to the Foreign Affairs Ministry state that it is Spain's wish that there be negotiations for a new treaty to replace the existing one which was signed in 1976.

At the same time, the coming talks will raise for the first time the subject of achieving a balance of interests and improving Spain's position. Experts do not rule out the possibility that Spain might request that Washington withdraw from the Torrejon Base and that Spain might also seek greater economic and technological cooperation as well as military aid.

BELGIAN MINISTERS ARRIVE FOR TALKS

[Summary] Belgian Prime Minister Wilfried Martens arrived shortly after 1200 at Barajas Airport on a Belgian Air Force plane to begin his official visit to Spain. He is accompanied by his wife, Belgian Foreign Minister Henri Simonet and a party of 30 representatives of the Belgian media.

Mr Martens was welcomed at the airport by Prime Minister Adolfo Suarez and after the formalities they flew by helicopter to Zarzuela Palace to meet King Juan Carlos. The first talks between the two prime ministers will begin this evening at the Moncola Palace.

Suarez, Martens Banquet Speeches

[Excerpts] A gala banquet was held tonight in the Viana Palace in honor of the Belgian visitors. There were speeches by the two prime ministers during the toasts. Here are the main points:

Suarez said: We are living through a time which is dominated by conflicts, tensions and uncertainties, when detente seems to have given way to confrontation as a consequence of the situation created by the invasion of Afghanistan, a nonalined Islamic country which has been militarily occupied by a foreign power; a time of grave economic crisis at the international level which is resulting in increased unemployment, stagnated production, a general rise in inflation and an unprecedented dislocation of the energy and raw material markets.

Spain and Belgium like the other Western countries and the huge majority of the members of the international community, have condemned the Soviet invasion of Afghanistan. But this strong condemnation should not prevent us from redoubling our efforts to achieve a rapprochement between the East and the West and to avoid the return to confrontation and the concepts of the cold war. The world--and above all Europe--needs detente.

Suarez added: The present international situation also demands increased concerted efforts to confront the present world economic crisis, the causes of which are international, and this is why cooperation and international solidarity are needed to deal with and solve the crisis. Spain has decided, at the free will of its people, to join the Europe Community and it will strive, full of hope, to strengthen the institutions, to overcome differences and cooperate with developing countries, especially the Arab countries and vast world of Ibero-America, with which it is linked by profound ties.

Wilfried Martens replied: Belgium welcomes Spain's forthcoming entry into the Common Market and its contribution to the actions of the EEC. These actions are even more imperative today than in the past, in light of the new challenges which the Community has to face to guarantee its development and security. The events of the past few months have reminded us how precarious peace and security are in spite of the hopes raised by the conference on security and cooperation according to the Helsinki Final Act. Our anxieties should not, however, make us renounce continuing detente. We want to continue in a spirit of realism to actively prepare for the forthcoming Madrid conference. In fact, we must continue to work for international respect for human rights which should be recognized for all.

Our talks have confirmed the existence of common objectives. Here and now I would like to express my firm conviction that in the future this convergence of views will be translated into a greater rapprochement in economic, political and cultural terms, based on cooperation and the natural affinities between our two peoples.

PSOE'S GONZALEZ EXPRESSES CONCERN AT SPANISH SITUATION

LD211101 Barcelona LA VANGUARDIA in Spanish 18 Mar 80 p 19 LD

[EFE report: "I Have Not Spoken With Suarez Since November"--first paragraph introductory]

[Text] Felipe Gonzalez has expressed in statements his deep concern about the situation in the country. The Spanish Socialist Workers Party [PSOE] secretary general stated that the distance between himself and Suarez is increasingly great, and that he has not spoken with him since November. In Felipe Gonzalez' opinion, the crisis of power and credibility is increasingly pressing, and the result is that the people are experiencing disenchantment. He added that he refuses to take part in the ceremony of confusion and accused the Union of the Democratic Center [UCD] of causing the current political and economic crisis which Spain is experiencing.

Madrid, 17 March--"The distance and lack of communication between myself and Suarez are increasingly great; I have not spoken with him since November," Felipe Gonzalez has told EFE, commenting on relations between the leaders of Spain's two largest parties.

The PSOE secretary general also emphasized his concern about the situation which Spain is experiencing. "For the first time since the transition to democracy began," he said, "I am gravely concerned." "The situation in the country worries me deeply, because I can see no way out of the economic and political crisis into which the UCD has led the Spanish people."

"The crisis of power and credibility is also increasingly pressing," he continued. "There is no planning and no foresight, and everything is being subjected to a makeshift policy which serves only for muddling through."

With respect to the possible disenchantment which Spanish voters may currently be experiencing, he asserted that the Spanish people are indeed experiencing disenchantment or disappointment, because they are only being asked to make sacrifices and not receiving very much in return.

"Now," he said, "when most of the collective agreements are being negotiated, the workers would be prepared to concede a few points in their wages, but in return for the government giving them what in other countries is known as a 'deferred wage' ["salario diferido"], with offsets in the form of housing financed over a lengthy period and good hospital facilities--in a word, compensation, because making this country prosper is a task for everybody. We cannot have millions of dollars in reserves and over 1.5 million unemployed. That money must be mobilized and made productive."

"I do not tire of repeating that enterprises must not be shut down, but nor do I cease saying that we must not strike for striking's sake, because all of us--workers and employers--are heading toward ruin."

When asked about the Socialists' share of the blame for this situation, he said: "The policy of consensus ended with the Constitution; sometimes it is necessary to give way on some points for the good of the country, but the sorry truth is that we are only asked to negotiate on what is of interest to the government and we are denied this on what could be of interest to us. And, of course, we are no longer going to tolerate the subterfuge that consensus continues and we are all guilty. We Socialists are not in the government, and so we cannot make decisions. Nor do we have a majority in the Cortes...; I refuse to take part in the ceremony of confusion."

Last, he referred to the government's approach to the autonomies, and said that you cannot give to some what is denied to others, because this attitude irritates the people. "In any case," he commented, "it is good that the mistakes be acknowledged; it is a sign of humility to which we are not very accustomed."

PCE ISSUES STATEMENT ON POLITICAL SITUATION

LD242240 Madrid Domestic Service in Spanish 2200 GMT 24 Mar 80 LD

[Text] The permanent committee of the Spanish Communist Party [PCE] Executive Committee, which met this evening with Santiago Carrillo in the chair, has issued a communique which states that after examining the political situation created in Spain after the Andalusian referendum and the Basque and Catalan elections, it believes that a change of government and policy in the country is essential.

CARRILLO'S ANTI-SOVIET REMARKS CAUSE 'UNEASE'

LD211744 Madrid Domestic Service in Spanish 1700 GMT 21 Mar 80 LD

WHITEHALL BLAMES EEC SUMMIT DELAY ON ITALIAN PROBLEMS

[Excerpt] The postponement of the Common Market summit--due to be held in Brussels next Monday and Tuesday--was blamed by Whitehall today on the domestic political problems in Italy.

In London, news of the postponement came as a surprise but official sources stressed that a new Italian government is in the process of being formed and this rather than the row over Britain's Common Market bill, is thought to have caused the delay.

The Italians are the present holders of the presidency of the EEC Council and it is technically up to them to call the summit meeting.

The Brussels summit was expected to have spent much time discussing Britain's case for a large cut in its 1,200 million pound Common Market bill. Today Government sources said that since Britain's case was for a reduction in the financial year 1980-81, a short delay would not cause a major problem. But much would depend on how long a delay was now planned.

With the summit in mind, Foreign Secretary Lord Carrington had talks today with his Dutch opposite number Dr. Christopher Van der Klaauw, while Mrs Thatcher is due to meet West German Chancellor Helmut Schmidt as the end of this week.

[By Tom McMullan, PA diplomatic correspondent]

[Text] Britain has wasted no time in pressing for a new date for the EEC summit to consider Mrs Thatcher's demands for a substantial cut in Britain's 1,200 million pound contribution to the Community budget.

The Foreign Office suggested tonight that the next summit--postponed from next week because of the Italian Government crisis--should be before the end of April.

Italy is the current president of the EEC.

Today official sources in London stressed that a new Italian Government is being formed, and this rather than the row over Britain's EEC bill is thought to have caused the delay.

Italian ambassador to London Signor Cagiati today explained his country's difficulties to Foreign Secretary Lord Carrington.

In its statement afterwards, the Foreign Office said Britain had made it clear to all the EEC countries that agreement to the postponement was conditional on a new firm date--by the end of April at the latest.

Some pro-Market Tory MSs thought tonight the postponement might help, in giving all sides time to examine the results of a collision course.

CAGATAY REELECTED LEADER OF TURKISH CYPRIOT PARTY

TA231508 (Clandestine) Bayrak Radio in English to Cyprus 1215 GMT 23 Mar 80 TA

[Text] The prime minister, Mr Cagatay, was reelected the chairman of the ruling National Unity Party [NUP] at the third congress of the party in Nicosia today. Addressing the congress before his reelection, Mr Cagatay reiterated that the latest UN General Assembly resolution on Cyprus overshadowed the efforts for the resumption of the intercommunal talks. He said that it was like the Sword of Damocles hanging over the Turkish Cypriot community and that as long as it hangs there it would be an obstacle to the resumption of the talks or it would not allow the talks to yield positive results.

The prime minister also said that as long as the Greek Cypriots maintain their traditional animosity against the Turks it would be impossible to find a solution to the Cyprus problem and bring permanent peace to Cyprus and the region. He reiterated that the problem could be solved not at international forums, but through the international talks held in good faith. Mr Cagatay said he wanted the Greek Cypriot leadership to know that its campaign of slander and vilification against the Turks at international forums encouraged the Turkish Cypriots further to become self-sufficient and would result in wider recognition of the political status of the Turkish Cypriot community. This was proved by the fact that the Turkish Cypriot community had made great progress in its struggle for becoming more self-sufficient. The federated state had also obtained good results in its efforts for receiving international recognition. One of these favorable results was the holding of an Islamic conference in the federated state and the sympathetic understanding shown by the Muslim countries for the problems of the federated state.

Turning to the economic situation in the federated state, the prime minister said the gross national product in the north would reach 4.65 billion Turkish lira in 1980, while this was 4.346 billion lira last year. He stressed that the target was to achieve a 7 percent annual economic growth.

[Excerpts] Commenting on the statement made day before yesterday by the Turkish Cypriot political leader, Mr Cagatay, chairman of the "National Unity Party" and "prime minister" in Denktas' government, the president of the "Democratic Rally," Mr Kliridhis, said that "he is ready to meet him in his capacity as a party leader."

A political figure from the government side said in answer to a question on how he views such a meeting:

"I do not see anything bad--nor would I say the opposite--in a meeting between party leaders from the two sides. I, too, would have agreed to participate with even the remotest hope that something good and useful might come out of such a meeting if it is held in an atmosphere of mutual good will and frankness.

"The only thing I have to say, in the case of Mr Kliridhis, is that it would be good if a possible meeting (in view of the fact that the talks are pending, and in view of the known UN General Assembly resolution on appointing an investigatory committee) were held a little later so that it would not create misunderstanding or confusion internationally, which the Turkish side would definitely hasten to exploit."

KIPRIANOU URGES AUSTERITY IN FACING ECONOMIC PROBLEMS

NC221226 Nicosia Domestic Service in English 1200 GMT 22 Mar 80 NC

[Text] The president of the republic, Mr Kiprianou, has stressed the need for austerity to deal with the economic problems facing the country. Addressing the annual meeting of the Public Servants Union in Nicosia this morning, the president called for measures to reinforce economic stability, cuts in luxury spending and help for the poorer classes.

Turning to political issues, Mr Kiprianou called on all parties and organizations to set national interest above everything else and strengthen unity and concord. The president of the republic reiterated that the government and the Greek Cypriot side were inspired by good will and moderation and were ready to attend talks under the auspices of the UN secretary general.

The meeting was also addressed by the president of the House of Representatives, Mr Mikhailidhis; the minister of finance, Mr Avxendiou; and the general secretary of the Public Servants Union, Mr Iakovou. His Beatitude Archbishop Khrisostomos, ministers and other officials attended the opening session. The conference will continue until Monday.

AYDINLIK INTERVIEWS ARCHBISHOP KHRISOSTOMOS

NC241045 Istanbul AYDINLIK in Turkish 21 Mar 80 p 1 NC

[Interview granted by Greek Cypriot Archbishop Khrisostomos to AYDINLIK correspondent in Nicosia--date not given]

[Excerpts] Question: May I learn your views on the solution of the Cyprus dispute?

Answer: First of all, foreign intervention must stop. Everybody must understand that the Turks and the Greeks can co-exist on this island. We must tell all outsiders who interfere in our internal affairs--be it directly or indirectly: "Stop interfering," and this includes Turkey and Greece.

I believe that when the interference stops, the Turkish and Greek Cypriots can find a solution.

Question: What practical steps can be taken toward a settlement?

Answer: Many people think that we can extricate ourselves from the present deadlock through negotiations. My conviction is that no settlement can be found under the present conditions. Let me explain why: The Greek Cypriots are the oppressed side today, because they have been driven from their homes and institutions. Secondly, the Turkish Army is still on the island. Turkey has 40,000 troops on the island. Moreover, according to some circles, some 80,000 Turks have come from Turkey to settle in Cyprus. How can the Turkish Cypriots take an independent decision under these circumstances? I believe they have to act according to the wishes of Turkey.

Question: Do you mean that the key to a settlement is in the hands of Turkey?

Answer: Everything depends on the wishes of Turkey. If Turkey is concerned only with the future and security of the Turkish Cypriots, then the key could turn in the lock. But if the intention is to partition Cyprus or treat Cyprus as a bridgehead, this would make it impossible to resolve the Cyprus issue.

We gather from the intercommunal talks held so far that Turkey's aim is to treat Cyprus as a bridgedhead. That is why we--the Greek Cypriots and our government--have resorted to the United Nations for help. True, the security of the Turkish Cypriots is an important question. Upon the departure of the Turkish troops from the island, we must be in a position to offer a crystal clear answer as to how this security can be provided.

Both Christopher and Nimetz asked me the same question during my visit to the United States. As I recall, I told them: "Let the UN troops take care of the security of the Turkish Cypriots, both before and after the settlement. Let the Cyprus Government share the costs between the two communities on the island until confidence is restored."

Question: May I have your views on the much-talked-about federation in Cyprus?

Answer: I am against any form of settlement which may introduce separatism on the island, be this in respect of territory or population. Division severs relations between the communities. The Turkish Cypriots could resolve their own problems. The Greek Cypriots could do the same. But it would be wrong to completely isolate the two communities from each other. Let there be a central state on the island, and let both Greek and Turkish Cypriots look upon this central state as their own.

Question: What would you say if two regions were formed, with the Greeks forming the majority in one and a Turkish majority in the other?

Answer: Yes, this could be done. Makarios used to say: If the Turkish Cypriots wish to stay in the north, we are prepared to build them houses in the north. However, the return of the Greek Cypriots to their homes must not be obstructed. I believe that it is grossly unfair for the Greek Cypriots to be driven from their homes and for others should move into them.

INTERIOR MINISTER: NOT MUCH HOPE FOR RESUMPTION OF TALKS

[Excerpt] In his address in Limassol today to the sixth district congress of refugees residing in the town and district of Limassol, Interior Minister Veniamin stated that, because of Turkish intransigence, there are no great prospects for resuming the intercommunal talks in the near future. Veniamin stressed that the Greek Cypriot side was ready to attend negotiations based on the Makarios-Denktas and Kiprianou-Denktas agreements and on the UN resolutions. The resumption of talks, however, clashes with the continuing Turkish intransigence. In any event, no agreement would be signed if it abandoned the rights of the refugees or did not insure the security of all the Cypriot people.

INTERNATIONAL FINANCIAL INSTITUTIONS TO EXTEND AID

IMF Loan

[Text] The IMF Administrative Council has decided to activate the third part of special withdrawal loan, which amounts to $60 million in accordance with the existing standby agreement between Turkey and the fund. In accordance with the same agreement Turkey had previously benefited from a special withdrawal loan of $170 million, TRT Washington correspondent Berna Kulac reports that the IMF Administrative Council also assessed the economic measures being implemented in Turkey since 25 January within the framework of the standby agreement.

The World Bank Administrative Council will meet in Washington tomorrow and will discuss extending a program loan of $200 million to Turkey. World Bank officials said that the loan will be extended to facilitate the implementation of the economic measures taken by the Turkish Government. Officials added that the loan will be used to purchase fertilizer and industrial raw materials.

The OECD is to meet in Paris on Wednesday to discuss the amount of the urgent aid to be extended to Turkey. A delegation headed by the under secretary of the prime minister's office and the deputy under secretary of the state planning organization, Turgut Ozal, will be representing Turkey at the OECD meeting to be held on Wednesday. The amount of aid to be extended to Turkey will be fixed at the meeting.

OECD Meeting

[Excerpt] Foreign Minister Hayrettin Erkmen has sent a message to the president of the UN Special Committee on the Struggle Against Racism on the occasion of the Struggle Against Racism Day. In his message, Erkmen said that the Turkish people and the government are opposed to racism. Pointing out that the Turkish people and their government support the people of South Africa in their just and legal struggle against the racist white minority government, Erkmen reiterated his pleasure over the victory won by the Zimbabwe people against racist policy.

LIBYAN MINISTER ARRIVES FOR COOPERATION TALKS

[Text] Libyan Economy Minister [title as heard] Abu Zayd 'Umar Durdah arrived in Turkey today for talks aimed at the promotion of economic and trade relations between the two countries. Durdah and the delegation accompanying him were received at Ankara's Esenboga Airport by State Minister Orhan Eren.

In a statement at the airport, the visiting minister said that he paid this visit in a bid to reassess the prospects of cooperation between the two countries and to solve some difficulties that had arisen. Pointing out the great importance that his country attaches to cooperation with Turkey, Durdah said that he was convinced that his talks would bring beneficial results for both countries.

In his statement, State Minister Eren said that efforts would be made during the talks to give impetus to economic and trade relations between Turkey and Libya. Eren expressed his conviction that the two countries would give the best example of productive cooperation between two countries. Official talks between the Turkish and Libyan delegations will begin in Ankara tomorrow.

DELEGATION LEAVES FOR ISLAMIC CONGRESS IN TFSC

[Text] It has been announced that persons and organizations in the Agri region will be able to trade with the Islamic Republic of Iran through the Gurbulak border checkpoint. A circular by the Trade Ministry published in the official gazette today cites the principles regulating border trade in the region. Under these regulations, those allowed to conduct border trade will be able to import only diesel oil, fuel oil, kerosene and gasoline. However, they will be able to export any item that is not banned by law or other decrees.

VOTCP SCORES U.S. PRESSURES IN NEAR, MIDDLE EAST

[Summary] "The recently intensified hysterical outcries of the U.S. administration in the Near and Middle East clearly show that the developments in this region constitute a severe blow on U.S. imperialism."

Since 1950 Pentagon strategists have been attempting to penetrate the southern and southeastern borders of the Soviet Union. All U.S. governments cooperated with the reactionary governments in the region. "However, the people altered this trend. Even the strength of the United States was not sufficient to stop these developments in the region." During 1978 and 1979 the people of Iran and Afghanistan detached themselves from this strategic chain extending from Turkey to the Persian Gulf as a result of a revolutionary process. Some 50 million people living in these countries rejected imperialism and in particular U.S. imperialism.

"Together with the puppet governments in the region, the United States also lost its close control over the 3,000 km southern border and airspace of the Soviet Union. Until then, the U.S. militarists had considered themselves masters of the region with limitless authority. In 1978, the United States deployed 4,800 troops in Turkey where it has some 30 bases. The United States also initialed a new military agreement with Turkey some time ago and in return promised to increase military and economic aid to Turkey in a so-called significant manner."

In addition, the Pentagon is attempting to establish new bases on Israeli and Lebanese soil. It is also trying to open bases in Egypt, Somalia and Kenya. Over 30 U.S. warships and aircraft carriers are currently in the Persian Gulf. Preparations are under way to have a permanent U.S. fleet in the Indian Ocean. "All these developments indicate that the U.S. imperialists have not accepted their defeat in the region and that it is planning an extensive counterattack which could affect the whole world."

"Within the framework of international war preparations, the Washington administration attaches great importance to training elite military cadres for governments under its control in the Near and Middle East." Since the 1950's, the United States has been giving a clear anti-Soviet direction to the countries in the Near and Middle East. It is directed against the Soviet Union on the outside and the oppressed people inside.

"The United States also considers it important to train loyal cadres for the torture organizations in these countries like the MIT [National Intelligence Organization] and SAVAK." It is also known that the CIA establishes various secret organizations in these countries and that it stages attacks and sabotage against democratic forces and persons.

All the developments prove that the U.S. imperialists have recently--especially following the blow they received from the peoples of Iran and Afghanistan--increased their destructive actions and pressures on Turkey. The Turkish Communist Party is trying to maintain the unity of all anti-imperialist forces and democrats and to organize the struggle to terminate imperialism's sovereignty.

VOTCP REPORTS GREETINGS TO HUNGARIAN WORKERS CONGRESS

[Congratulatory message sent by Turkish Communist Party Central Committee Secretary General Bilen to the 12th ongress of the Hungarian Socialist Workers Party on 24 March 1980]

[Text] To the 12th ngress of the Hungarian Socialist Workers Party: Dear Comrades, on behalf of the Turkish Communist Party [TCP] Central Committee as well as Turkish Communists and toilers, I would like to salute your congress with revolutionary greetings, wishing it great success. Under the guidance of the Hungarian Socialist Workers Party, the Hungarian working class and the Hungarian people are rapidly progressing in the cause of establishing and developing socialism.

Tightly bound with the Soviet Union--Lenin's country--the socialist Hungarian state is making important contributions to strengthening global peace and socialism.

Brotherly ties exist between the Turkish Communists and Hungarian Communists as well as the TCP and the Hungarian Socialist Workers Party within the framework of the principles of Marxism-Leninism and proletarian internationalism. The TCP attaches great value to further strengthening these ties and of friendship between our countries.

I wish your congress great success. With our communist greetings.

[Signed] TCP Central Committee Secretary General Bilen [dated] 24 March 1980.

NSP DEPUTY FIRST PRESIDENTIAL CANDIDATE

TA241536 Ankara ANATOLIA in English 1430 GMT 24 Mar 80 TA

[Text] Ankara, 24 Mar (AA)--National Salvation Party Deputy Sener Battal (Konya) announced he would be a candidate for president at the joint session of the Grand National Assembly Tuesday. He said he was becoming a candidate "only symbolically" in order to releave parliament from the image of "being unable to nominate a presidential candidate." The parliament was unable to ballot on the presidential election when it met for that purpose Saturday because there were no candidates.

Battal hoped other members of parliament, whose names were circulated in connection with the presidential post, would show the "same courage" so as not to lock up the election.

Sener Battal--born in the Aksehir District of the Konya Province, in 1940--has just completed the age requirement for a presidential candidate. He is a graduate of the Gazi Teacher Training Institute and the Faculty of Law in Ankara.

INTERIOR MINISTER CALLS ON TERRORISTS TO SURRENDER

[Excerpts] A committee appointed by the Interior Ministry in accordance with the law on the prevention of acts affecting peace and security has called on 12 persons to surrender. In a news conference held in Ankara today, Interior Minister Mustafa Gulcigil revealed the identity of the 12 persons for whom the call to surrender has been made. Gulcigil called on these persons to surrender within 15 days beginning Wednesday, 26 March 1980. The security forces will be allowed to use arms against those who do not surrender in accordance with this call.

Pointing out that the call made to these persons would be announced in the media, Gulcigil said that the resolution of the committee to this effect would be handed to the families of the persons concerned. Interior Minister Gulcigil continued:

[Begin Gulcigil recording] In a bid to insure the security of life and property, the prevalence of law, order and tranquility, and the liberty of life, our government is activating all measures--within the framework of law--to prevent and uproot anarchic and secessionist terrorism and armed robberies directed against the unity of the Turkish state, the unity and solidarity of the Turkish people, and the peace and security of the country. It is a very well-known fact that as blows are inflicted on illegal organizations, these groups are not intimidated by terror. The terrorists--who have been transformed into a crime machine--begin to act in increased desperation. There is no organization stronger than the state, and it is out of the question for the terrorists to succeed.

It is obvious that this chaos will not be of any use to those engaged in acts of terror either. Departing from this belief, and in a humane effort, our ministry has decided to call on suspects or convicts--who have committed capital crimes and are now erring with their weapons, individually or in groups, continuing to threaten or disrupt public order--in a bid to insure once more peace and security throughout the country and prevent further bloodshed among brothers. If these persons fail to surrender within the 15 days from Wednesday, 26 March 1980, the security forces will be authorized to use their weapons following a warning to surrender. In the event that these persons use their weapons against the security forces, then fire will be returned without any warning at all.

There is one matter I would like to clarify for the benefit of our citizens. Weapons will be used against those who abet criminals during the shootout or during their attempt to flee. Moreover, in accordance with the fourth article of Law No 1481, all those who hide or provide arms or ammunition to the persons to whom the call to surrender has been made will be liable to stiff jail sentences. [end recording]

Interior Minister Gulcigil said that the committee composed of the representatives of the Justice Ministry, Gendarmerie Command and the Directorate General of Security under the chairmanship of the under secretary of the Interior Ministry was continuing to examine the files received from various provinces. He added that the names of other suspects and convicts to be called to surrender would be revealed later. Gulcigil said that this appeal was made in an effort to present those who had committed a capital crime with a last chance to take refuge with the law.

DISK LEADER CRITICIZES GOVERNMENT WAGE PROPOSALS

[Text] Izmit (Turkey's Marmara region), 23 March (AA)--DISK (Confederation of Revolutionary Labor Unions) Secretary General Abdullah Basturk told a rally in Izmit Saturday that the government-proposed version of "echelle-mobile" foreseeing wage increases to go with price increases was in fact aimed at "undermining the syndical struggle of the working class and finally to eliminate the labor unions."

Addressing the "Democracy Rally," Basturk said under the government-proposed tax bill, a 25 percent tax on rentals and revenues from stocks and bonds and a 45 percent tax on the incomesof the workers and state employees would be levied, and the newly-introduced value-added tax would cause further price increases. "Bills elaborated during the former RPP government in order to destroy our democratic rights and liberties are being rapidly passed through the parliamentary houses," he stressed.

Basturk criticized the "terror" program aired by the Turkish radio-tv company in which "hostility toward the working class" was exhibited, adding: "Large-scale strikes have begun. They will be followed by other strikes and work stoppages. Besides, we are definitely going to celebrate May Day all over the country. Let us be prepared for it."

BAYRAK RADIO REPORTS ON WORLD ISLAMIC CONGRESS IN TFSC

Pro-TFSC Resolution

TA251547 (Clandestine) Bayrak Radio in Turkish to Cyprus 1530 GMT 25 Mar 80 TA

[Text] The World Islamic Congress unanimously adopted at its meeting in Gazimagosa [Famagusta] a draft resolution envisaging the support of the Turkish Federated State of Cyprus in all aspects. The resolution calls for the support of the Turkish Federated State of Cyprus on all political issues. It also calls for cooperation with the Turkish Federated State of Cyprus in the social, economic and cultural fields. The resolution states that the Islamic countries should use Ercan State Airport and it also denounces all the Greek Cypriot efforts aimed against the interests of the Turkish Cypriot community.

Further on Cyprus Resolution

TA251847 (Clandestine) Bayrak Radio in English to Cyprus 1730 GMT 25 Mar 80 TA

[Text] The World Muslim Congress, continuing its session at the Salamis Bay Hotel in Famagusta this afternoon, adopted a resolution on Cyprus. The resolution regrets the attempt of the Greek Cypriot leadership to destroy the binational character of the partnership state of Cyprus and the continuation of the economic sanctions against the Turkish Cypriots. It supports the resolutions adopted by the Constituent Council of the World Muslim League at its annual sessions since 1965 and the resolutions of the Islamic Congress adopted on several occasions. It recalls the summit agreements of 1977 and 1979 between the leaders of the two Cypriot communities and the exchange of population agreements between the parties aiming at the reestablishment of the state of Cyprus based on the equal partnership of the two communities in a bizonal form so that the two autonomous administrations in the island can establish an independent, sovereign and nonalined federal republic on the basis of equality, security and peace acceptable to both parties without giving either party the right to persecute or exploit the other.

The resolution also urges the delegates to call upon their governments and Islamic organizations operating in their countries to declare firm solidarity with the Muslim Turkish Cypriots in their endeavors to gain the benefit of international aid in order to activate their economy and social services, which have been greatly damaged by the economic embargo imposed on the Turkish community.

It welcomes the efforts of the Turkish Cypriot people for settling the long-standing Cyprus dispute through the intercommunal negotiations. It expresses the hope that the intercommunal talks will be resumed without further delay in a constructive and meaningful way and will yield positive results. It calls upon all the Islamic countries and organizations to extend assistance towards the building of mosques and schools in Cyprus.

The resolution calls upon the Islamic governments to establish commercial, economic, cultural and other links with the federated state. It also calls upon the Islamic countries to direct their airlines to include Ercan State Airport in the international flights.

It finally expresses sincere gratitude to the Government of Turkey for the support and assistance it has given to the federated state, including its timely intervention which saved the Muslim Turkish Cypriots during the massacres perpetrated by the Greek Cypriots in 1974.

The resolution was warmly welcomed by the minister of foreign affairs and defense, Mr Atakol, and the Turkish minister of state, Mr Kelleci.

Mr Atakol described the adoption of the resolution as a happy event and expressed his gratitude to the delegates for their efforts towards the just cause of the Turkish Cypriot community. Mr Kelleci described the resolution as a vital decision and said that it opened new horizons for the Turkish Cypriot community to become a member of the Islamic organizations.

Solidarity Day With TFSC

TFSC's Atakol Requests Aid

TA251431 (Clandestine) Bayrak Radio in English to Cyprus 1215 GMT 25 Mar TA

[Excerpt] The eighth session of the World Muslim Congress is continuing at the Salamis Bay Hotel in Famagusta today. The conference which opened yesterday morning with an address by President Denktas is discussing Islam, peace and the difficulties of mankind. This morning the session was presided over by the minister of foreign affairs, defense and tourism, Mr Atakol. He told the session that the conference meant a great deal for the Muslim Turkish Cypriots. He said that the fact that it was being held in the federated state was very significant for the Turkish Cypriots. The Muslim population of the world was actually implementing its belief that the Turkish Cypriots were part of this island and they should not be left alone and that nobody should be allowed to treat them as second class citizens in their own homeland. Mr Atakol said that the conference signified a very important step toward Muslim solidarity. He stressed that the Turkish Cypriots, as other Muslims in different parts of the world, were in great need of Muslim solidarity. With the help of this solidarity, he said, we have rid ourselves of oppression.

He continued: Our thoughts and prayers now are for the liberation of our Muslim brethren of Palestine, Afghanistan and the Philippines. Economically we may be unable to extend them any help. However, our chests, full of faith, are ready to shield any danger directed against them. We openly proclaim that we are ardent supporters of the Muslim liberation movements of Palestine, Afghanistan, the Philippines and all others.

After stressing that Muslim solidarity would help the Turkish Cypriots fight the economic embargo imposed upon them by the Greek Cypriot community, Mr Atakol said: The Greek Cypriots received $1 billion of foreign aid during the last 5 years. The federated state did not receive a single penny. The World Bank is now financing six projects in Greek Cyprus. The World Bank, the United Nations development program and countries themselves are pouring financial and technical aid into Greek Cyprus. Because of the great economic help going into Greek Cyprus, the income per capita in Greek Cyprus went up to $3,500 whereas in Turkish Cyprus, it is $900 per capita. Our airports, ports, tourism, trade and everything is under embargo. Not a single foreign airline uses our airport. That is why we ask our Muslim brothers to help us break this embargo. We need the economic help of the Islam Development Bank because the World Bank, like all other international agencies, is discriminating against the Turkish Cypriots. We ask the Muslim countries to fly their airlines to Turkish Cyprus. This is very important for the development of our tourism, trade and agriculture.

Mr Atakol concluded: We ask you to help us get the right kind of resolution at this year's Islamic conference that will enable us to get financial aid from the Islamic World Bank and that will urge the Muslim countries to use our airport and stop helping the Greek embargo imposed upon us.

WARSAW PACT DEMANDS FREEZING TROOP STRENGTHS DURING MBFR

[Unattributed report: "Forces Reduction: Rather Unproductive Discussion About Troop Strengths"]

[Text] The demand for a freezing of troop strengths for the duration of the Vienna negotiations on a reduction of forces in Central Europe was again voiced at the 232d plenary session on Thursday [20 March] by the Bulgarian chief delegate, Ambassador Lyubomir Shopov, on behalf of the Warsaw Pact countries.

According to an Eastern press spokesman, Shopov, the only speaker to address that session, again drew attention to the NATO states' refusal to commit themselves not to increase their troop strengths during the first and second phase of the envisaged forces reduction.

A Western press spokesman said in this context that on the part of the NATO countries there are no objections in principle to a freezing of troop strengths, and that even the West itself had submitted a proposal to that end in the past. However, first it is necessary to achieve a clarification regarding the controversial issue of Eastern troop strengths in the reduction area. (According to NATO figures, the East has a superiority of 150,000 men in Central Europe.) Only a settlement of this question would prevent that problem from becoming a constant source of controversy, the press spokesman said. He added that the Western side is currently studying the latest Eastern proposal for both sides to submit figures for troop strength as of 1 January 1980, thus bringing them up to date.

The next plenary session will be held on Thursday, 27 March.

UNESCO TO INVESTIGATE ARREST OF OFFICIAL IN E. BERLIN

LD251622 Hamburg DPA in German 1539 GMT 25 Mar 80 LD

[Excerpt] Paris--Amadou Mahtar M'Bow, director general of UNESCO, intends to send an envoy to East Berlin shortly to obtain clarification about the fate of UNESCO official Percy Stulz, who is being detained in the GDR against his will. It was learned from UNESCO circles in Paris on Tuesday that the GDR authorities' accusations against the prominent GDR historian, who has been working abroad for a long time, are still not clear.

Stulz, who is over 50 and has been living in Paris with his wife and child, is the highest ranking international UNESCO official from the GDR and is in charge of the "cultural heritage" subdepartment. He had gone to East Berlin in his official capacity to attend a meeting of his country's national commission.

It was learned in Paris that East Berlin subsequently informed UNESCO that Stulz had suffered a heart attack, but Stulz denied this over the telephone. On Monday it was reported in Paris that he and his mother had both been detained. Informed UNESCO circles in Paris today denied reports that Stulz had been abducted from West Berlin.

EEC HAS 'QUIETLY ABANDONED' AFGHAN NEUTRALITY INITIATIVE

LD251227 London THE DAILY TELEGRAPH in English 25 Mar 80 p 4 LD

[Report by diplomatic correspondent David Adamson: "EEC Drops 'Neutral Afghanistan' Plan"]

[Text] The EEC has quietly abandoned a plan for a concerted initiative on Afghanistan based on Lord Carrington's proposal for a neutral, non-aligned state.

The proposal was endorsed by the EEC foreign ministers at a Rome meeting on Feb. 19. It was agreed that after further consultations a detailed plan would be drawn up and left to the Italians, as current holders of the EEC presidency, to present.

But a French decision to conduct bilateral negotiations with the Russians on Afghanistan rather than through the EEC knocked a large hole in the plan while it was still in its rudimentary stage.

Another difficulty was lack of enthusiastic support from non-aligned countries, some of whom took exception to the concept of neutrality.

The Russians have meanwhile adopted a "sit tight" policy and refused to negotiate. President Babrak Karmal undoubtedly expressed their view when he categorically rejected "neutralisation" in a Muslim new year speech this weekend.

Russian troops would "definitely stay" in Afghanistan until external provocations and aggressions ceased to exist and a "real, valid guarantee" against intervention had been secured, he said. That would seem to rule out any Soviet withdrawal in the foreseeable future.

The neutrality idea is by no means dead so far as Western countries are concerned, but they have little leverage at the moment, particularly as the Olympic boycott is not proving effective so far.

A Foreign Office source said yesterday that Britain was still pursuing the concept through bilateral talks with a number of countries.

KREISKY TO VISIT BELGRADE BEGINNING 8 APRIL

LD251817 Hamburg DPA in German 1804 GMT 25 Mar 80 LD

[Summary] Vienna--Austrian Chancellor Bruno Kreisky will arrive in Belgrade 8 April on an official 3-day visit to Yugoslavia. DPA was told this on Tuesday by an authorized source. The invitation was extended by Yugoslavia some time ago and repeated in the past few days despite President Tito's grave illness.

OPPOSITION LEADER MOCK SCORES GOVERNMENT FOREIGN POLICY

[Special DIE PRESSE report: "Mock Warns Against Leaning Toward Nonalined Countries; Foreign Policy Has Lost its Outlines"]

[Text] Graz--People's Party [OeVP] Chairman Mock launched a sharp attack on the current Austrian foreign policy [in a speech] in Graz on Monday [24 March]. He particularly warned against a policy guided by the idea of a special affinity with the nonalined group. This would neither be in line with Austria's basic ideopolitical position nor with the country's political and economic interests, he said.

Speaking at an experts meeting sponsored by the OeVP parliamentary faction and the Styrian provincial organization of the OeVP Farmers League under the slogan "Austria's agricultural trade with the European Community," Mock demanded that, instead, an "enterprising, consistent, purposeful European policy" become again the central line of Austria's foreign policy. Pointing out that the agricultural trade deficit has increased tenfold since 1972, namely to 5 billion schillings, he called for concrete measures for improving Austrian agriculture's competitive ability in the EEC region.

Mock explained his aversion to the nonalined countries by referring to their constant attempts to take sides in various conflicts. This, he said, makes it impossible for a neutral state to follow their policy; otherwise, it would lose any credibility. Moreover, Austria's interests in the North-South conflict are basically identical with those of the other Western industrialized countries.

"In the past few years Austria's foreign policy has lost its clear outlines," the OeVP chairman continued. The consistency and quiet restraint that should characterize the foreign policy of a permanently neutral state--especially when it is in a geographically exposed position--have been replaced by flightiness, personal interests and an inclination to diplomatic spectacles. Mock cited as examples Austria's [UN] vote for Cuba's Security Council candidacy, and the recognition of the PLO.

Through this "so-called" recognition the Socialist government has violated a hitherto observed principle of Austria's foreign policy, namely, to recognize only states, Mock said. Soon others may come and try, referring to the PLO and employing more or less open pressure, to induce Austria to take steps concerning other movements and organizations which, however, at the same time would compel Austria to adopt biased positions that have nothing in common with the country's interests.

In conclusion, Mock warned against a blurring of positions, "for Austria's security is founded last but not least on a natural feeling of solidarity on the part of the West." A sliding into grey zones would therefore affect Austria's security, he said.

SPD'S WEHNER INTERVIEWED ON AFGHANISTAN, FOREIGN POLICY

DW251100 Cologne Deutschlandfunk Network in German to East and West Germany 1000 GMT 23 Mar 80 DW

[Interview by unidentified reporter with the SPD Bundestag faction chairman, Herbert Wehner, place not given--recorded]

[Text] [Question] Mr Wehner, concern for peace can be seen like a red thread running from your statement on Afghanistan up to your speech on Thursday in the Bundestag. Are you concerned that the big powers might possibly drift against their will into war, or do you share the opinion of those observers who interpret the Soviet invasion of Afghanistan as a victory for the hawks of the Kremlim?

[Answer] The first interpretation is certainly the prevailing one, namely, that the world powers could get into a situation from which it will be very difficult to extricate themselves, and that more conflicts could be added to the existing ones. That is my concern, honestly speaking.

[Question] Does one really need to be concerned about peace?

[Answer] I admit that I am concerned because I fail to see when the two world powers will speak to each other again, and because in a year--that is, please, no reproach to anybody --there will be American presidential elections.

[Question] Mr Wehner, let me return once again to question number one--the motives--because the motives probably offer the only opportunity to look for a solution. Will you stand by your earlier judgment about the defensive intentions of the Soviet Union?

[Answer] You are citing something that has often been used and that is still often being used. At that time I was asked about it in a radio interview and I said that I knew what I was risking in saying that what they have in the way of arms and what they are building in addition in the way of military preparedness is defensive. I want it to be interpreted to mean that they want to keep what has been in their sphere since World War II, and that for reasons of maintaining that imperium they cannot look on while one part or other suddenly becomes independent, so to speak. That is how it ought to be understood.

[Question] Mr Wehner, did the Soviets not go beyond that sphere with regard to Afghanistan, or would you say that this was a sphere of influence already, so that seen this way it was also defense?

[Answer] Preventive action. And yet--that does not make it more appetizing. It is a matter with grave consequences, but it was a preventive action. I frankly admit--it sounds like a very private opinion--that I very much thought and still think that there are thousands of Muhammadans within the USSR who are not indifferent to what is presently happening in the so-called Islamic world in various countries and what is developing. That has undoubtedly also played a certain role.

[Question] Mr Wehner, you have stressed the SPD election program in the Bundestag. The new 1980 election program says with regard to the detente issue, and I quote: We will work intensely for the continuation of detente policy, but we cannot promise that all involved states will stick to it. Does this sentence express uncertainty with regard to the future course of a possible new Kremlin leadership, or what does it mean?

[Answer] It says that we will try to never give any reason to anybody to transfer to or touch off conflicts in this area and in this situation in which the German nation is living in separate states. That is what I wanted to say.

[Question] Mr Wehner, for the first time in a long time I find the possibility mentioned here that one of those involved in detente might possibly not be able to follow that policy. There are experts who say that after Afghanistan the Kremlin might have drawn a balance and arrived at the result that detente does not pay sufficiently any more. What do you say to this idea?

[Answer] I consider that an interpretation intended to appeal a bit to what is popular. But another matter is more serious, namely, when we hear from people whom one considers as belonging to the Kremlin that they have never kept it a secret that wherever there are struggles for overcoming class privileges or the like they would side with those who want to rid themselves of the privileges of others. That tendency naturally also exists.

[Question] This means that you start from the assumption that the Kremlin has retained a basic interest in detente?

[Answer] Yes, I believe I can be certain of that. Therefore, I want to protect us, who live in an environment that is not free of all conflicts, from being infected by the idea that, well, eventually they will touch off something here, too.

[Question] Mr Wehner, how do you explain the fact that the Kremlin has not given any real signals, any real signs that could encourage the Western advocates of a continued detente policy?

[Answer] That is hard to say because I cannot think as the minds that make decisions in the Kremlin. But one thing seems more important to me, namely, that the two superpowers --occasionally they are called world powers--the USSR in the East and the United States in the West, are not really speaking with one another. And this is a situation where, like me, many people certainly have reason to fear that the present conflict could extend, enlarge, not to neighboring areas but to those that are farther away.

[Question] Let me take up that idea, Mr Wehner. The chancellor stated recently at a press conference that following the revival of contacts between Washington and Moscow it is not so important for the world situation that the Soviets and the Germans necessarily speak to each other. My question is: Can we make a real contribution to detente at all and to taking the edge out of the present crisis, or are we basically just spectators at the big powers' poker game?

[Answer] An answer like yes or no would be too simple. We can probably claim one thing with certainty, namely, that we are interested in adhering to the treaty with the USSR, the treaty with the People's Republic of Poland, the treaty with the CSSR, the basic treaty with the GDR and thus also indirectly the Quadripartite Agreement of Berlin, and that we will see to it as far as we can that this will not be tampered with.

[Question] That sounds primarily like preventive action, Mr Wehner, you said recently in an interview with great certainty that the meeting between the federal chancellor and Brezhnev will take place. Are you still that certain after the increasing Moscow criticism of the chancellor and after the rather disappointing--as it seems--answer from Brezhnev, and what can one hope for in this connection? Can new impetuses come from there?

[Answer] It seems rather certain to me that the federal chancellor would accept an invitation by Mr Brezhnev; it is also interesting that such a direct invitation does not exist at present. But I would consider it wrong if the German federal chancellor were not to take it upon himself to point out in a talk, if the dates for it could be set, that we, who belong to the North Atlantic defense alliance and who have treaties in addition--I just mentioned a few of them--are interested, not in a trivial sense but really and because we depend on it, in making it clear that we want treaties to be adhered to. That is possible. It means that it ought to be possible from our side. If one does not permit completely enigmatic assumptions from gaining ground, the Soviet side would probably not consider it completely useless either.

[Question] Mr Wehner, in connection with this meeting and with your remarks regarding it, sources in Bonn have always suggested that you had received signals and passed them on. Can you say anything about that, do you want to?

[Answer] I have no intention whatsoever of destroying the opportunities for constantly spreading rumors about me. Whenever I give a speech there is at least one person somewhere who provides an entirely different report on the contents of that speech. And when I subsequently make use of an opportunity, as I did in the Bundestag meeting this past week, to accurately describe the text of this particular speech to those who had taken the aforementioned report seriously and allowed this report to create its effects for quite a few days, even a week, then they come up with a new trick. Our people have a state with a democratic constitution here, but I am highly skeptical as to the chance of seriously stating what things are all about without being exposed to suspicion from the very outset. In this regard my experience tells me the opposite, prevents me from having any illusions, juvenile illusions.

What I said was that without ever being able to be a superpower, without wanting to withdraw from our affiliation with the North Atlantic alliance--which we could not do even if we wanted to--we want to do everything to the best of our ability to prevent this from becoming another theater of conflict, which would even add to the existing hotbeds and places of conflict.

[Question] A question, Mr Wehner, which Strauss brought up during the Bundestag debate prior to this last one, without himself providing an answer: What will happen to detente if the Red Army does not withdraw from Afghanistan?

[Answer] Well, you see, I do not want to use irony. What happened to peace during the period the Americans failed to withdraw from Vietnam? This sounds sarcastic, but a lot of patience was required, as was, finally, the willingness of the Americans, in order to close this chapter. I just cannot attempt here to force others to accept my interpretation of developments over many years, yet what I just mentioned was possible. What I did consider impossible was that ultimatum by the U.S. President that unless the Soviet troops were pulled out of Afghanistan by 20 February there would be no Olympic games for the Americans and for the others. You see, this is not in accord with the seriousness of the events.

[Question] The EC has advanced the proposal of guaranteed neutrality and nonalinement for Afghanistan. Is it really realistic to assume, Mr Wehner, that Moscow will evacuate Afghanistan, or that it can evacuate Afghanistan at all, without having a guarantee that a communist government will be preserved.

[Answer] I realize that by what I will say now I will be dropping a lot of bricks. Well, I have said in public that it is extremely regrettable to see a proposal by the Nine who form the European Community being swept off the table in Moscow the next day, as it were, even before this proposal, which it is interesting to note was fathered by the British foreign secretary, had been submitted in a really finalized form. Your question contains a lot that cannot be simply rejected. On the other hand, my answer to your earlier questions as to how long Vietnam lasted also contains something that is perhaps worth pondering.

[Question] Do you, Mr Wehner, see the possibility of a solution? What I mean is: Is there any model that might have better chances for success than this EC proposal? Or to put it quite bluntly, will we not some day, whether we like it or not, have to reconcile ourselves to the new realities with a gritting of teeth, simply because world history moves on?

[Answer] This has had to be done before, and not just in cases which primarily have to be blamed on the Soviet Union. I share the view of the chancellor absolutely when he says that what matters is to preserve the balance of the defense options and to establish that balance wherever it has been violated or changed; to clear the road for a development toward a commitment to a reduction in armaments rather than to a continuous arms race. This is hard to do; and it is also hard to make some people realize this in this situation, but it is not unrealistic.

[Question] U.S. political scientist Professor Griffith at a recent foreign policy congress of the CDU advocated the view that it might be necessary to pursue a policy of containment against the Soviet Union again for a few years so that, as he implied, a policy of detente might become feasible again. What do you think about this thesis?

[Answer] Well, you see, even in the United States there are people and there are people. I am not authorized by my office, nor does it suit my taste, to say that these are good or the others are good. If I were to confront you now with what Kennan, whom I hold in high esteem, has written and thereby exposed himself to criticism in the United States--he is American--then you would come to realize that Griffith alone does not stand for what Americans think and feel. There is something to that. I would appreciate it if someone could just ascertain who was the first to say that the United States was the strongest world power and would remain so, but that notwithstanding this and just because it is so strong, it would say to the world: What we want is balance. We do not want a peace to step up armaments, but a reduction in armaments, because this would benefit all, especially the so-called Third World, those who go hungry and where children are dying because they cannot be adequately fed. But this will probably always be a bone of contention. I have heard such things said before by Americans who came out with very harsh judgments, and the next day poor U.S. Secretary of State Vance had to tone this down. We must encourage understanding for that.

[Question] Acutally I did not mean to represent the opinion of Griffith so much as the American view or the American stance; I rather wanted to have it taken as a question, namely, this question: Suppose Afghanistan becomes reality. Can it not happen then that the relation between the two great powers will become frostier for years, that the dialog will continue, to be sure, but that true detente as practiced in the past several years will not be possible anymore? This is what I meant to express.

[Answer] This is not inconceivable; however, if one great power lets the other know, and if it is subsequently spread about the world, that it must be punished for what it has done and must feel it for a long time, then I do not consider this a prudent way of dealing with each other if and when each has reason to assume that the other cannot only be expected to do good. In such a case I think it would be unwise.

[Question] Apropos not punishing; even Franz Josef Strauss rejected this term during the last Bundestag debate. The basic tenor of the commentators in the German newspapers and media was in line with what a big newspaper in the Ruhr area expressed thusly: The government and the coalition are quite close to each other. Is this true or do decisive differences still exist, in your opinion?

[Answer] Though I am the one who has been the target of harsh invectives by Strauss, I will tell you quite frankly that there was something which the ghostwriters did in a very ingenious way. It is painful. I did say one thing, just before the Bundestag went into Christmas recess after a harsh, long debate on the budget, and budget debates always are very difficult. I said: It is grounds for hope indeed that they have not started fighting each other over Iran and the events which, after all, are gruesome events; they refused to be tempted to dance on the volcano. It was my hope that at least no additional explosive matter should be thrown into the whole thing, despite all antagonisms. I respect that, and it was clear the Mr Strauss would take it out on me, as I am the scapegoat of the nation anyway.

[Question] Reverting once more to your explanations: In this letter to your Bundestag group, you had written in effect that the CDU/CSU group would now have to prove first whether it is interested in a true concerted action, whether it is prepared to enter into such common effort. Do you consider that this proof has been produced, or what is still amiss?

[Answer] There is, you see, something missing which I did venture to do 20 years ago. I do not ask to be presented as the model boy; they are making me out to be the opposite all the time. At the time I dealt point by point with the points listed by the then incumbent Defense Minister Strauss, and I made it clear that as far as the country's defense was concerned and our membership in the alliance, there was agreement indeed. But I have not seen this as yet [on their part]. I do not claim that I can educate anyone, yet if you backtrack you will find that in my 30 June speech I did, point by point, not take issue with Mr Strauss, the defense minister at the time, but I did point out where in it is in the common interest of the nation of the Germans living in separate states not to oppose each other. But, if you please, all this is past and forgotten.

DEUTSCHE WELLE's Ahlers Comments

DW251347 Cologne DEUTSCHE WELLE in German to Europe 0005 GMT 25 Mar 80 DW

[Commentary by Conrad Ahlers, DEUTSCHE WELLE intendant, on SPD Floorleader Herbert Wehner's 23 March interview on current East-West relations]

[Text] The floorleader of the Social Democratic Party in the German Bundestag, Herbert Wehner, made another effort last weekend toward encouraging all those who, despite the Afghanistan crisis, want to adhere to detente policy or who at least are reluctant to lose faith in the chance for its continuation. In an interview granted to the Deutschlandfunk network, Wehner stated, among other things, that he considers the invasion of Afghanistan by the Soviet Union a sort of preventive action aimed at making it plain that Moscow in any event will know how to prevent this or that side of the Soviet empire from suddenly becoming independent, as it were, as Wehner put it verbatim.

This is not at all the first time that Herbert Wehner has made an effort to project himself into the realm of the Soviet leadership's thought and into the environment of its decisionmaking. He is seeking a key to open the locked door behind which the Moscow Politburo deliberates on its decisions and carries out its decisionmaking process.

At the same time he would like to induce the Western politicians to start thinking that it is not purely arbitrary but carefully checked decisions that are taken in Moscow, and that it is necessary to learn to understand the compulsions to which the Soviet leadership is exposed in its effort to safeguard its empire. Understanding, as Herbert Wehner interprets it, does not mean condoning the acts of the Soviet Union. Yet he means that the concern for peace in the world makes it imperative to put oneself into the place of the other so as to be able to gage one's own reactions appropriately.

In this interview Herbert Wehner reaffirmed his view that the Soviet armament is of a defensive nature. In view of the dimensions of this armament, which is ambiguous to boot because it primarily involves the enhancement of the offensive potential of the Soviet Union, it is very hard to follow Wehner's train of thought. What is more, to this day he has not been prepared to expound his thesis in more detail, obviously because he does not want to make himself subject to constant new misunderstandings. Yet his view is explicable by his unconditional determination to keep alive the policy, which is in jeopardy everywhere, and the policy of international arms control.

This interpretation of what Herbert Wehner said is not devoid of foundation in fact, because in his weekend interview he answered thusly the question: You start out from the assumption that the Kremlin has retained a basic interest in detente? Yes, I believe I can be certain of that. Therefore, I want to protect us, who live in an environment that is not free of all conflict, from being infected by the idea that, well, eventually they--meaning the Soviet Union--will touch off something here, too.

Herbert Wehner thereby put his finger on a highly critical point. It is a fact that in Western Europe, and especially among the peoples of Yugoslavia and Romania, who feel endangered, of course, the concern is growing that the Soviet Union might exploit the favorable opportunity afforded by its military superiority in the area of NATO's soft southern flank to correct the apostacy of Yugoslavia and the independent foreign policy of Romania. And this would be a development which may well lead across the threshold to World War III, quite apart from the other convulsions which this would be bound to touch off everywhere.

Herbert Wehner only said a little about the policy which the United States and the Atlantic community ought to pursue to take precautions against such a development on their part. Once again he drew attention to the fact that what matters is to preserve the balance of the defense options and to restore that balance wherever it has been lost. He has asked the chancellor to stick to the idea of a meeting with Brezhnev even if an invitation from Moscow is still outstanding. Finally, he demanded that the Federal Republic adhere to the treaties concluded with the East. Since this goes without saying, this can only be taken as an indirect call on Moscow to abide by treaties loyally and, above all, not to lose sight of the commitment to the renunciation of force. It would be desirable if the Soviet leadership comprehended how serious a man like Herbert Wehner is about the cause of peace and how seriously jeopardized he sees peace by the Afghan affair; and hopefully Moscow will react to Wehner accordingly.

Press Review

[Text] STUTTGARTER ZEITUNG Writes: Long years of experience with the politician Herbert Wehner ought to have taught one thing, namely that one must read the words of the SPD faction chairman carefully and in their context. He is one of the few actors on the Bonn stage who does not throw around empty formulas.

In the interview this weekend that touched off so much irritation, as well as in the ranks of the coalition, Wehner himself points out what he means in speaking of the defensive intentions of the USSR: namely, that the Soviets want to keep what they have had in their sphere since World War II. In this interview Wehner termed the invasion in Afghanistan--seen from the Soviet Union's point of view--as a preventive action, adding that this does not make the matter more appetizing. One can argue about the justification of that interpretation, but interpreting Wehner's words as a general justification or even approval of the Soviet action would be careless or malicious.

WIESBADENER KURIER notes: The Kremlin with its Afghanistan invasion was also interested, in view of a wide wave of still unpredictable Islamization trends, in teaching the Muslims in its own multinational state a lesson. But that is, if at all, a side effect and not the main purpose of Moscow's action, as Herbert Wehner maintains. All the analyses by Western experts have found that the Kremlin was most of all concerned with keeping a puppet regime in power in Kabul and improving, through a military invasion, its own geostrategic position in the Gulf region, a region rich in oil. If Herbert Wehner plays down these Soviet aims in his analytical considerations, he must know that the Kremlin will consider it as an element of justification for its own action.

NURNBERGER NACHRICHTEN observes: Preserving and safeguarding peace remains the supreme commandment, since peace today seems to be more endangered than it was prior to Iran and Afghanistan. Yet in our world, peace just cannot be achieved without the Kremlin and without the United States. Hence there is no sense in reducing politics to permanent accusations leveled at the Kremlin, in pondering punitive actions and withdrawing, sniffling, to the corner to sulk. The aforementioned realism in dealing with the Eastern superpower and its camp includes the realization that they are shaping their policies themselves and will not allow Americans or Germans to determine them.

Bonn's daily DIE WELT, finally, makes the following comment: If the conquest of Afghanistan was a preventive action, then some more prophylactic aggressions by the Soviets are conceivable. What about Yugoslavia? And why not Western Europe as well, which Moscow now has the habit of charging with much more than it did prior to the assault on poor little Afghanistan about which not a single critical line could be read in the Soviet press beforehand? It stands to reason what makes Wehner veer off this way. For quite some time he, Bahr and Brandt have said, as if in a trance, that they were dreaming about a dissolution of the blocs.

CDU DEPUTY DECRIES LOOPHOLES IN BACTERIAL WEAPONS CONTROL

[Excerpts of correspondent Limberg interview with Dr Alois Mertes, CDU Bundestag deputy and disarmament expert, place of interview not given--recorded]

[Text] [Question] At the moment it seems as though the control of the contractually agreed on ban on the production of bacteriological weapons is not at its best.

[Answer] It is the decisive fault of the B-weapons agreement that it lacks any real control rule. There is just an agreed consultation mechanism. Yet the credibility of disarmament rests on the possibility of controlling the observance of the commitments.

This is why the controversy over the true causes of the serious Sverdlovsk catastrophe--as a result of the effects of biological poison agents from a military installation--instills new topicality into the question concerning the reliable control of the unrestricted ban of bacteriological weapons in the spirit of the agreement to which I just referred. This agreement, by the way, prohibits not only the production but even the development, stockpiling and maintenance of existing B-weapons.

[Question] Must we, in view of what you have just said, assume that the agreement has remained ineffective? Must we expect that a whole arsenal of these banned weapons does exist somewhere after all?

[Answer] What makes me so very concerned is this: Moscow's one-sided statement concerning Sverdlovsk in my opinion cannot dispel the doubts about the Soviet observance of the B-weapons renunciation. By the same token, I cannot make a conclusive statement here, as I have not looked into the matter. B-weapons and C-weapons, that is biological and chemical weapons, are such horrible things that it is now necessary to attribute intensified significance to the control problem. I believe that the Federal Government must take the initiative now with regard to this problem. We have just had the examination conference in Geneva, but the verification problem, the control problem, is so important that the Federal Government as a government of a country that has signed the treaties must become active.

In addition, the FRG was the first state to renounce--as early as in 1954 under Adenauer, when it entered the Western alliance--renounce such weapons under international law, that is, B-weapons and C-weapons, so we are in a good international position if we press for clarity and verification being made the main principles with regard to this problem. There simply cannot be rearmament with bacteriological and chemical weapons. That would be such a scourge of mankind that I must say that it ought to be eliminated completely, effectively and in a verifiable way, because otherwise the whole disarmament problem could become a pure farce. It is particularly because I support controllable and effective disarmament that I believe that, at least in the field of B-weapons and C-weapons, disarmament or nonarmament must be safeguarded through verification.

COMMENTATOR DEPLORES WEST'S MILITARY FAULTS

[Adelbert Weinstein editorial: "Our Distressing Military Policy"]

[Text] The great process of thought has started with Afghanistan. People in NATO are wondering how the Soviet military superiority could be counteracted. The catchword is balance of forces. It is to be restored. Yet how, and when? Our strongest Atlantic partner is facing the greatest difficulties. The U.S. Armed Forces are short of personnel. This personnel shortage will remain unless general conscription is introduced.

Yet without a special order by the president it will be impossible to bring the neglected conventional weaponry of the United States back to the level required by the strategic situation. According to the latest findings, the Soviet Union produces about 2,000 latest model tanks a year. The production of the U.S. XM-1 tank, the first modern combat tank for the ground forces in 30 years, amounts to 10 units a month. The supplier companies hope to increase the output to 30 in 1981. This disproportion between U.S. and Soviet tank production is analogous in nearly all other sectors of armament.

The basis of U.S. arms production was a broad and dispersed industry which had been capable of keeping up a continuous supply from 1949 to the end of the Vietnam war. This basis dwindled with the end of the fighting in Southeast Asia. The companies turned to the production of consumer goods and highly sophisticated equipment for the electronic market. For the Pentagon, the U.S. Defense Department, this means that both the modernization of the air force and the equipping of the navy and the missile units can only make slow progress.

This is why the Pershing-2 missiles envisaged for Europe will not be available before 1984, and then only partially. The arms conversion process decided on in Brussels in December cannot be concluded before 1987, because the "cruise missiles" are not yet "ready for theater use."

The same holds true for the latest model combat planes of the U.S. Navy and for the transport fleet of the air force, with which the reinforcements are to be flown into Europe. The companies which are to handle the production are being utilized to the limits of their capacity. So what this means is waiting.

Yet waiting means that Soviet armament will constantly increase while Western armament stagnates. This does not mean, however, that the United States and the Atlantic industrial states only have obsolete weapons systems. In the Atlantic camp technology continues to storm forward into the future.

Since it will be hard for us to achieve standardization, individual countries have produced the most varied types of new arms and equipment. The quality of these arms is extraordinary. However, the quantity does not correspond to the needs.

But that again leads to a dangerous future. The highly sensitive arms systems that can barely be handled by the average soldier are affected by wear and tear to a considerably greater extent. In addition, a modern nation engaged in combat action loses a high percentage of arms and equipment every day due to enemy action. A rule of thumb says that a tank division is "used up completely" every 3 weeks. In less than a week the West's air force would not be able to fly if it were not supplied with planes. But where is this supply supposed to come from with regard to the strategic depth? After 1 month at the latest hardly any Western fighter planes could be found.

A similar situation applies to ammunition. The antitank defense of the German Army is based on its antitank missiles. Thousands of the Milan-type missiles would be needed. But if one asks the question where the supply is to come from to replenish the entire stock of Milan missiles at least once, the answer is a shrug of the shoulders. In the present state of production 2 years would be needed to supply the Bundeswehr's entire need.

This reality decreases the effect of deterrence. The potential enemy can figure out when the NATO armies and their air squadrons will be mere scrap. Thus he will have a political date to orient his preparedness to negotiate. But our weakness is predictable not only in a war. It can be figured out even now when the West will have to financially curtail its claim to having the most modern arms--because it assumes that quality still makes up for quantity. The small series put out by our arms industry make armament too expensive. The increasing costs for the people in the armed forces, the social burdens will preclude an increase in personnel. It will lead to the fact that probably in 5 years, but certainly in 10, we will be unable to pay for 12 divisions. The way out is in the offing: We will start having "cadres." First we will pretend that 24 brigades are 36, and eventually we will pursue a defense policy with only a rump army.

This way of thinking about our strategic situation must soon change, otherwise the potential enemy need only train himself in the virtue of waiting.

GISCARD, AIDES DISCUSS MILITARY INVOLVEMENT IN CHAD

LD251300 Paris Domestic Service in French 1200 GMT 25 Mar 80 LD

[Text] There was a conference devoted to Chad this morning at the Elysee. The president of the republic, Robert Galley, minister for cooperation, General Mery, chief of staff, and the new adviser for African affairs at the Elysee, Mr Kirsch, took part in the conference.

The president of the republic confirmed two major rules of conduct concerning Chad: The French forces in Chad must not intervene in any circumstances in the clashes; their mission is to insure the safety of Europeans and the evacuation of those who wish to be evacuated. The French forces are available in case of a formal request by the Chad authorities to take part in an action which would be exclusively aimed at insuring the implementation of a cease-fire.

Troops To Remain

NC251600 Paris AFP in English 1548 GMT 25 Mar 80 NC

[Excerpts] Paris, March 25 (AFP)--President Valery Giscard d'Estaing today indicated that French troops would stay in Chad but reaffirmed that they would avoid involvement in the faction fighting in the capital, Ndjamena.

A spokesman for the Elysee presidential palace said that the policy statement came at a meeting of the president, Overseas Cooperation Minister Robert Galley, presidential adviser on Africa Martin Kirsch and General Guy Mery, chief of army staff.

According to the spokesman, Mr Giscard d'Estaing said that the mission of French forces in Chad--there are believed to be between 1,100 and 1,200--was to protect whites and to evacuate those who wanted to go.

Mr Giscard d'Estaing also said that French forces would remain available in case the Chad authorities asked for their help in actions that were exclusively designed to ensure the application of a ceasefire.

LE MONDE VIEWS GOVERNMENT 'DOUBTS' ON TIMING OF CSCE SUMMIT

LD251433 Paris LE MONDE in French 23-24 Mar 80 p 4 LD

[Jacques Amalric commentary: "The French Government Questions the Timeliness of the Madrid European Security Meeting"]

[Text] Is France for or against the holding of November's Madrid conference dedicated to the results of the Conference on Security and Cooperation in Europe? The question was raised by the Brussels correspondent's article in the 21 March Los Angeles TIMES.

The author cited NATO sources which affirmed that Paris had proposed to the alliance's member countries that the Madrid meeting be either postponed or cancelled. A few hours later the Quai d'Orsay formally denied this "groundless" report. "France is continuing to prepare for this meeting," the Foreign Ministry said. In Brussels the alliance organization also denied the Los Angeles TIMES report.

Matters are, however, not so simple as these two denials leave one to suppose. Undoubtedly France has not actually proposed cancelling or postponing the Madrid conference.

But that does not stop government circles from wondering increasingly about the timeliness of such a meeting in the present international climate. Paris feels that, to be useful, the Madrid conference would have to be a "positive stage" on the road to detente. Now, unless hitherto unforeseen events take place in Afghanistan, the meeting threatens, on the contrary, to produce confrontation: Moscow will find itself under cross-examination because of the invasion of Afghanistan (at the very least contrary to the spirit of the Helsinki accords), and relations between West Europe and the Kremlin will suffer a further decline.

This analysis is quite different from Washington's. The United States seems totally in favor of the Madrid meeting, during which there is to be a summary of the application of the Helsinki accords, and it suspects Moscow of playing a double game, that is, of pretending to favor the Madrid meeting while hoping at least for a postponement to better days.

French doubts on the timeliness of going to Madrid are thus seen as a new display of the ambiguity of the Elysee's policy. Washington feels that this ambiguity ultimately favors the USSR, since it offers Moscow a certain international respectability as well as access to Western technology. The Americans give as proof the recent signing of an important marine drilling platform contract between two French firms and the USSR. Officially the United States has not commented on the signing of this contract. In private, matters are quite different, and there is talk of "political and commercial success." The Anglo-Saxon press, for its part, did not fail to link this signing with France's continued dialog with Moscow.

Paris is perfectly aware of American suspicions. They are judged groundless, and people freely recall that solidarity cannot under any form mean alinement or unconditionality. Authoritative circles also emphasize that Paris never believed in the virtues of economic sanctions. As for the continuation of the Franco-Soviet dialog, they assert that France is only doing publicly what Washington still practices secretly.

Nevertheless, the continuation of Franco-Soviet dialog is going to pose problems for French diplomacy, especially if the Red Army continues its policy of all-out "normalization" in Afghanistan. In this context it is being wondered in high places whether it is advisable to go ahead with Mr Gromyko's Paris visit planned for the spring. Contrary to what certain information stemming from the United States led us to believe a few days ago, the principle of this visit has not been abandoned. A final decision is expected in a few weeks. The development of the Afghan situation will undoubtedly have great significance in the final decision.

POLAND REPORTED 'DISAPPOINTED' BY PARIS FOREIGN POLICY

[Bernard Margueritte dispatch: "Poland Disappointed by France's 'Hard' Line"]

[Text] From conversations that I have had these last few days with representatives of various Polish groups close to the government, it transpires that the Warsaw authorities were both surprised and quite seriously disappointed by Secretary of State [to the Ministry] for Foreign Affairs Oliver Stirn's recent disclosures on French foreign policy since the Soviet aggression in Afghanistan.

The surprise was all the greater since, until now, the Polish press has wasted no opportunity to praise France's attitude and stress what it sees as the divergences between Paris and Washington. Reading the Warsaw press gave the impression that the "Finlandization" of France was already complete.

Indeed, our country's representatives--particularly Mr Stirn--have been reiterating that France did not favor sanctions which it considered ineffective. They have been adding that France was, indeed, determined to maintain its excellent bilateral relations with Poland.

In particular, this attitude will take the form of numerous exchange visits between the two countries: Mr Deniau will go to Warsaw in May, the Polish foreign minister will visit Paris 2-3 July and, most significantly, Giscard d'Estaing will make an official visit to Poland in mid-September.

However, in the sphere of multilateral relations, France informed Poland that it was fundamentally hostile in principle to Warsaw's concept of the "divisibility" of detente. In particular, Mr Stirn clearly told his interlocutors that it was illusory and naive to claim to support European detente between partners who, in other parts of the world, could be threatening the very foundations of good international relations.

This attitude involves fundamental divergences between France and Poland, in two essential problems, for example:

1--The European disarmament conference: This idea, recently revived by Mr Gierek, who suggested that this conference might take place in Warsaw, is considered in Poland very important to the resumption of detente. The French have now indicated that it is out of the question to envisage a new European meeting in the present international political climate.

Meanwhile, disagreement has arisen on the very principle of disarmament negotiations. The Poles propose that the zone concerned should cover only 250 km, while the French maintain that there must be disarmament from the Atlantic to the Urals. Likewise, France believes that nuclear weapons should be excluded from the negotiations, while the Poles hold the opposite view.

2--The Madrid conference: The Poles were disappointed to hear their French counterparts insist that the Madrid European conference should not take place unless there were reasonable hopes of a successful outcome. With a suitable climate of international relations being vital, France considers that the Madrid conference cannot take place, therefore, while Soviet forces remain in Afghanistan.

This French attitude caused an even greater stir, since the Poles expected much from a possible joint French-Polish initiative in Madrid.

Under these conditions, and being better informed of the French position, the Poles were dumfounded and even started wondering whether--by linking the future of detente in multilateral relations to the withdrawal of the Soviet forces from Afghanistan--it is not actually a "harder" line than that of the Americans themselves.

DC MEETING GIVES COSSIGA MANDATE TO TRY TO FORM GOVERNMENT

[Text] Rome, March 25 (ANSA)--The Christian Democratic (DC) Party leadership has given premier-designate Francesco Cossiga the go-ahead to try to put together a new government. Last night the DC leadership body unanimously approved a document which gave Cossiga the green light to move in the direction of an agreement with the Socialist Party (PSI) and, eventually, with the other parties in the laic area (Liberals, Social Democrats and Republicans).

In substance, the DC responded favorably to the PSI proposal to try a DC-PSI partnership or even a three-way alliance that would include the Republicans (PRI). DC Secretary Flaminio Piccoli underscored the PRI position as "capable of consolidating the government". Cossiga begins his consultations today when he meets with the mixed group in the Senate. He will wind up his consultations this evening when he meets with the Communist Party (PCI) delegation. Observers noted that the final document released at the end of the DC leadership meeting last night was unanimous, which meant that it was approved also by the leftwing minority faction led by former Party Secretary Benigno Zaccagnini and former Premier Giulio Andreotti.

Speaking to newsmen last night, Ciriaco De Mita, a member of the leftwing minority said that his group saw the opening to a formula oriented towards the PSI and the PRI as a resumption of the line of national solidarity, which left the dialogue with the Communists open. Cossiga himself said he was in full agreement with the orientation which emerged from Piccoli's report and the final document to move along a line that could rally political and parliamentary forces around a government program capable of dealing with the nation's most pressing needs. The previous government was a minority cabinet of Christian Democrats, Social Democrats and Liberals led by Cossiga. It stepped down last Wednesday after the Republicans and Socialists withdrew their outside support.

POPE OPENS VATICAN SYNOD OF UKRAINIAN BISHOPS

[Text] Vatican City, March 25 (ANSA)--A special synod of Ukrainian bishops at the Vatican was convened in part with a view to gathering the names of possible candidates to succeed Caroinal Yosyp Slipyj who is 88. Pope John Paul II opened the synod yesterday when he focused on unity among the various components of the Catholic Church throughout the world. He explicitly mentioned the Orthodox Russians with whom the Ukrainian Catholics have been in sharp dispute for decades. The pope stressed reconciliation and the fervant hope of Ukrainian Catholics to have their spiritual identity recognized. The pope said this identity should not be seen as a mark of antagonism by the Orthodox Church. He invoked the ecumenical spirit and the path of dialogue. It is not known how long the synod will last nor what its specific agenda is.

BRAZIL TO PURCHASE AMX FIGHTER PLANES

PY252033 Paris AFP in Spanish 1924 GMT 25 Mar 80 PY

[Text] Rome, 25 Mar (AFP)--Fausto Cerretti, director general of the state-owned firm Aeritalia, today announced that Brazil will purchase from Italia between 100 and 150 AMX fighter planes. The same spokesman indicated that the airplanes will replace the G-91, and that the new models will be equipped with Alfa Romeo and FIAT engines. The first AMX prototypes will be produced by the Aeritalia and Macchi plants in 1982. The agreement between Italy and Brazil amounts to approximately $400 million.

OLYMPIC ASSOCIATION ACCEPTS MOSCOW OLYMPICS INVITATION

LD252122 London BBC Television Network in English 1825 GMT 25 Mar 80 LD

[25 March statement by Sir Denis Follows, chairman of the British Olympic Association (BOA)

[Text] [Begin Follows recording] Now the British Olympic Association, which exists to organize and coordinate Britisn participation in the Olympic games, has agreed to accept forthwith the invitation to send a team to Moscow this summer. [end recording]

Sir Denis Follows, the chairman of the British Olympic Association, announcing this evening that Britain's athletes will be going to the Olympics in defiance of the government's call to boycott the games. The decision was supported by 15 national sports federations meeting in London. Four sporting bodies wanted the decision deferred and one, hockey, resolved not to go to Moscow at the present time. Sir Denis said that the decision to accept the Soviet Union's invitation was taken in the interests of our athletes.

[Begin Follows recording] The BOA has not come to this decision lightly. It has given careful, and we hope, proper attention to the views expressed in Parliament, as it has taken note of the response of the public and the aspirations of the competitors. We have not as a committee attempted to enter into any open conflict with the government or anybody else. This decision has been taken by reasonable people in a very responsible manner. There will be of course no pressure to participate on individual sportsmen and sportswomen who prefer not to be considered for their teams. This is in accordance with the decision we took in September 1978 when we agreed that we would not ban or boycott anybody. It was entirely a matter for the individual, if fit to be selected, to determine whether he or she would accept the invitation to participate. [end recording]

Government Reaction

[Text] The government tonight reacted strongly to the decision of the British Olympic Association. A government statement issued through the Department of the Environment--who have responsibility for sport--said:

"The government seriously regrets the BOA decision to accept the invitation from the Moscow Organising Committee to participate in the summer games in the Soviet Union, but this is not the end of the matter.

"There will be uncertainties about the Moscow Olympics for a long time to come. Neither the individual governing bodies of sport which constitute our national Olympic committee nor individual sportsmen and women are bound by this decision.

"They are still free to decide their own course of action.

"The government naturally hopes they will be guided by our advice.

"Never before in the history of the Olympics movement has the host country been committing aggression at the time against another country.

"Fighting continues in Afghanistan and troops of the Soviet Union remain there as invaders.

"While this situation persists our view will remain in favour of a boycott of the summer games...the BOA's decision has not altered this."

HURD COMMENTS ON EUROPEAN INITIATIVE ON PALESTINIAN ISSUE

LD230733 Riyadh SPA in Arabic 0705 GMT 23 Mar 80 LD

[Text] Riyadh, 23 March--Douglas Hurd, secretary of state at the British Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs Office, has stated that at some future stage, the PLO will be connected with the peace talks in the Middle East and that Britain and the EEC countries consider it a full party which could realize the aspirations of the Palestinian people.

In a statement to the newspaper AL-JAZIRAH published here today, Hurd said that the European countries have not yet considered a new initiative, but consultations are continuing among them at the British suggestion. He added that any European initiative will require a great deal of time and consultation.

Concerning the British attitude toward the Gulf region and the likelihood of Britain taking military action to deal with its economic condition, Douglas Hurd said that Britain pursues no military policy in the Gulf region and that his country does not wish to return to the days of military bases and treaties in the area.

Hurd warned about the gravity of Soviet arms in the region. He also denounced the Soviet invasion of Afghanistan and welcomed the idea of neutral Afghanistan.

Hurd also discounted the likelihood of Britain joining OPEC as an oil-producing country.

ENVOY DISCUSSES POSSIBLE SOLUTIONS TO MIDEAST CRISES

LD230734 Riyadh SPA in Arabic 0712 GMT 23 Mar 80 LD

[Text] Riyadh, 23 March--The newspaper AR-RIYADH today quotes James Craig, the British ambassador to Saudi Arabia, as saying that Resolution 242, which takes the rights of the Palestine people into consideration, could be the basis for a just solution in the region now that the British Government has become confident that the Egyptian-Israeli peace agreements and the Camp David accords have failed in securing a just solution which would satisfy all parties concerned.

On Britain's attitude toward the Gulf region, the ambassador said that his country has no desire at all for intervention in the region.

He described Britain's relations with Saudi Arabia as excellent and said we have a desire to develop them still further.

The ambassador denounced Soviet communist intervention in Afghanistan and called for the use of all nonmilitary measures to express the world's anger over this invasion, pointing out that such measures could include economic pressure and the boycott of the Olympic games.

KIPRIANOU SEES INSUFFICIENT WESTERN PRESSURE ON TURKEY

[Exclusive interview granted by Cyprus President Spiros Kiprianou to AKROPOLIS correspondent P. Kamvisis. Date not given.]

[Text] Greece is the main support of our struggle. The Greek Government, and Karamanlis personally, have stated that they support the Cyprus Government, its policy, and its efforts to achieve a solution to the Cyprus issue. It is a fact that it does support us. The Greek Government has always stood at our side. The people of Cyprus know this and they are grateful.

This was stressed in an interview granted to AKROPOLIS by President of the Republic of Cyprus Spiros Kiprianou, who also revealed that:

According to authoritative information available to him, the leadership of the United Nations "at long last discovered the negative tactics of the Turkish side which are also unacceptable to international law and order. On the part of the United Nations," Kiprianou continued, "there is disappointment over the policy of Turkey."

The president of the Republic of Cyprus also added that:

In reference to the resumption of intercommunal dialog the Turks have set conditions which, if accepted, would predetermine the island's partition. They also insist upon these conditions and this fact in the end leads to an undermining of the talks contrary to the constructive position of the Greek Cypriot side and contrary to the continued efforts of the United Nations.

Kiprianou in addition stated:

1--The Turks aim at partition. The Greek Cypriot side seeks a federation solution.

2--If the Turks do not come to talks by 31 March then there will be an automatic establishment and operation of the "General Assembly Committee" as provided by the latest UN resolution on the Cyprus issue.

3--The pressure that ought to be exerted upon Ankara by the West is not being exerted and, at present, there is an offer of great amounts of aid to Turkey.

4--President Giscard d'Estaing, Margaret Thatcher and the Italian prime minister gave the Cypriot president an emphatic promise they would support the Cyprus Government in its efforts to find a solution within UN limits.

5--The firm and permanent policy of the Cyprus Government rests with talks. "We are moderate," he said, "we are conciliatory. We want an honorable solution which would guarantee the natural and national survival of Cyprus."

The full text of the interview of the president of Cyprus to "AKROPOLIS" is as follows:

AKROPOLIS: What is the position on the resumption of talks with the Turkish Cypriot side? It was reported that Guellar would be coming to Cyprus as a representative of the UN secretary general. What developments are there?

Kiprianou: It is not certain that Guellar will come. While it once was certain, now it is not certain. In the end I do not know whether he will come. It appears that on the part of the United Nations there is disappointment over the Turkish position. During this last period the UN secretary general has had various consultations, and on our part we have been completely constructive. On the part of the Turks there is insistence on the conditions they set for the resumption of talks. These conditions are of such a nature that if accepted they would predetermine the solution of the Cyprus issue. In fact they predetermine a partitionist solution. The consultations on the part of the secretary general continue and it is possible that progress in these consultations will determine when Guellar will arrive in Cyprus.

AKROPOLIS: Your statement that the United Nations has already understood the policy of the Turks and that it is disappointed with the position of the Turkish side must certainly be based upon specific reports and specific developments.

Kiprianou: Yes, we have reports that there is disappointment on the part of the United Nations. The reports come from circles close to the United Nations. These are serious sources. The reports are also confirmed by other diplomatic circles.

Talks

AKROPOLIS: It is well known, and you have stated yourself, that the policy of the Cyprus Government for the solution of the problem has always remained the same: Talks under the auspices of UN Secretary General Waldheim. Are there any developments?

Kiprianou: No, there is no fruitful development. This is because the Turkish Cypriot side, with its tactics, makes a resumption of dialog impossible, as I have already told you. Despite this we will continue to demonstrate good will toward the efforts of the UN secretary general toward a resumption of talks. This is our firm position. Naturally, and at the same time, we will also continue our efforts internationally to keep the Cyprus issue alive and to guarantee the necessary prerequisites so that pressures may be exerted upon Turkey, pressures which are necessary to force it to abandon its expansionist and partitionist policy. This is because even if we suppose that a dialog was started, unless Turkey radically changes its position, there can be no progress in the dialog because to date Turkey and the Turkish Cypriot leaders are aiming at a purely partitionist solution, while we look to a federation solution. This must be a bizonal federation with such authorities vested in the central government that they will guarantee the unity of the state.

"Bizonal"

AKROPOLIS: You say the Turks are setting conditions for the resumption of talks which, if accepted, predetermine a solution, and even a partitionist solution. What are these conditions?

Kiprianou: At first they want us to accept the "bizonal" term. They have analyzed what they mean. They clearly mean a partitionost solution. Their constitutional expert has clearly analyzed this term. They also want us to accept the meaning of security "for the Turkish Cypriot community separately," not the "security of the Turkish Cypriots." This means that security is turned into a partitionist line. In other words, even in this instance they provide a geographic, a separatist, meaning, not a meaning dealing with the protection of human rights.

They also talk about an equal partnership on everything or a partnership on equal terms. Generally the conditions are such that they predetermine a partitionist solution to the problem. There is one peculiar issue, however, and this is it: We have already stated that we do not accept these conditions.

AKROPOLIS: Has this been passed on to the other side?

Kiprianou: Naturally it has been stated repeatedly. We have stated that we will not accept any conditions for the resumption of talks. We did state, however, that either side could raise any subject it wants during the talks. Consequently the Turks as well could raise the issue which they set as conditions--and which are unacceptable to us--during the talks, irrespective of our own position. This is in the same way that we also could raise anything we wanted during the talks. Logic, therefore, says that talks must be resumed on the basis of the agreement of 19 May 1979 [reached during a meeting between Kiprianou and Denktas] and from then on, during the talks, any issue could be raised during the talks by either side.

AKROPOLIS: Do The Turks accept this?

Kiprianou: No, they do not.

AKROPOLIS: In case they do not come to talks, naturally keeping to the prerequisite set by the agreement of 19 May, then what will happen? What do you forecast?

Kiprianou: We will study the situation. I must, however, remind you at the same time that in case there are no talks, in case there is no progress on the issue, then there will be an automatic establishment of the "UN General Assembly Committee" which is provided for in the last resolution on the Cyprus issue, which incorporates terms of reference to strengthen the role of the UN secretary general during the talks, but also for the implementation of UN resolutions. If there is no progress by 31 March, then the UN General Assembly Committee will automatically be established. The chairman of the General Assembly will appoint a committee on Cyprus. Irrespective of this, however, we will continue our efforts to guarantee talks, as I have said earlier, while at the same time we will move internationally to guarantee as much support as possible.

Expansionism

AKROPOLIS: What are the reports available on Turkish efforts to delay things? To what are these efforts due? What are they driving at?

Kiprianou: This is an understandable question which we also ask of our interlocutors. There has been no answer from any side. In other words we ask: What does Turkey want in Cyprus? What is it asking of Cyprus? If it is concerned with the interests of the Turkish Cypriots then the solution is easy. If it is a question of Turkish security, then the solution is again easy. Consequently there is only one thing left--expansionism. This appears to be Turkey's policy. This is why it is necessary to have pressures exerted upon Turkey so that it will radically change this policy, so that here in Cyprus we might be able to find a solution to the internal problem.

AKROPOLIS: Is pressure enough?

Kiprianou: I do not believe that the pressure that ought to be exerted is being exerted.

AKROPOLIS: From which side?

Kiprianou: On the part of those who, because of special ties, would be in a position to exert pressure upon Turkey, particularly at a time when Turkey is being offered such great amounts of aid--economic, military and other.

AKROPOLIS: Are we talking about the West?

Kiprianou: Yes, we are talking about the United States and West Europe.

AKROPOLIS: What is happening on the other side, since we have another factor in the case. Are the Soviets doing anything?

Kiprianou: The Soviet Union supports the Cyprus case within UN limits. The Soviet Union has taken a position in support of talks as the only way to a solution of the Cyprus problem.

AKROPOLIS: Another question, Mr President. What were the results of your last visit to West Europe?

Kiprianou: The trip to Europe was very useful from every aspect. Interest in the Cyprus problem was expressed. The president of France, Giscard d'Estaing, received me with special interest and friendship and he promised he would do whatever he could in the right direction. The same was the case with my interlocutors in London.

AKROPOLIS: Was the Greek Government briefed on the results of these visits?

Kiprianou: Yes, most certainly it was.

AKROPOLIS: One more question, Mr President, which is made necessary by certain, very few, press reports in recent months: What are the relations between Athens and Nicosia during the present phase as well as more generally?

Kiprianou: The relations between Athens and Nicosia are excellent. There is very close cooperation. What I wish to stress, Mr Kamvisis, is this: The main support of our strugggle is Greece, the Greek Government and the Greek people. I have special ties with the Greek Government and with Karamanlis personally, and our cooperation has been, is and continues to be excellent. We are in regular contact. We exchange views and we examine all possibilities and make decisions. Karamanlis has repeatedly stated that he supports the Cyprus Government, its policy, and its handling of the situation, and he truly does. The Greek Government has always supported us. It stands at our side and the people of Cyprus know this and they are grateful.

REGIONAL MOSQUE COUNCIL--A Regional Mosque Council for Cyprus was established at a meeting at the Islamic Cultural Center in Nicosia today. The mufti of Cyprus, Dr Yucelten, was elected chairman of the council's Central Committee. Addressing the meeting, the secretary general of the World Muslim League, (Sheikh Mohammad al-Harakhan), said that it gave him great pleasure to attend the meeting in north Cyprus. He said that the regional council for Cyprus will comprise four local councils in Nicosia, Kyrenia, Morphou and Famagusta. The idea of establishing such councils was to revive the message of the mosque and its leading role in guiding the Muslim believers. He also said that the mosques devastated by the Greek Cypriots would be repaired by funds provided by the World Muslim League. [(Clandestine) Bayrak Radio in English to Cyprus 1730 GMT 23 Mar 80 TA]

GOVERNMENT, PARTY LEADERS CRITICIZE AEGEAN PROPOSALS

[Text] Indirectly yesterday the government expressed its disapproval of positions supported before the U.S. Senate by U.S. Assistant Secretary of State Vest who described restoration of the old status of Aegean operational control as unfeasible while our country sets this as a condition for its return to NATO's military structure. At the same time there was confirmation of I KATHIMERINI reports that the Greek Government intends to ask Washington for an explanation of the controversial views of the U.S. assistant secretary.

The government's indirect disapproval was expressed in the following statement by the government spokesman referring to opposition criticism on the same issue:

"Every day the opposition seeks excuses in order to create problems for the government. The government, however, is not responsible for what is said by foreigners on issues affecting our country. It is only responsible for the positions which the government supports. As repeatedly stated, these positions fully protect our national interests."

The Zigdhis Proposal

EDIK leader Ioannis Zigdhis referring to the same issue stated, among other things:

"The testimony of U.S. Assistant Secretary of State Vest before the U.S. Senate is an official confirmation of the position that the 'achievements' and aspirations of Turkish chauvinism in Cyprus and the Aegean are due to inspiration from and the blessings of Washington.

"The Vest testimony makes it clear that our return to NATO's military structure cannot be achieved without our conversion into a satellite of Turkey.

"In face of such a stark statement on the goals of the U.S. administration all Greeks expected the dictated emphatic but also proud reaction of the Greek Government.

"By absolute contrast, however, 'authoritative sources' repeated, in a naturally very lukewarm but also clear way, that the government insists upon its psychosis about Greece's return to NATO."

Zigdhis then requested that "so long as the alliance refuses to force Turkey to withdraw its troops from Cyprus and to abandon its claims in the Aegean, then all NATO bases on Crete and continental Greece should be closed because instead of serving the country's defense they are proved calamitous for it."

Sense of Responsibility

Returning to the issue, KODISO Chairman I. Pezmazoglou connected the Vest statements with the issue created around the contents of the Karamanlis letter to President Carter and concludes that an atmosphere of uncertainty and political tension was created in advance and that this has a destabilizing effect.

The people and all the political parties, Pezmazoglou added, must deal with every issue and development affecting democratic stability and the defense of vital Greek interests with the necessary sobriety and sense of responsibility.

The Iliou Statement

Yesterday's statement by EDA Chairman Ilias Iliou is also couched in the same spirit, he observed:

"The situation created around the true contents of the letter to Carter and particularly the tension which is developing cause grave concern among the people.

"Our country is going through critical times. For this reason I consider that national unity of spirit is imperative. I would recommend that the government brief party leaders and I believe that the situation can be cleared up in this way.

"It is obvious that the issue cannot be dragged out forever without a destabilizing effect, particularly since there are indications that the questionable text was fabricated in Ankara."

The press bureau of the KKE (Interior) issued the following statement:

"Over the next few days there will be a climaxing of U.S.-NATO pressures and in conjunction with such pressures, there was a Turkish attempt to create a fait accompli in the Aegean based on the Haig-Davos agreement for limiting our national sovereignty over airspace. Without any further delay the government must cease all discussion with the United States and NATO and it must state that it considers the Haig-Davos agreement void."

PROINI SCORES TURKISH AIRSPACE VIOLATIONS

[From the "Nonalined" column: "A Game of Extortion"]

[Text] Once again Ankara made a practical display of its good intentions toward Greece through the new violations of the Aegan airspace. During an air and naval exercise, scores of Turkish airplanes penetrated 2-3 miles into the international airspace without submitting a flight plan--as they were required to--which should have been approved by Greece.

This is not the first incident and it looks as though it is not going to be the last. After the barbarian "Attila" invasion of Cyprus, provocations never stopped and they will not stop as long as Ankara is encouraged in these activities by Washington and NATO and is used as a means to blackmail Greece into accepting the well-known unacceptable plans for return to the alliance.

Let all those who backstage in NATO are engineering extortions finally resign themselves to the fact that Greece does not intend to yield and accept solutions which infringe on the country's territorial integrity and national independence.

All the plans that are being engineered offer absolutely nothing to the cause of peace in the sensitive area of southeast Europe. On the contrary, they maintain an atmosphere of tension which prevents the search for solutions to Greek-Turkish differences and the Cyprus issue.

In its overwhelming majority the Greek people are determined to resist any provocation, whatever its source, and are prepared for any sacrifice. At the same time, it is high time Ankara understood that the game of extortion leads nowhere.

But is it not also time for the Greek Government to show more determination in confronting constant provocations?

PARLIAMENT FAILS TO ELECT PRESIDENT IN TWO ROUNDS

TA251629 Ankara Domestic Service in Turkish 1600 GMT 25 Mar 80 TA

The second round of voting was held without a candidate. It was reported that only 406 members of parliament participated in the second round and that therefore the votes were not counted because the two-thirds majority required by the Constitution was not secured. The Senate and National Assembly will hold another joint session at 1500 tomorrow to continue voting for a president. The simple majority of 318 parliamentarians will be sufficient to be elected president during the rounds to be held hereafter.

LIBYAN MINISTER BEGINS TALKS ON STRENGTHENING TIES

TA251146 Ankara Domestic Service in Turkish 1000 GMT 25 Mar 80 TA

[Text] Libyan Economy Minister [title as heard] Abu Zayd 'Umar Durdah, who arrived in Turkey yesterday for an official visit, began his contacts in Ankara today. The visiting minister was received by State Minister Orhan Oren this morning at 1000 and by State Minister Ekrem Ceyhun at 1030. In a statement before the meeting, Ceyhun said he believed this visit would contribute to the further strengthening of good relations existing between the two countries in the spheres of economy, commerce, culture and services. In his statement, Durdah said that his country attaches great importance to its relations with Turkey and added that it was necessary to prepare plans for the future as efforts are being exerted to promote good relations between the two countries. He added that the development of relations between Turkey and Libya would benefit the two countries as well as the Islamic world. After these meetings, the Turkish and Libyan delegations met for further talks. State Minister Ceyhun is heading the Turkish delegation while the Libyan delegation is chaired by Durdah.

SOVIET FOREIGN TRADE DELEGATION ARRIVES FOR TALKS

LD251706 Helsinki Domestic Service in Finnish 1530 GMT 25 Mar 80 LD

[Text] Talks concerning additional Finnish exports to the Soviet Union will be resumed this week. A Soviet delegation led by Deputy Foreign Trade Minister B.S. Gordeyev arrived for this purpose in Finland today. Finland's trade balance with the Soviet Union last year showed a deficit of Fmk2.7 million, due primarily to rising oil prices. The delegation led by Deputy Minister Gordeyev will hold talks with Foreign Trade Minister Esko Rekola on sectors in which it is possible to increase exports this year to the Soviet Union.

WORLD MUSLIM CONGRESS CONTINUES IN TFSC

[Summary] "Minister of Finance Hakki Atun has said that the Turkish Federated State of Cyprus was ready to extend all possible facilities to the Muslim countries which wanted to cooperate with it. Atun was speaking at a luncheon given in honor of the delegates attending the World Muslim Congress. Atun added that the TFSC was ready to cooperate in the fields of tourism, transport communications, trade and in all other fields," recalling measures taken by his government for economic development. Atun said that support from the Muslim countries was necessary for the success of these measures, and added that the TFSC was ready to hold talks on this subject.

"The Muslim leader in the United States, Muhammad Wallace [as heard], has said he will do all he can in the United States for the support of the rights of the Muslim Cypriot community. Wallace [Muhammad] was speaking at the Ercan State Airport before his departure, after attending the World Muslim Congress." He added that after seeing the Turkish Cypriot Community's determination for peace and humanity, he was convinced that Islam would succeed in Cyprus forever.

"Speaking at the eighth session of the World Muslim Congress being held in Gazimagosa [Famagusta],Turkish State Minister Muhammed Kelleci has said that he was convinced that the resolution taken by the congress regarding the Cyprus problem would be effective. In a statement to ANATOLIA, Kelleci, who is representing Turkey at the congress said that this resolution represented a turning point in the solution of the Cyprus problem. This has proved, Kelleci said, that the Muslim countries are determined to handle their own problems." Pointing to the significance of the resolution, Kelleci said that he believed that in the light of this resolution, there were now prospects for aid to the federated state from the World Islamic Bank. Kelleci added that he believed that this congress would be beneficial to the Turkish Cypriot economy.

In a petition he submitted to the World Muslim Congress, Eastern Turkestan representative Ismail Cengiz asked for a solution to the plight of 160 million Turks living in the region of Turkestan, recalling that the name of Eastern Turkestan where 20 million Turks lived had been changed by the PRC. Cengiz asked that the new name go unrecognized by the Muslim countries. "Cengiz added that free entrance to Eastern Turkestan was banned and that Islamic religious liberty was curtailed. Cengiz asked for action from the Muslim countries for the solution of these problems and asked for a delegation to be appointed by the congress to be sent to Eastern Turkestan on a fact-finding mission."

EC NOT RECEPTIVE TO OIL BOYCOTT AGAINST SOUTH AFRICA

[OWN diplomatic correspondent report: "Nobody in EC in Favor of Oil Boycott"]

[Text] The Hague, 19 March--None of the EC partners is in favor of an oil boycott of South Africa by the EC. This is the outcome of soundings which [Foreign] Minister Van der Klaauw has carried out within the context of the Scholten motion, according to the Foreign Ministry spokesman.

According to that Christian Democratic Appeal [CDA] deputy's motion, which was approved last November with the opposition's support, the minister has until 1 June to persuade the EC partners to take part in an oil boycott. Last Saturday, Socialist parliamentary group leader Den Uyl stated, at an international seminar in support of an oil boycott in Amsterdam, that nothing is being done to implement the motion.

According to the spokesman, Van der Klaauw has discussed the prospects for such a boycott both in bilateral contacts and in consultations within the context of European political cooperation among the Nine, as well as at the recent meeting of EC ministers in Kuala Lumpur.

The reception was skeptical throughout. Thus British Foreign Secretary Carrington pointed out that the Rhodesia issue must be resolved first, next Namibia, and only then, South Africa. FRG Foreign Minister Genscher is also known to be a convinced opponent of such a boycott.

Nevertheless, Van der Klaauw will raise the topic again at the coming European summit in Brussels, the spokesman believed. The viewpoint of the minister himself with respect to a boycott makes no difference. In the budget debate of mid-November 1979, the minister stated that he was prepared to impose an oil embargo against South Africa only if "at least nine EC member states" take part in it.

In the government's opinion, the criterion for such a measure is the effectiveness which can be expected from it. This would only be achieved if a large number of major states join in such an embargo.

According to the proposer of the motion concerning the oil boycott, J.N. Scholten (CDA), the stance of the EC member states is partly determined by the developments in Rhodesia, now Zimbabwe. We may hope that these problems have now been resolved, Scholten stated, so that attention is being turned toward Namibia and South Africa.

The problems with South Africa are thus confronting the EC countries again, and we cannot dissociate ourselves from them, either, according to Scholten, who is very skeptical about South African Minister Botha's recent utterances.

SECRETARY GENERAL LUNS DISCUSSES NATO'S PEACE ROLE

LD262346 Paris Domestic Service in French 1810 GMT 26 Mar 80 LD

[Interview on "Facing the Public" program with NATO Secretary General Joseph Luns, chaired by Gilbert Denoyen, and including journalists Pierre (Quaidarcourt) of LE FIGARO, Theirry Pfister of LE NOUVEL OBSERVATEUR, Pierre Rouanet of LE COURRIER PICARD, Theirry Titivot of French Television and Edouard Sablier of Paris Radio--live or recorded; journalists are identified where possible]

[Excerpts] [Denoyan] First question: Do you think, in the light of events in Iran, Afghanistan, Africa and Central America which have upset world peace recently--areas not geographically covered by NATO--that NATO is still adapted to the problems concerning us?

[Answer] I think the events in Iran and Afghanistan provide proof neither for nor against, thus are neither positive nor negative as regards the defense of Europe against a possible Russian aggression. The alliance has its forces in position, it can be very quickly reinforced, as you know, and at present--I mean this year--we believe we are able to respond effectively to aggression. It is another thing whether we can do so in the future, because as you also know, Russian military potential is growing day by day.

[Titivot] I find you very optimistic, Mr Secretary General. You are saying everything is going well, that defense has been strengthened. But Greece, after all, is thinking of leaving NATO. Can you tell me concretely what measures you have taken to face, as you say, any aggression?

[Answer] But you make it seem that a (?new) situation of aggression has arisen in Europe. You cannot say that there is a new threat, that there is a threat in the Middle East, towards the oil-producing countries, towards Baluchistan. This would be very grave. However, at the same time I would say that the very firm American response will, in my opinion, probably preserve peace. You know that America has said that if oil is touched, it means war.

[Journalist] But Mr Luns, what beyond words has the West done to oppose Soviet aggression in Afghanistan? You refer to a firm and categorical response from the Americans--can you define how it is as categorical as you say?

[Answer] First, from the political point of view, President Carter's envoy and Washington have said clearly: If you touch the oil, it means war. They did not say it would be a serious situation and America would then have to take measures--they said it means war. Second....

[Journalist] We understand what you are saying, Mr Luns, but this is not Afghanistan. What if the Russians go beyond Afghanistan?

[Answer] Listen, Afghanistan is lamentable, deplorable, serious. But Afghanistan derives its importance from its strategic position. If the Russians stay in Afghanistan, although we must greatly regret the Russian occupation, we are not going to take military measures to remove them. But it is the matter of the danger of Pakistan, Baluchistan and the oil which worries us, and justifiably.

[Question indistinct]

[Answer] Now, as regards Yugoslavia. As already noted, at a ministerial conference in Vienna the then U.S. secretary of state, Rusk, said of Yugoslavia: The independence of Austria and Yugoslavia will not leave the United States indifferent. Now, I concede to you that if the Soviet Union does not hesitate before war, we will have war. In my opinion this is certain. If the Soviet Union continues on the road on which it has embarked in Afghanistan, we will have war. But if, as I believe, the Soviet Union does not want a new general war for the simple reason that a new war is so terrible, even for the winners, (?the idea comes through that one does not start a war easily). The idea that war is politics carried on by other means is no good any more, except when a country does not want to wage war or cannot defend itself. As for Yugoslavia, if the Russians intervene, through intermediaries, through Bulgaria or something similar, this would be extremely grave, and everything would then depend on the resistance of the Yugoslavs, but in that case, peace would be in danger [words indistinct]

[Journalist] Mr Secretary General, as a European do you not think that since the Russians now have the means to deliver nuclear weapons to U.S. territory, there is no longer any guarantee for the Europeans from an American umbrella, and that the real problem for Europe now is to organize its defense itself?

[Answer] Two replies: First, nuclear weapons from the beginning were weapons to prevent war, weapons so terrible that there was good hope--there still is--that the possession of these weapons would mean that war such as the two world wars would no longer break out. Second, you are asking me....

[Journalist] Is Europe the hostage of the two superpowers? To insure its political maturity, does Europe not need to provide itself with a nuclear defense capacity over which it has control?

[Answer] First, there is such a capacity--the French deterrent force. I flatter myself that I know something about it, since I visited it at the invitation of the French Government. It is a real deterrent force. Second, there is the English component. And third, you are obviously right when you say that these forces are very much smaller than the Russian forces. But I wonder, how do you want Europe to provide itself with a credible nuclear arsenal, in view of the fact that....

[Journalist] Mr Luns, you know very well that there is a debate in France, for example, on the possibility of arranging cooperation between Germany and France on a common nuclear weapon. Do you think that France and Germany together could set up a sufficiently credible army?

[Answer] Lord God, I do not think so. If you look at its cost....

[Journalist] Beyond the cost, Mr Luns, if we understand you correctly, you mean that for an indeterminate time, Europe must count solely on the American umbrella?

[Answer] Not solely, since as I just said, there is a certain deterrent force, and it really is a deterrent force, because no country, not even Russia can begin a nuclear war lightheartedly against Europe facing the certainty that its large centers will be completely destroyed in 2 or 3 hours.

[Titivot] You said just now that the atomic weapon is terrible. That is true, and since the war we have been moving toward limited conflicts--I think there have been more than (?50) since 1945, more or less important. Do you think personally that a limited conflict in Europe would automatically set off an American nuclear response on Soviet territory? Thus, do you scorn the flexible response, the graduated response, all these responses wisely studied by strategists?

By this I mean, do you believe that in any Soviet aggression in Europe of any kind, America would risk its life to defend us?

[Answer] I will tell you this: The strategy of the alliance is the strategy of the graduated response. In other words, we hope that we can contain the enemy with our conventional means. If this did not turn out to be possible, we would see, but I will not tell you what America would do or would not do, because the American Government does not know. We only know that for every American Government for more than 30 years, the freedom of Europe is essential for the freedom of the United States, and consequences proceed from this.

[Journalist] Mr Secretary General, NATO as an organization corresponded to the cold war period, when the stakes, the field was Europe. It seems in fact that the situation has frozen in Europe, stabilized, but that Soviet strategy is developing in other regions of the world, in particular Africa, but Asia as well, completely beyond NATO's control. Faced with what is today the policy of Soviet penetration, is the Western defense system via NATO still suitable?

[Answer] Personally, I think NATO should keep to its present frontiers, because our forces are adequate in our opinion to defend ourselves in Europe, but to put all sorts of areas also under the NATO umbrella--First this will increase the chances of a general conflict, and secondly you would really not have the means [words indistinct]. Thus I am not really of the opinion that we should extend NATO's frontiers.

[Journalist] I would like to know how one can reconcile the increase in NATO's power and the reduction of forces in Europe. No one has talked of the reduction of forces in Europe, while it is a theme that interests very many Europeans. I would like to know what the position is, and what is NATO's stand now?

[Answer] Well, we are always ready to conclude a treaty with the Soviet Union in which, on the basis of relations between our forces, we would reduce our forces in Europe thus, without our position's danger being increased. Up to now we have always come up against the question of figures. The Russians refuse to accept our figures.

[Sablier] Mr Secretary General, if as we have noted, as you have said, every problem--even in areas which are outside of NATO's competence--concerns the fate of NATO, inversely it seems to me that NATO must, its secretary general must have an opinion on every problem. Thus, let us take the Middle East. Israel says that if we have an independent Palestinian state on the West Bank, this could be a state which tomorrow could be a Soviet platform with ultramodern arms that the Soviets could supply. Has NATO ideas, a position on this?

[Answer] I will give you the secretary general's opinion; it's safer. The problem with Israel is above all the problem of the Palestinians, from two points of view. First, there are Israeli Jewish settlements being set up on the West Bank. In general, this policy is regrettable. As regards Palestinian autonomy, there are the Camp David agreements. It is less than just to ask the Israelis to do something now which, according to the Camp David agreements, they do not have to do yet. I would also point out that it is in the interest of the Soviet Union to unleash a new crisis in the Middle East, and you saw that Mr Gromyko was in Syria. We should be careful not to play the Soviet Union's game.

[Titivot] Mr Secretary General, 1980 began with a certain number of statements by politicians who have said that we are entering a prewar period. War is possible and war is probable. Is this your opinion, as NATO secretary general? Are we in a prewar state?

[Answer] No, no, I deny it. And I repeat that I am sure that Soviet Russia, at least the present government, does not intend to start a general war. If it does not intend to do so, there will be no war. But it has the means, and what is more, the future is uncertain.

[Journalist] Mr Secretary General, despite the events in Afghanistan, do you want the SALT II agreements to be ratified?

[Answer] Yes.

[Journalist] Bearing in mind the situation today, the tension, do you think we can rapidly proceed to a SALT III?

[Answer] Detente, the policy of detente, was seriously damaged by the actions of the Soviet Union, but we want to keep all roads open, and I think that the ratification of SALT II would help greatly in reviving detente, which we all want.

RETIRING GENERAL SEES SOVIET MILITARY THREAT

ID262040 Hamburg DPA in German 1845 GMT 26 Mar 80 LD

[Text] Brussels: The deputy supreme commander of NATO in Europe, General Gerd Schmueckle, believes that the USSR has built up a Euro-strategic threat "to which we can offer little opposition."

The general, who will retire in Munich tomorrow with a big tattoo in the presence of NATO Secretary General Luns, told NORDSEE ZEITUNG of Bremerhaven that Afghanistan had changed the global balance. In that view he concurred with the federal chancellor. "Whether we can restore the balance depends on our exertions, our will to assert ourselves, possibly our will to make sacrifices."

Asked whether the Americans, with the Carter doctrine to safeguard Western interests in the Middle East, were making threats with a stick they do not possess, he replied that the Americans had saved Berlin with an airlift arranged overnight, without any preparation, and had helped Israel without great preparations whenever that had been necessary.

But he did not deny the lack of adequate air transport capacity to ferry troops swiftly to the Middle East and the shortage of reservists. In this connection, he repeated his call for a NATO crisis cabinet, which has been rejected in Brussels.

KREISKY REJECTS OPPOSITON'S CRITICISM OF FOREIGN POLICY

[Unattributed report on cabinet members' Vienna press conference following 25 March cabinet meeting]

[Excerpts] The PLO leaders say that they will recognize Israel only when their own people's existence is also recognized as justified, Chancellor Kreisky declared yesterday [25 March] after the cabinet meeting, adding that he could well understand this attitude. The PLO will take this step only when Israel recognizes the Palestinians' vital rights. So far, however, Israel has not even been ready to grant the Palestinians autonomy in the region where they live. Regarding [Austrian People's Party Chairman] Mock's warning against Austria's leaning toward the nonalined countries, Kreisky said this was obviously very old hat coming from Graz. Even at the time when he was foreign minister and has advocated the normalization of Austria's relations with the East European countries, he had been criticized in Graz for leading Austria onto the Yugoslav road. Meanwhile, he said, the entire West--and we regard ourselves ideologically as part of the West--has adopted this policy, following our example. There are certain tasks in world politics, and stabilization in zones of friction can be achieved only if nonalined countries offer their good offices, the chancellor said.

Pahr: Consistent Policy of Neutrality

Foreign Minister Willibald Pahr declared in this context that Austria had consistently complied with its policy of neutrality. The fact that Austria has recognized the PLO does not mean that Austria identifies itself with anything undertaken by the PLO. Pahr said that he had not been surprised by 'Arafat's statement that it was not a goal of the PLO to destroy Israel. The PLO is following the path mapped out by 'Arafat, Pahr said, adding that he expected other European countries in the very near future to follow Austria's example and to recognize the PLO.

PLO DENIES PLANS FOR GOVERNMENT-IN-EXILE IN VIENNA

AU261340 Vienna WIENER ZEITUNG in German 26 Mar 80 p 2 AU

[Text] The Vienna PLO representative Ghazi Husayn has issued a press release which says among other things that the Palestinian National Congress will meet in mid-April in Damascus and will map out the PLO's program for the period ahead. So far, no decision has been made yet on the establishment of a government-in-exile, but, should such a government be set up, Vienna would never be considered as its seat--it would be established in an Arab country situated close to the occupied territories, the release says.

PREMIER REMARKS ON INTERNATIONAL, DOMESTIC CONCERNS

ID261533 Madrid ABC in Spanish 20 Mar 80 p 12 ID

[Angel Marcos dispatch on Belgian Prime Minister Wilfried Martens 19 March press conference in Brussels: "Brussesl Backs Madrid Conference"]

[Text] Brussels, 19 March--Belgian Prime Minister Wilfried Martens will pay an official visit to this country 24-26 March. This official visit will be the Belgian premier's first to a foreign country since his appointment to the post. He will be accompanied on the visit by Foreign Minister Henri Simonet.

Before starting his visit Mr Martens decided to have an exchange of impressions with reporters accredited in this country. Therefore, Mr Martens invited Spanish press representatives to an informal meeting at the Belgian Communications Ministry, since his official residence is undergoing maintenance. In a very cordial atmosphere, the Belgian prime minister presented his views on the international situation, Spain's imminent EC membership and the domestic problems facing his country.

We asked Mr Martens about the contents of the talks he will have in Madrid with Spanish Prime Minister Adolfo Suarez.

[Martens] Obviously during my official visit to Spain we will discuss current international problems. Within this framework we will discuss the Madrid conference. We will also talk about Spain's EC membership and perhaps about security and defense issues, especially Belgium's position within the NATO framework.

[Question] With regard to the Madrid conference, we would like to know whether you believe that it should be held, despite the Afghan crisis.

[Answer] The Belgian Government believes that the Madrid conference must take place. I do not believe that this is a sign of weakness. We must respond adequately to the Soviet Union's aggression against Afghanistan. This can be done adequately by extending the efforts to achieve a balance of forces between the two major blocs. On the other hand, it is necessary that everything possible be done to realistically continue the detente policy. That is to say, we must respond forcefully and let the Soviet Union know that Europe, NATO and the entire West will respond vigorously to another aggression or, for instance to a threat to the Persian Gulf. But I believe that every means must be employed to maintain the detente policy.

[Question] The Afghan crisis has created a situation of uncertainty with regard to Europe's participation in the Moscow Olympic games. What is your position on this?

[Answer] The Belgian Government has always advocated the need for a joint stance among the nine EC countries. Unfortunately, we have not managed to achieve this joint stance. When the time comes, our government will also have to establish its own stance in this regard. Following my talks with German Chancellor Helmut Schmidt, I very much agree that the Soviet Union must be given a chance to show that all countries really are invited to go to Moscow. After a time even the democratic countries will have to take a decision. Unless the Soviet Union takes a step toward withdrawing its forces from Afghanistan, our government cannot participate in the Moscow Olympic games.

[Question] We would like to hear your opinion concerning the autonomies issue, which is very well known in Belgium, and concerning separatism.

[Answer] We have a parallel problem in Belgium. I am in favor of granting political autonomy to our country's regions and communities, but I am also sure that this autonomy must be granted and realized within the framework of a single country. Therefore, I am totally opposed to any form of separatism. At the same time, I believe that my country, other countries and Europe need to combine a realistic and limited form of autonomy with a national or federal government on a European level and with a coherent power structure. So these two ideas must be combined and this is why I am totally opposed to any form of separatism or separatist movement.

[Question] Could you tell us whether the topics on your agenda for talks with Prime Minister Suarez include Spain's possible NATO membership?

[Answer] That is essentially up to the Spanish Government. If Mr Suarez wants to discuss NATO's development, stances and evolution with me, as far as I am concerned it will be a great pleasure to discuss the subject.

[Question] Would you also be very pleased if Spain were to join the Atlantic alliance?

[Answer] As a NATO supporter, I regard Spain's membership in the Atlantic alliance as something very positive. But it is the Spanish Government which must decide.

FOREIGN MINISTER EXPLAINS ARMS SALES TO URUGUAY

PY261705 Paris AFP in Spanish 1357 GMT 26 Mar 80 PY

[All figures as received]

[Text] Brussels, 26 Mar (AFP)--Belgian Foreign Minister Henri Simonet (Socialist) today "deplored" human rights violations in Uruguay, but said that "his government should also take into account the economic interests of Belgium."

He made these remarks while confirming the signing of a contract between a Belgian arms manufacturers' consortium and Uruguay for the supplying of 22 tanks with spare parts and small arms to the tune of 300 million Belgian francs (approximately $10 million).

Regarding the sale of arms to Uruguay, the Belgian foreign minister noted that Brussels' attitude was in general similar to that of other Western countries such as the FRG, Great Britain, France and the United States.

He then referred to "the delicate situation of our economy and the worrisome situation of the job market."

Minister Simonet revealed that several unions had requested "the liberalization of foreign arms sales." He then asked: "Would it be right in this situation to penalize Belgian industry, causing a ripple of consequences in the job market, because a contract worth 2 billion Belgian francs contains a military clause for 320 million?"

NETHERLANDS

VAN DER KLAAUW, OREJA HOLD JOINT PRESS CONFERENCE

ID261327 Barcelona LA VANGUARDIA in Spanish 22 Mar 80 p 17 ID

[EFE report: "Dutch Government Anxious for Madrid Conference To Be Held"]

[Text] Amsterdam, 21 March--At the conclusion of the king and queen of Spain's official visit to the Netherlands, the foreign ministers of the two countries--Messrs Oreja and Van der Klaauw--held a joint press conference at Schiphol Airport.

Interest in Migrants' Problems

Marcelino Oreja stated that they held talks from 1000 to 1600, and even held a working lunch. He said that the possibility of validating vocational training studies in Spain and a basic agreement to help Spanish workers who return to Spain and wish to set up agricultural cooperatives--a topic which the Dutch authorities have agreed to study--will be investigated. In this connection the Spanish minister emphasized King Juan Carlos' interest in acquainting himself with the migrant workers' problems.

Mr Oreja also said that he discussed with his Dutch counterpart the principal current issues, including the situation in Latin America, the new Caribbean countries, relations within the EC, the Andean Pact, the Association of Southeast Asian Nations, North Africa, the Sahara, the Middle East and Afghanistan. The topic of NATO was also discussed in an exposition on Spain and the Western world.

The Spanish foreign minister concluded by saying that this royal visit--a meeting between two European monarchies--was important from the historical viewpoint and that the talks with his counterpart centered on human rights, peaceful coexistence and the common good, within the framework of political cooperation.

"He Has Changed Course of History"

For his part, the Dutch minister described the king and queen of Spain's visit as "historic for relations between the two countries; we have talked about the new Spain and the new Netherlands. What a welcome was given to the king and queen of Spain at Leyden University yesterday--I was a student there and I can scarcely believe how moving it was to see the king speaking there. He has changed the course of history."

Mr Van der Klaauw said that they also discussed the Madrid conference--which the Netherlands is very anxious should be held, because it deems it very important--and problems connected with human rights, disarmament and mutual confidence among countries. When asked about Gibraltar, he said that this is a problem between Britain and Spain, but he believes that bilateral problems will be discussed during the negotiations on entry into the EEC.

CARTER FOREIGN POLICY SEEN AS DANGER TO ALLIANCE

DW260941 Duesseldorf HANDELSBLATT in German 26 Mar 80 p 2 DW

[Viola Herms Draht commentary: "Danger To the Alliance"]

[Text] President Carter's third inflation round is under attack on Wall Street and in the U.S. Congress. His various energy-program starts for the most part have petered out in rhetoric. The foreign-policy slogans formulated by the president under the pressure of compulsory global developments elicited at least as much insecurity in his own country as they did among the allies. If Washington's fickleness is lamented in Europe, criticism intensifies along the Potomac about a fragmentized and even unstable North Atlantic alliance. Hence, a vicious circle of perceptions: reluctant or willful allies on the one hand, amateurish absence of answers and weakness of leadership on the other.

If, following a remarkable series of primary victories despite all these mishaps, Jimmy Carter seems to have his party's nomination for reelection within his reach, this may be attributable to the inadequacies of his rivals. Kennedy's negative quantity unfortunately does not add up to a positive quantity for Carter and his team, particularly in foreign policy.

Carter's about-face after the UN vote on the Israeli settlements on the West Bank, according to which the final status of the territory was practically defined in advance contrary to the Camp David agreements, is the latest example of this foreign policy flipflop.

Time and again Republican presidential candidate Ronald Reagan draws attention to Carter's reversals of position regarding Taiwan, the neutron bomb, and Cuba, where the unacceptable Soviet combat units then were tacitly accepted after all. The sanctions against Iran after the kidnaping of the members of the U.S. Embassy, planned just as hastily as they were subsequently dropped, still are vividly remembered.

The Carter doctrine for the region of the oil-rich Persian Gulf, which had been developed in response to the invasion of Afghanistan by the Soviet troops, did not fare essentially any better. In his speech to the nation on 23 January the U.S. President declared this territory categorically to be a region of vital interest which must be protected by the United States by all means, including military means. But as early as 29 January he admitted that the United States is not adequately prepared for "unilateral" defense. Obviously Carter now considers his doctrine tenable only with the support of allies and friends.

Prior to the announcement of the doctrine there were no consultations either with the Europeans, who depend on the Mideast oil, or the states which are potentially endangered by the Soviet Union. This fact became clear when Carter's emissaries experienced rebuffs in Saudi Arabia, Iraq, Jordan and Pakistan. Scepticism with regard to the White House strategists even led Pakistan, flooded by Afghan refugees, rejected the money offered as too risky.

Disappointed by the negative European echo to the U.S. economic and Olympic boycotts as punishment for the Soviet aggression, U.S. Secretary of State Vance criticized the allies as being "shortsighted" if they just wanted to enjoy the advantages of detente, while others provide deterrence and security.

Theoretically there is not much of a difference between the opinions of Washington and Brussels on the divisibility or indivisibility of detente. However, the main problem, how pressure can be applied to Moscow without creating a total collapse of detente, is also under discussion in the White House. Despite some sporadic saber-rattling, no return to cold war is desired there. It would be much preferred for the formation of East-West relations to take place in a framework that will foster the resumption of detente policy (including Salt II) after the neutralization of Afghanistan--or at least of the issue.

The visitors to America, Schmidt and Strauss, found that a common concept of the world strategy of the West is indispensable, together with a clear definition of its sphere of interests. For Europe this means more political, diplomatic, economic and military responsibilities.

As long as the European politicians quote the American leadership's amateur status in order to dissociate themselves from the United States, and as long as the impression is being created in the United States that Europe and Japan are unwilling to pay the price for the nuclear security network, the Atlantic alliance, as it faces the increasing dangers in the Middle East and the Third World, is running the risk of losing territory to the Soviet Union it will never be able to regain.

COMMENTATOR STRESSES IMPORTANCE OF ABC WEAPONS BAN

DW261055 Frankfurt FRANKFURTER ALLGEMEINE in German 26 Mar 80 p 12 DW

[Article signed Ein." "Against Poison Gas"]

[Text] Gas war--the word evokes horror and terror. The names of chemical and biological agents revive long forgotten memories of soldiers and the civilian population with regard to the horror of World War I battle fields. Even the suspicion that poison gas is possibly being used in Afghanistan or Cambodia prompted the world to protest spontaneously.

The German delegation at the international disarmament commission was therefore right in pressing for a ban on chemical weapons. This means first of all acting for humanity. But as a military problem the possible use or safeguarded renunciation of these evil weapons is equally significant. The appeal to ban chemical agents from war arsenals is directed particularly to the Russians. The Warsaw Pact has enormous reserves of poisonous agents of every kind. The West has always maintained restraint in this respect. Third, with the demand to renounce chemical weapons systems, a strategic issue has been raised. Atomic weapons are political weapons. The threshold of their use is so high in the awareness of all big powers that the probability of their use is small. The same situation must be enforced with regard to poisonous agents.

DEVELOPMENT AID IN 1979 TOTALS .43 PERCENT OF GNP

[Text] Bonn--The Federal Republic's development aid in 1979, totalling DM6.03 billion, has arisen to 0.43 percent of its gross national product. According to the Federal Development Ministry, quoting statistical data, development aid from public funds in 1978 totaled DM4.71 billion, or 0.37 percent of the gross national product. The United Nations has set a target of 0.7 per cent of gross national product to be spent by industrial countries on development aid.

Minister Rainer Offergeld pointed out that the Federal Republic had increased public sector development aid by 28 percent compared with 1978. Gross payments from his ministry's budget had risen by 46 percent. These fugures proved the great importance the Federal Government attaches to increased cooperation with Third World countries.

GISCARD DEFINES FUTURE POLICY TRENDS IN LYON SPEECH

[C.R. report: "I Intend To Keep to the Middle Way"]

[Excerpts] Lyon--Valery Giscard d'Estaing, president of the republic, opened the 62d International Fair in Lyon Sunday morning.

Mr Giscard d'Estaing defined four "directions for our future":

"To follow an energy policy guaranteeing our security and insuring our independence;
"Systematically attaining a position in all industrial sectors with a future;
"Exploiting the only natural deposit we have--our agriculture;
"Constantly raising the technical and professional standards of our young people and workers."

With reference to the energy policy followed by France, Mr Giscard d'Estaing said: "In 5 years our nuclear power program will save us 45 million tons of oil per year which, at current prices, amounts to more than Fr40 billion per year."

The president of the republic continued: "We only have one natural resource--our agriculture.

"That is why the farmers must have an income which guarantees them fair remuneration. Their rising costs and the increases in industrial prices make the initial proposals put forward by the Brussels Commission unrealistic and unacceptable. Everybody realizes this now. The agriculture minister together with our partners will have to set a price level which will maintain the purchasing power of agricultural revenue in 1980. That is a fundamental objective for the coming negotiations.

"Finally, the stability of the franc which is now at the top of the European monetary system will enable us this week to ask for the definitive elimination of what remains of our monetary compensatory amounts."

Turning to international competition, Mr Giscard d'Estaing then recalled "the irrevocable decision (taken in 1978--LE MONDE note) to lift price controls and monitor domestic competition. No major industrial nation would maintain the anachronistic and paralyzing system of administrative price fixing. The dynamic effects which this decision has had on our industrial vitality can already be seen 2 years later.

The development of a sense of responsibility is illustrated in the sphere of craftsmanship. Exactly 1 year ago the government started work on a declaration of craftsmen's rights. This charter includes a series of measures which plan for the future.

The state has specific tasks: to direct economic development, employment, to defend the franc, to prevent increasing costs and pursue social progress. It is sometimes said that planning, in other words concerted preparation for the future, is less active than it was. That is a mistake inspired by the confusion between planning and bureaucracy!

I regard the task of maintaining a strong franc as a historic daily objective.... The franc has become one of the most stable currencies in the world. Every effort will be made to insure that this remains the case.

The state should make every effort to stabilize the burden of costs on economic activity and on the French people's individual resources. Obligatory deductions--taxes and social security contributions--represent almost half of the national product.... These deductions are required in exchange for all that is done to provide protection against sickness, old age and unemployment, for all that is done in the spheres of defense, security, education and the country's development. However, I maintain that these deductions have reached their limit.

That is why the efforts being made not to reduce but to slow down the increase in health spending has a simple objective: to make it possible after 1 year--in other words in February 1981--to eliminate the 1 percent supplementary contribution from wage earners, which would increase wage earners' purchasing power by 1 percent without any additional charge on enterprises.

As for taxation, in view of the heavy oil duty suffered this year, I am asking the government to observe a pause in taxation, in other words to keep fiscal legislation unchanged, with the one exception of an adjustment in the income tax scale in keeping with price increases and the updating of indirect taxes which evolve like prices.

The objective of social progress is first to maintain purchasing power. If there is a surplus to be distributed it should be distributed to the underpriviledged: old people, families, low paid workers. That does not mean social progress will be interrupted. It will take the form of enabling wage earners to own their enterprise by the direct distribution of shares and by improved participation.

The head of state concluded the economic section of his speech by paying tribute to the action of the prime minister "whose competence, determination and courage will leave their stamp on this period and assure him of the French people's respect and gratitude."

Mr Giscard d'Estaing then defined the political line to which he "certainly intends to adhere."

"This line is that of the middle way. It is that of synthesizing proposals, unifying men and mobilizing forces to help France instead of tearing France apart. It is not a neutral line. It is one of peace and understanding which must be carefully followed in these stormy times.

"You must remember this: A great deal of criticism is to be heard. However, when you follow the middle way you are exposed to twice as much criticism as when you adopt an extreme position. You are fired at from both sides. Let me make this quite clear: You receive twice as much criticism if you follow the middle way! Nonetheless, it is the right way--the one in which French people may one day meet, unite and join forces. This calls for a warning in difficult times: You may criticize the middle way but the choice of extremist policies would capsize the boat!"

The president of the republic added: "When I watch public life in our country I feel saddened by the excessive divisions and antagonism among French political leaders and, behind them, possibly among the French people as well. This makes me sad, not for myself, but for France because I do not think this situation is worthy of France and it is harmful to its interests. I ask you to consider this: To my knowledge ours is the only democratic country in the world whose main leaders from the four political parties representing our national life do not meet face-to-face either in the majority or in the opposition nor even between the majority and opposition, despite the good will shown by some people.

"Of course I do not want the democratic debate to disappear. I am not asking people to agree. However there are vast subjects to be debated: France's foreign policy, its defense policy and the trends of our economic and social policy. All that justifies meetings and dialog.... I would like to add that this is harmful to French interests and to France's reputation.... Do you think that the French leaders' inability to debate our country's problems among themselves gives us the image of an exemplary country, a vanguard country, a country to be imitated? It is also harmful to our interests because we need all our energies.... When our energies are exhausted it is as if we were overheating our engine by running it while stationary instead of using it to move the vehicle."

Mr Giscard d'Estaing thinks that after the establishment of "institutions adapted to our times" carried out by General de Gaulle and the subsequent transformation of France undertaken by Georges Pompidou into a great industrial and agricultural country which is now being pursued, we must now "organize a better understanding and better cooperation among the French people." "I have applied myself to this task," he said, "with some results which I realize are limited but which, I think, deep down show a movement in this direction and I am sure that we will succeed or rather that France will succeed...."

BELGIUM'S SIMONET HOLDS TALKS ON FRANCO-UK EC DISPUTE

[Bernard Brigouleix report: "The Belgian Foreign Minister Calls For London To Respect Community Principles"]

[Text] Belgian Foreign Minister Simonet had talks with his French colleague, Mr Francois-Poncet, on 20 March. Essentially, the talks centered on a study of the situation created by British demands on the Nine's budget. After Mr Francois-Poncet's visits to The Hague (accompanied by Mr Barre) and to Copenhagen, France is thus continuing to prepare for the European Council scheduled for Brussels 31 March-1 April. Mr Simonet also called on Mr Giscard d'Estaing and Mr Barre before returning to Brussels.

The French minister's talk with Mr Simonet will probably have helped to reassure Paris. In effect, the French Government feared that the other member states would see its difference with London as essentially a clash of conflicting interests, the collision of two national egos, in short, a Franco-British affair (the tone of certain recent London press editorials may well have stoked this fear), and not as a fundamental debate on the respect for Community principles. Now the Belgian diplomatic leader has agreed with his host when considering that "the French Government is justly concerned by the turn in the confrontation between Britain and the remaining members of the Community." While suggesting that the Brussels council must do its utmost to avoid a split between Britain and the EEC, Mr Simonet expressed the wish--which ties in with Paris' concerns expressed at Wednesday's Council of Ministers--that an eventual solution to the crisis should not harm the principle underlying the way the Community works.

Mr Simonet, in particular, declared himself hostile to any reorganization of the Community's system of funding, since such a reorganization would be one of the consequences implicit in meeting Britain's demands. With Mr Francois-Poncet, moreover, he insisted that in his view, any system which consisted in setting up a sort of "balance in principle" between what a country pays into the Community and what it gets back would remove the motive or the objective both for the enlargement of the Community to include the less rich southern European countries and, beyond that, for the Community's very existence.

"A Specifically British Problem"

Mr Simonet proposed to Mr Francois-Poncet that, to enable the Nine to overcome the present crisis, an arrangement should he sought in Brussels which would permit both the reduction of Britain's contribution to acceptable proportions and the releasing of some new financial resources for operation directly favorable to Britain. He indicated that the reduction in Britain's contribution could be achieved most notably by the "generous" use of the compensatory mechanisms envisaged at the Dublin summit for the application of article 235 of the Treaty of Rome. Like Mr Francois-Poncet, moreover, the Belgian minister believed that the structure of the Common Agricultural Policy should be modified but that this policy represented an attainment to be preserved above all. On the Dutch proposal to reduce the Nine's agricultural spending from 72 to 65 percent of its total budget, Mr Simonet believed that they should try to reach this target but that for the immediate future this would be very difficult.

"This affair is in no way a difference between France and Britain but a specifically British problem, to which our London partners wish to find a universally acceptable solution," The Belgian foreign minister stated to us at the end of his talks with his French counterpart. "This solution may mean that we shall have to pay a little more. Whatever happens, it must be compatible with Community principles. Moreover, the financial pressure in most member states, including Belgium, is such that it seems almost unacceptable to ask the taxpayers for a further significant amount. Furthermore, it is not a matter of justice, and the British Government is undoubtedly wrong to present it in these terms. The situation simply requires our London partners to seek a solution which will enable Britain to overcome its present difficulties. But this search must not compromise their loyalty to the principles of the Treaty of Rome. Community solidarity must lead our London partners to understand this, and it also obliges London to meet its essential commitments." This kind of talk cannot have displeased Mr Francois-Poncet.

BARRE REVIEWS 1980 ECONOMIC PERFORMANCE

[Unattributed report: "France Will Face Up to a Second Oil Shock"]

[Text] Speaking to French Democratic Union deputies who met in Paris prior to their national congress, which takes place in Orleans today and tomorrow, Raymond Barre gave an interim summary of France's economic activities in 1979. This gave him an opportunity to challenge the figures mentioned by Jacques Chirac last Monday during a "Cards on the Table" program. The prime minister again denounced "the professional disparagers" who "indulge acrimoniously and powerlessly in verbal exaggerations."

The prime minister stated, among other things:

"You will recall all that was said at the end of last summer about the failure of the government's policy. You have also heard some people assert that France is continually losing ground....

"I would like to acquaint you today with the provisional results for 1979 which the economy minister has just submitted to me:

"The increase in the gross domestic product amounted to some 4 percent. Total investments increased 3.5 percent. Investment in industry increased 5.1 percent (7.7 percent in the latter half of 1979). Productivity in the industrial sector, including the construction industry and public works, improved by 6.3 percent.

"Finally, I would like to remind you that in the current international monetary situation the franc's exchange rate against the mark in lower than the ceiling exchange rate which prevailed in March 1979, when we joined the European monetary system.

"This is why I said and I repeat now that France is able to face up to a second oil shock.

"In the early months of this year we will be faced with high price indexes and trade balance deficits. This is unavoidable and should be accepted calmly.

"Let the professional disparagers indulge acrimoniously and powerlessly in verbal exaggerations. As far as the government is concerned, it will pursue its policy, which boils down to three principles:

"Maintaining a strong and stable France;

"Preventing recession in France;

"And safeguarding the French people's purchasing power."

Raymond Barre also mentioned a number of questions concerning the agricultural sector and the social situation.

In conclusion, the prime minister told the French Democratic Union members of the National Assembly: "In recent years, the French people have shown that they are able to adapt and make efforts. This is why tribute should be paid to them. I feel sure that the work done by the government, its majority and, especially, the French Democratic Union parliamentary group will be worthy of our people's capabilities."

France Trip Unconfirmed

[Text] Vatican City, March 27 [ANSA]-The Vatican has neither confirmed nor denied reports that Pope John Paul II is planning a trip to Paris for the beginning of June. According to reports circulating here and in the French capital this week, the Polish-born pope will be the guest of both the United Nations Educational, Scientific and Cultural Organization (UNESCO) and Cardinal Archbishop Francois Marty. The pope reportedly wants to honor the Paris-based "UNESCO" with his visit, following his trip to United Nations headquarters in New York last October. It would be the first visit to the Parisian diocese by a pope of modern times.

Unconfirmed ecclesiastical reports also indicated that the pope might combine a visit to Paris with a trip to Strasbourg, the home of the Council of Europe and the European Parliament. The only forthcoming trips abroad that have been officially announced by the Holy See were the pope's scheduled visits to Africa, probably in May, to Brazil in July and to the Philippines in the fall.

'CAUTIOUS OPTIMISM' SEEN ON EFFORTS TO FORM COALITION

[Text] Rome, March 27 (ANSA)--There is now cautious optimism among political observers here that Italy's latest government crisis, the 38th since the Second World War, will be solved by forming a three-party coalition of Christian Democrats (DC), Socialists (PSI), and Republicans (PRI). The outgoing coalition, led by Christian Democrat Premier Francesco Cossiga, was a partnership of the DC with the Social Democrats (PSDI) and the right-of-center Liberals (PLI). Cossiga is the new premier-designate.

The observers said that the chances of the new coalition seemed favorable after a first meeting yesterday between delegations from the DC and the PSI. The DC is the largest party in the Rome Parliament and has formed the nucleus of every government since the war. The Communists (PCI) are the DC's closest rivals while the PSI ranks third, well behind the other two.

According to PSI Secretary Bettino Craxi, yesterday's meeting was "useful", both as regards the "nature" of the new government and as regards "prospects for action". These "must be inspired by a constant search for a more ample national solidarity, re-establishing the climate and appropriate occasions for the vast convergence towards the country's political and trade-union left," Craxi told journalists. Craxi was also asked whether the DC accepted the idea of having a non-Christian Democrat in the premier's office, which has been occupied by Christian Democrats for well over thirty years. "In general, the DC said there was no 'negative prejudice' on this point", Craxi asserted.

Christian Democrat Secretary Flaminio Piccoli described the meetings as a "useful and positive clarification". "A common assessment was expressed on the need to give the legislature the chance of a normal and fruitful continuation", he added in reference to fears that another round of early elections might be necessary.

The Socialists were followed by the Republicans, who met with Cossiga twice yesterday. After their third meeting with Cossiga, PRI Secretary Giovanni Spadolini said they had received a formal invitation to enter the new coalition. Spadolini said that, in view of Italy's "economic, moral and civil emergency", there should be a "more ample consensus than that reflected in the concrete and already acquired political alliances", a presumed reference to closer cooperation with the Communists.

But the DC is also seeking to involve the Liberals in the new parthership. After a meeting with the Christian Democrats, PLI Secretary Valerio Zanone said, however, his party would not give its support to "any ambiguous formula, dangerous operation, or fiction, since we think the political situation needs clarity and certainty.". "And I think that the coalition on the horizon is ambiguous, he added. "The crisis got off on the wrong foot and now we'll see if someone manages to put it right".

The Social Democrats also voiced their opposition to the proposed new coalition. They said the DC's moves were "a pretext and a mortifying move" so as to arrive at early elections and provoke the election of a new Socialist Party secretary in place of Craxi.

BERLINGUER ASSERTS 'DEMOCRATIC UNITY' AS GOVERNMENT FALLS

LD261231 Milan L'UNITA in Italian 20 Mar 80 pp 1, 7 LD

["Text" of PCI Secretary General Enrico Berlinguer 19 March address to Italian lower house: "Christian Democratic Party (DC) Vetoes Rule Out a Real Government"]

[Text] Rome-Comrade Enrico Berlinguer has delivered a speech on Prime Minister Cossiga's remarks. The text of his speech is as follows:

This debate is taking place at a dramatic moment in our nation's life, as we can see once again from the assassination announced just a few hours ago of the third magistrate viciously killed in 3 days, the 23d victim of terrorism this year.

This should prompt everyone to impart to the political debate a very different tone and direction from those which have characterized it in recent months--and a much more rigorous conduct as well. Instead, for the past several weeks certain sides have begun or continued to proceed by means of short-term, petty political and parliamentary maneuvers and stratagems.

Suffice it to consider the chain of events leading up to the prime minister's remarks today.

On 28 February the Italian Socialist Party [PSI] parliamentary floor leaders informed the prime minister that their party was withdrawing its abstention, which last August enabled the government to be formed.

Why did Deputy Cossiga not address Parliament at once, as political and constitutional logic would have suggested, so as to promote a clarification and a decision? Did he not want to? Was he unable to? Was he subjected to pressure, and if so from whom? From what several newspapers have said, it seems that such pressure was exerted by DC leaders especially. This being the case, this point should be clarified, so that we can know to whom to attribute the responsibility for a situation which has daily become more difficult and burdensome for the institutions and for the government itself.

What is certain is that this debate can only end in the government's resignation.

As far as our party is concerned, this demand is not only a confirmation of the lack of confidence which we have expressed in the government ever since its formation, but is based also on the critical verdict which we have been issuing on it in increasingly severe terms, with regard to its general approaches, the essence of many of its major decisions and also the method which has characterized its action.

With regard to its method, suffice it to recall, first, the absolutely abnormal use of decree laws, with the consequent debasement of Parliament's role; this means that absolutely no progress has been made toward the normalization of institutional life and the dialog between the government and Parliament which Deputy Cossiga claims to have guaranteed. Second, there has been a dilatory, ambiguous and irresponsible form of conduct with regard to the trade union confederations, which has increased the tensions in delicate and essential areas (such as the railroads, other public services and the civil service).

Third, once again--and even amid storms such as the one caused by the Caltagirone scandal--recourse has been had to the old and now unacceptable criterion of replacing resigned ministers with other ministers belonging to the same DC current. Deputy Cossiga can say that the government's composition was not based on the parties' instructions. But by some coincidence, both in the formation of the government and the replacement of certain ministers, the criterion of a sharing among the currents was observed in the most rigorous homage to a well-known rule.

Then there have been forms of conduct and acts characterized by vacillation and uncertainty, with grave economic and political repercussions both at home and abroad, as in the case of the National Hydrocarbons Agency affair, not to mention the continual postponements of new executive appointments to several major credit institutions and other public agencies. But the most serious errors committed by the government concern its approach to economic and foreign policy.

In the economic field, the government, surviving from one day to the next but taking some negative decisions and abandoning any comprehensive view of the initiative and action of the public authorities, has essentially facilitated the aggravation of inflation without even attempting moves to set economic and production activities on the road to a regenerated and lasting development. A typical case is the delays and inconsistencies in drawing up and implementing an energy plan, which certainly cannot be substituted for by continuous and spasmodic increases in the prices of oil products. Overall, a not inconsiderable influence has been exerted by the frequent contradictions and divergences among the ministers responsible for economic policy. This has not prevented us from appreciating the commitment shown by some members of the government, such as Professor Roviglio, in his struggle against tax evasion.

With regard to foreign policy, there was no initiative to make Italy contribute actively to a policy of detente, arms reduction and cooperation. Indeed, we blame the Cossiga government for having adopted positions, as in the missiles case, which have dealt a blow to the possibility of a dialog on disarmament. We have deplored and viewed with concern the Soviet intervention in Afghanistan, but in this connection the government has essentially alined, apart from the occasional recourse to more prudent language, with U.S. policy. Let nobody tell us that it was impossible, within the context of Italy's alliances, to take initiatives and make proposals better matched to the interests of Europe and our own country, as other countries' governments have done and are still doing both in their relations with Eastern Europe and with regard to the Arab world. Otherwise it is mere rhetoric to invoke Europe's specific role. Even on an issue as integral to peace in the Middle East as the Palestinian issue, Italy, which should have a better chance of being heeded and should be less suspect for neocolonialist aims than other countries, is in danger of lagging further behind, even though the prime minister's remarks this morning contained assertions concerning self-determination and the PLO's role of which we take positive note.

The Cossiga government should have facilitated a positive dialog among the democratic forces with a view to a resumption, which many consider necessary, of the policy of democratic and national solidarity on more solid and better guaranteed foundations than in the past. This objective has been missed. Clearly the blame lies not only and not so much with the government as with particular parties, primarily the DC.

We therefore consider the DC Congress and National Council conclusions grave. The confirmed prejudice against government cooperation with the PCI rules out, at least for the immediate future, the only political solution equal to the need for the country to recover and develop.

Though critical of many assertions contained in Deputy Zaccagnini's opening report at that congress, we believe that it permitted the opening of negotiations with us without ideological preconceptions. But the advocates of this line proved to be in a minority. This is something which not only concerns the DC's internal life but has negative repercussions on the country's entire life and creates grave uncertainties about the development of political relations and about the solution of the government crisis about to begin. And in some sectors of the DC there is even a clear, irresponsible attempt being made to aim at early elections or to use them as a blackmail threat.

Why did the majority of the DC conclude the congress as it did? The real reasons for that decision are not our party's alleged insufficient democratic maturity or uncertain international autonomy. These are pretexts of excuses, and this is now clear to everyone, in view of the fundamental contribution we have made to defending democracy against terrorist attack and our foreign policy proposals and initiatives in Europe and worldwide. The fact is that the DC as reflected in the so-called "preamble" does not want to alter the essence of its political tradition or to yield an inch of its own power, despite the fact that this has become a necessity for democracy and for the country's renewed development. The fact is that the Communist issue means entering into relations with a party profoundly different from the others, because of its view of power and its practice and because of its unyielding political morality.

Obviously, with a DC whose majority acts on the basis of a political attitude like this and with such a view of its own role, it is impossible for the Communist Party to establish relations of cooperation or an understanding.

We do not want to fail to mention that the attitude of other parties also played a part in bringing about such a negative conclusion to the DC Congress and National Council meeting. I am referring to the Italian Social Democratic Party's positions--indeed, its outright campaign--against a government with PCI participation. [paragraph continues]

But it must also be said that the PSI Central Committee's positive decision, asserting that the emergency government with the participation of both workers movement parties was the objective to be pursued, has been weakened by a series of statements conflicting with clarity and which have given an entire sector of the DC hopes of other solutions based on the PCI's exclusion from the government.

At this point Comrade Berlinguer was interrupted by someone in the center benches, who said: "Say what you mean."

Berlinguer replied: "You know who I am talking about."

As a result of the DC Congress conclusions, Berlinguer continued, the country finds itself gripped even tighter in the contradiction which has remained unresolved for some time.

On the one hand, there is the increasingly dramatic situation in economic and social life, in civil coexistence and in the functioning of the state--a situation which demands more than ever a political leadership capable of uniting all the nation's healthy and vital energies, which are still enormous, and of leading them in a unitary task of reform and recovery. And among the social and political forces, there is now evidently a majority--as emerges from our own positions, those of the PSI and those of a considerable and authoritative sector of the DC and, I believe, also of the Italian Republican Party--which share a belief in the need for a policy and government of democratic unity.

On the other hand, there is still the obstinate refusal of the present DC leaders which is impeding this solution and increasing the country's instability, nurturing uncertainty, malaise and mistrust.

We do not know what other solutions will be proposed by the parties--starting with the DC--which presume that they can govern without us. What we believe to be certain is that none of the hypotheses being put forward will be equal to the grave and tragic nature of the existing problems in every field of our nation's life--from the tragic and troubling problems of democratic order and the protection of the citizens' lives (already, this 79th day of 1980, 23 people have been killed by the blows of terrorist aggression, from Piersanti Mattarella assassinated 6 January in Palermo, to Girolamo Minervini, slain in Rome yesterday, and Magistrate Professor Guido Galli, killed in Milan a few hours ago while this debate has been in progress) to the problems of the anti-inflation struggle and the struggle against the mounting danger of a collapse of economic activity and thus employment; from the problems of the moralization of political life and the reform and efficiency of public administrations, which are now causing unprecedented concern and alarm among the Italian people, to the problems of Italy's action to help surmount the criticial phase and the danger looming over Europe and the entire world.

Governing Italy today means tackling these problems and starting to resolve them on the basis of rigor, honesty, order and regeneration. Do people believe that this national requirement can be met--and above all that civic and moral trust and awareness can be revived among our people--without consensus and without making full use of the commitment of fundamental masses of workers and citizens such as those gathered around our party? We believe that only narrowminded calculations and petty partisan convenience could deny such a need.

As far as we are concerned, we will continue tenaciously to propose a government of full democratic solidarity and to fight for it, in the conviction that this is the only way out of the crisis' grip, of guaranteeing a new phase of democratic development and social transformation, in the conviction that this is a realistically practicable path.

Obviously our party will oppose any other solution.

What kind of opposition will this be, and what will its aims be? We have already shown--but we reassert once more--that our opposition will always take into account the nation's fundamental interests, its need for peace, democratic security, economic progress, social justice and moral reform, and that it will always be aimed at providing a positive solution to the problems of the Italian workers and people. As an opposition party, we will follow the same line, the same program and the same objectives as we would follow as a government party. It is also obvious that our entire action will be aimed at creating as soon as possible the conditions for a turning point in the political leadership and for establishing a government of democratic unity.

We are aware that this will demand from us a great commitment to instill a more thorough unitary awareness among the people's masses, to alter the balance of forces in society and among the parties so that in all the democratic parties the most open, unitary and progressive tendencies will assert themselves and that the most stubborn and divisive forces, especially within the DC, will be defeated. In this battle we consider essential the development of relations of cooperation with the Socialist Party within the mass movement and in regional and local government, the quest for unitary political initiatives, and the comparison of views on the leftwing's role and the prospects for democratic advance toward socialism in Italy and Europe.

It is not up to us--at least not for the time being--to issue pronouncements on the possible government formulas. This does not mean that we will remain aloof from the course of the crisis or that we will remain indifferent with regard to its solution. Indeed, we do not believe--nor have we ever believed in any of the various political phases that the country has experienced--that all governments are equal. Even during the crisis, we will keep the country's attention centered, by means of our proposals and our struggle, on the major issues of the approach to national policies and the issues daily afflicting the workers--the most underprivileged sector of the population and the productive classes. Our verdict and our opposition conduct will be governed by the composition, structure and program of whatever government is formed, but the most essential considerations will be the specific facts of the government's action and the course which it will take.

This, clearly and simply, is our position, our aim and our challenge. It contains no hardening prompted by revenge or intention to close in on ourselves. Every reasonable person will realize that our parliamentary position is dictated by the stances which at present prevail in other parties. But this fact will not prevent us from developing with the utmost vigor and breadth our links with the broadest workers and peoples masses, developing the dialog and relations with all the leftwing forces, with the democratic forces of the Catholic world and with all the progressive currents in Italian society and culture.

ANDREOTTI INTERVIEWED ON MEETING WITH CEAUSESCU

AU242013 Bucharest AGERPRES in English 1906 GMT 24 Mar 80 AU

[Excerpt] Bucharest, AGERPRES, 24/3/1980--Giulio Andreotti, former prime minister of Italy, chairman of the Foreign Policy Commission of the Chamber of Deputies of the Italian Parliament, refers in an interview granted to the Bucharest daily ROMANIA LIBERA (published in the March 24 issue) to the main themes approached during the call he paid on President Nicolae Ceausescu on his recent visit to Bucharest, and stressed that the Italian-Romania relations are developing an excellent condition, as "we have no difficulties to solve," he said. Mentioning that he met President Ceausescu for a third time and that they approached "the most acute aspects of international life," Andreotti stated: The multiple relations of Romania, of the Romanian head of state on all meridians illustrate an exceptional position, an extremely firm will of not depending in action on the difficulties existing in international life, on the obstacles raised in front of detente, of understanding and cooperation among peoples.

WORK STOPPAGES, DEMONSTRATIONS IN AGRARIAN REFORM AREA

[Excerpt] The day of struggle against the government's agricultural policies was today marked by stoppages in the agrarian reform area, where, according to trade union sources, the stoppage by workers from collective units of production and farm cooperatives was 100-percent effective. Early this evening, thousands of workers marched through the streets of Evora. Here is a report by Portuguese news agency correspondent Jose Pedro Martins on the Evora demonstration:

This demonstration, which according to the local association of trade unions was attended by 10,000 people, marked on the other hand the first day of stoppages in the agricultural cooperative sector, which, for their part, are part of the day of struggle in support of the agrarian reform called for by the General Confederation of Portuguese Workers in its 3rd congress.

After the demonstration, which proceeded in an orderly manner through the main streets of the city and during which slogans were shouted calling for the overthrow of the government and at the same time for reoccupation of lands, the workers gathered at 1 May Square, where they were addressed by three Communist MP's, Carlos Brito, Zita Seabra and Jeronimo de Sousa. The speeches were marked by violent attacks on the present government and on the Democratic Alliance and by Communist Party support for the stoppage and the farm workers' struggle in defense of agrarian reform. The workers were then urged to gather again tomorrow at the same place at 1400.

Similar gatherings also took place in Eztremoz, Montemor-o-Novo and Arraliolos and demonstrations were held in the latter two localities. No incidents were reported there either. According to the Union of Evora Trade Unions, 7,000 and 2,000 people respectively took part in those two demonstrations. Farm workers' demonstrations were also held in the Portalegre District, in the localities of Avis, Campo Maior and Ponte de Sor. Again, no incidents were reported.

The Portalegre District Secretariat of Collective Units of Production and Farm Cooperatives said in the meantime that 1,000 people gathered today in Elvas, another 1,000 in Monforte, 2,000 in Avis and 5,000 in Ponte de Sor. Gatherings are scheduled for tomorrow in that district in the city of Portalegre and in the localities of Elvas and Ponte de Sor.

In lower Alentejo, on the other hand, 10,000 workers gathered in Beja and another 5,000 in Moura, according to the Odemira Farm Workers Union. No demonstrations were held in those places, as they are only scheduled for tomorrow after 1930, as stipulated by law.

PRESS COMMENTS ON U.S. ECONOMIC PACKAGE

LD261357 [Editorial Report LD] Madrid EL PAIS in Spanish 21 March 1980 publishes on page 8 an editorial commenting on U.S. President Carter's latest anti-inflation measures. It begins by noting that "the international economic horizon is increasingly threatened by an acceleration of inflation, which is ruining the stabilization efforts undertaken by many governments since the middle of last year." The editorial says that the Carter administration has so far been practicing "a very gradualist anti-inflation policy through monetary measures which, however, have provoked a whole series of criticisms inside and outside the country."

EL PAIS maintains that the latest set of measures "are not forceful on the fiscal side, since the budgetary balance advocated is being postponed until the next fiscal year, which begins in October, but they extend and intensify the monetary measures." It asserts: "The measures will be slow to produce the effects anticipated, but they demonstrate quite unambiguously that the Carter administration, which has rejected the use of prices and incomes control, is firmly resolved to combat inflation at the cost of a fall in activity in an election year."

Barcelona LA VANGUARDIA in Spanish 21 March 1980 carries on page 43 a Francisco Granell commentary on the same topic. It also points out that "Carter's package might seem extremely dangerous for somebody who is seeking reelection to the U.S. presidency."

LA VANGUARDIA maintains: "With his package of measures, Carter has opted for the struggle against inflation and against the public sector deficit, in the belief that the atmosphere for investment can only improve as a result of greater stability, despite the reticence expressed in this connection by some big businesses, which feel threatened by the prospects of cancellation of contracts with the government within the general context of austerity in public expenditure, and despite comments by some labor union leaders, who fear that unemployment will rise even higher than the already high current U.S. level of 7.3 percent."

Noting the likely international effects of the measures, the commentary states that "it may be believed that the U.S. measures will not help to improve the prospects of world demand in the way in which the economists who support the role of the United States, the FRG and Japan as locomotives of the world economy would like to see." However: "In analyzing the effects of Carter's measures on the world economy, we find, on the other hand, better prospects of stability for the dollar on the exchange markets, which could help the attainment of a better international balance."

It concludes: "Experience in the functioning of the world economy over the last few years demonstrates to us the importance which the confidence factor has come to have, and in this context vigorous action by Carter on the economic front could outweigh the negative effects which these measures could entail in terms of domestic demand and the exchange rates of some European currencies."

"This should be a sedative for the world economy, which needs remedies in the light of the crisis from which there is no way out and the pressures entailed by the international political tensions which are occurring everywhere."

BUDGET PROPOSALS SUBMITTED TO PARLIAMENT

..[Text] In a long, very full budget, prescription charges are going up, as well as beer, whiskey, cigarettes, petrol and car licences. There is no change in basic income tax, though personal allowances are improved more than was expected. But unemployment benefit, sickness pay and benefits for people on strike will all be taxed, in what Chancellor Sir Geoffrey Howe called a budget to insure that inflation is brought down and stays down. Sir Geoffrey spoke for 2 hours, giving what he said would be an unusually large number of proposals.

He spoke first of the need to restrict the growth in the money supply and to bring social benefits in line with what the country could afford out of what it produced. His first key announcement was that prescription charges are going up again, to a pound from December. This brought long and angry interruptions with the deputy speaker repeatedly calling for order.

Now the other proposals in detail. Pensions are going up to 43.45 pounds per week for a married couple, and 27.15 pounds for single persons. There will again be a 10 pound Christmas bonus. Supplementary benefits are to be adjusted to keep pace with inflation; they will go up in step with the retail price index. There will also be an increase of 50 pence in the allowance for one-parent families--it will go up to 3 pounds--and the mobility allowance goes up to 14.50 pounds per week.

For families with low earnings, Sir Geoffrey is bringing in improvements in the family income supplements. But as part of his policy to try to bring social security benefits closer to what can be afforded from national output, sickness benefits paid by employers are to be taxed from 1982, and unemployment pay will similarly be liable for tax from the same time. Also the earnings-related supplement is to be withdrawn from 1982. Child benefits are going up from 4 pounds to 4.75 pounds from November.

As had been widely expected the chancellor is proposing to levy tax on unemployment pay and family benefits paid to strikers. It will be assumed that strikers are receiving 12 pounds a week in unemployment pay and benefits. Moving from social security to the oil companies profits, the chancellor said the tax on oil would go up from 60 tp 70 percent--15 percent of it to be paid in advance. And a windfall tax bank profits was also under consideration. There would be a clamp down on leasing schemes as a means of tax avoidance. There is to be no change in corporation tax. There will be relief for companies facing tax problems when running down stocks. And in value added tax--again, no change. The government will seek to impose stiffer penalties for late payments. Then, in what he had already warned the Commons would be an unusually large number of proposals, the chancellor got on to the most basic budget changes affecting most of the population.

Beer goes up by 2 pence per pint from midnight. There will be an extra 8 pence on table wines and whiskey, and other spirits by 50 pence a bottle. Cigarettes are up, too, by 5 pence on a packet of 20 king-size. Also up will be the cost of a flutter [small bet]. The duty on bingo is up from 5 percent to 7.5 percent, and there will be a new casino tax.

Neither motoring nor road transport has escaped. As predicted, the road fund licence is going up, but by 10 pounds to 60 pounds--some had expected more. The road tax paid by lorry operators is going up by 30 percent. Petrol is going up by 10 pence a gallon from about now. Derv--that is, diesel fuel--is up by 4 pence a gallon.

Another new feature again expected by many pepople is that business perks will now come in for more tax. On things like suits, or television sets paid for by the employer as part of the employee's job benefits, 20 percent of the value of the benefit will be taxable.

Sir Geoffrey then came to the part of his speech devoted to change in income and other direct taxation. First the basic allowance for single persons is up to 1,375 pounds, and the married allowance up to 2,145 pounds. This was more than expected, slightly above what the inflation rate has been. So in view of this, the 30 percent basic rate of income tax remains unchanged. The threshold from which higher rate tax is levied is increased by 11 percent. The widows allowance is going up to the same as the married allowance.

And changes affecting property transfer and capital 1 transfer--the stamp duty on property transfer will now start at 20,000 pounds. On capital transfer tax, the threshold is up to 50,000 pounds, but where it is for the benefit of a charity, the threshold will be 200,000 pounds.

Early in his speech, Sir Geoffrey made the point that spending on law and order would be increased by 2.5 percent; on defense, spending would go up by 3 percent.

OVERSEAS DEVELOPMENT MINISTER NOTES CUT IN AID PROGRAM

BK261606 Hong Kong AFP in English 1452 GMT 26 Mar 80 BK

[Text] Colombo 26 Mar (AFP)--Britain's minister of overseas development, Neil Marten, said today that his country's aid program throughout the world would be cut because Britain's economy is not in good shape.

Mr. Marten who is here on a four-day visit told a press conference, "There is going to be slight reduction in Britain's aid program throughout the world. The reason for this is that like so many other developed countries our economy is not in good shape".

He said, "We are trying to put our own house in order first. If we don't do that, in later years the whole aid program would decline. So we want to get our own house in order first and I look forward to a more expansive aid program in later years".

Mr. Marten also called uponthe developing countries in the Commonwealth to help each other and not depend only on theaid provided by developed countries.

The British minister arrived here last Saturday to participate in the inauguration of work on a multi-purpose reservoir project for which Britain is providing an outright grant of pounds sterling 100 million.

Mr Marten, who leaves here today for Nepal, did not see any prospect of his government agreeing to provide any concessions to overseas students studying in Britain. He said, "The students coming from overseas should pay the cost of education. We had the absurd situation of rich students coming to Britian from overseas and getting excellent courses that were in fact subsidised by the British tax payer which made no sense at all. The fees are now being put on a realistic basis". Mr Marten said he was having discussions with his government about providing concessions to overseas students and added "But I am not optimistic about it".

DENKTAS RECEIVES UN SECRETARY GENERAL'S SPECIAL ENVOY

TA261132 (Clandestine) Bayrak Radio in Turkish to Cyprus 1030 GMT 26 Mar 80 TA

[Text] This morning President Rauf Denktas received the UN secretary general's special envoy in Cyprus, Reynaldo Galindo-Pohl, and conferred with him for about an hour. Also present at the meeting were the Turkish Cypriot negotiator at the intercommunal talks, Umit Onan; his adviser, Necati Munir Ertegun; and Galindo-Pohl's adviser, Remy Gorge.

Speaking to reporters after the meeting Denktas said that efforts were being made for the resumption of the intercommunal talks.

GREEK CYPRIOT LEADERS TERM DENKTAS' ATTITUDE NEGATIVE

NC261120 Istanbul AYDINLIK in Turkish 23 Mar 80 p 5 NC

[By Erdogan Ozbalikci from Nicosia]

[Excerpts] Everybody, without exception, believes that the Cyprus dispute cannot be resolved unless Turkey takes positive steps. The entire Greek Cypriot leadership shares the view that Denktas adopts a negative attitude toward the intercommunal talks and that he systematically endeavors to obstruct a settlement.

One of the situations which the Greek Cypriots categorically refuse to accept is the settlement of Turkish citizens in Cyprus. They believe that these people, who have been sent to Cyprus from Turkey, contribute to the colonization of the island.

However, one should differentiate between the opposition and the party in power in the Turkish Cypriot sector of Cyprus. The opposition frequently expresses support for the formation of a federal system through a compromise agreement; they say that Cyprus should continue to remain a nonalined country.

We believe that the Greek Cypriot side is justified in its allegation that the Denktas administration does not favor the settlement of the Cyprus dispute.

Denktas enjoys the support of profiteers, the go-between merchants and looters who are parasites, and of those who have got rich thanks to the invasion. Denktas is also the representative of the racist and the chauvinist groups. The survival of the groups he represents depends only an agitating for separatism. That is why Denktas is in favor of two deparate state in Cyprus. The conditions he puts forward for the resumption of the intercommunal talks are in reality intentions to create two separate states. When we examine the suggestion for a bizonal federation carefully, the desire for two separate states becomes evident. The definition of Denktas' bizonality stipulates that: "A real frontier must exist between the two regions. There must not be freedom of settlement and movement between the two regions. Two separate administrations must be set up. Each side must have its own economy. A federation must be formed with an extremely weak central state."

Despite everything, the current situation is favorable for a settlement of the Cyprus dispute. The Greek Cypriots are openly stating that they agree to a biregional federation and that they are ready to cooperate in the formation of a federation similar to federations in other parts of the world.

EDEK CENTRAL COMMITTEE EXAMINES LATEST DEVELOPMENTS

[Text] The EDEK Central Committee at its latest meeting studied developments in the Cyprus question. It issued a document stating, among other things, that certain things are necessary if the present deadlock is to be broken. These include internationalizing the problem along proper lines, building up a defense shield, establishing a civil guard, creating a true climate of struggle, carrying out the (?budget), rebuilding moral values, mobilizing resources through the adoption of proper socioeconomic measures and linking the Cyprus issues with problems common to other struggling peoples. The EDEK Central Committee adds that the Greek-Cypriot side must go to the intercommunal talks with a clear policy and without any deviation from the UN resolutions and principles. In its statement EDEK stresses the need to support the Turkish-Cypriot's struggle against the oppressive Denktas regime. It also calls on the government to cut the facilities that are being granted to the British troops in Cyprus, particularly after Britain's refusal to pay its dues.

The EDEK Central Committee then says that the prospects for the success of the new round of talks are unfavorable and that alternative courses will have to be drawn up. At the same time, it stresses the need for immediate measures to bring about changes in the economic sector and a popular patriotic unity that would be based on the line that the Cyprus question is an issue of occupation and liberation.

TREATY WITH U.S. ON DOUBLE TAXATION SIGNED IN NICOSIA

NC261820 Nicosia Domestic Service in Greek 1730 GMT 26 Mar 80 NC

[Text] An agreement for the avoidance of double taxation was signed in Nicosia today between Cyprus and the United States. The agreement was signed by Foreign Ministry Director General Pelayias on behalf of the government of the republic, and by Ambassador Stone on behalf of the U.S. Government. Speaking after the signing of the agreement, Mr Stone said that the U.S. Government's interest in the Cypriot people is deep and sincere. He added: The United States is continuing to do all it can to support a just solution of the Cyprus problem and, in this effort, will continue its assistance to the United Nations and its secretary general who are playing the main role in rendering their good offices in this effort. In his address, Mr Pelayias expressed to the U.S. ambassador, on behalf of the Cyprus Government, deep appreciation for the continuing economic aid which the U.S. Government grants to Cyprus through the UN high commissioner for refugees for the needs of the displaced people. Referring to the political issue, Mr Pelayias said that the Cyprus Government will continue its efforts for a peaceful and just settlement of the Cyprus problem.

FRG FINANCE MINISTER PAYS OFFICIAL VISIT TO ATHENS

Talks With Karamanlis

LD262325 Hamburg DPA in German 2125 GMT 26 Mar 80 LD

[Text] Athens--Federal Finance Minister Hans Matthoefer tonight had talks in Athens with Greek Prime Minister Konstantinos Karamanlis on the West's proposed aid program for Turkey, German-Greek economic cooperation and Greek membership of the European Community. Karamanlis insisted that Turkey must not use the proposed economic aid in a way which could change the balance of power between Greece and Turkey. According to Greek sources, Matthoefer assured him that the Federal Government always takes account of Greek interests in shaping its policy.

Matthoefer Reassurances

[Text] Athens--Talking to journalists in Athens this morning, Federal Finance Minister Hans Matthoefer regretted that the OECD states still did not come to a final decision on the question of aid to Turkey at their conference in Paris yesterday. Matthoefer pointed out that Turkey is in need of speedy help. He said that he will now try to get the countries who have made definite financial promises to make money available to bridge the gap. He stated the Federal Government's willingness to hand over another contribution to Turkey in anticipation of its aid. A few weeks ago Bonn made DM100 million available to help finance the greatest needs in Turkey.

Matthoefer this morning continued his talks with Greek Foreign Minister Yeoryios Rallis. With reference to the results of his discussion with Prime Minister Konstandinos Karamanlis yesterday evening Matthoefer stressed that Greeks and Germans are agreed "that a peaceful, economically and political stable Turkey is in the interests of all." Matthoefer said that he again explained to the Greek Prime Minister the reasons for the new aid for Turkey. He pointed out that it is being insured that the financial contributions will be used solely for civil and not for military purposes.

According to the Greek side Karamanlis indicated to Matthoefer that it is necessary to see to it that the relations between German defense aid to Greece and Turkey is not altered and that the planned economic aid is not used by Turkey in a way which would alter the existing balance of power between Greece and Turkey. According to the Greek side Matthoefer gave an assurance that the Federal Government constantly takes Greek interests into account in shaping its policy in the eastern Mediterranean.

Matthoefer told journalists that Greece is an important friend and ally of the Federal Republic. In the course of his talks with Karamanlis the forthcoming entry of Greece into the European Community on 1 January 1981 was also touched on and the wish for a Europe capable of joint action, particularly in the present international situation, was underlined.

This morning Matthoefer flies on from Athens to Riyadh, where he will have talks with the Saudi Arabian finance minister and head of the Central Bank on international monetary problems and the possibilities of Saudi Arabian aid to Turkey.

Tomorrow Matthoefer will make a third and last stop on his journey in Ankara, where he will discuss the further course of the aid to Turkey with Prime Minister Demirel and Finance Minister Sezgin. Before he flies back to Bonn he will also have a meeting on Saturday morning with the leader of the Social Democratic opposition, Bulent Ecevit.

RADIO, TELEVISION STAFF REPORTED ON STRIKE

[Excerpts] This is the ninth day since the beginning of a strike by ERT [Greek radio and television] employees and, of course, television and radio programming is in complete chaos.

If the strike is extended beyond midnight Thursday, as it is rumored has already been decided by the unions, the problems will become insurmountable.

Meanwhile, no prospects for negotiations between ERT unions and the administration have become apparent, nor has any step been taken to resolve the demands which have caused the strike.

ELEVTHEROTIPIA SCORES WASHINGTON'S 'DIRTY' GAME

[The "Events" column by Potis Paraskevopoulos: "The United States Inaugurates a Dirty Game With 'Secret Dossiers'"]

[Text] U.S. pressures for Greece's full subjugation to Washington's strategic goals in the Balkans and the Middle East have now taken the form of open blackmail. After the Greek Government's emphatic rejection of the Rogers plan for Greece's return to NATO's military wing, the State Department and the U.S. secret services are inaugurating a dirty game in an attempt to undermine the country's internal political calm and to create rifts in the people's unity of spirit in face of national problems.

Revelation of the Rogers plan and the previous Davos-Haig agreements with points vulnerable to the government's foreign policy, was only a first step. With this one move Washington warned the Greek Government it will not hesitate to open the "secret dossiers" on both the secret diplomacy and its secret services.

In order to prove its point Washington immediately afterwards leaked the scenario of the Karamanlis letter to Carter to the Greek press in an attempt to cause an explosion in the country's political affairs. This is an old trick. Fabricated or genuine documents provide the desired results if used under a suitable climate and at the right moment.

The imminent presidential election and probable immediate elections, with tensions which they created in the political conflict, are the most suitable moment to feed reports and documents to the Greek public which create mistrust and raise questions about both parties and politicians. This is exactly what America attempted to do with its recent action. Naturally it is not its interest in our national integrity which motivated Washington to reveal the Rogers plan and the Davos-Haig agreement for the purpose of...drawing our attention to the national concessions undertaken by the Greek Government to the benefit of Turkey in the airspace of the Aegean. [paragraph continues]

At the same time, it is not because of excessive interest or pure sympathy toward the opposition that Washington "informed" us that Karamanlis asked for Carter's help in order to deal with his political opponents, unless of course a sense of guilt was suffocating Carter ever since last October when he received the Karamanlis letter and, like a good Christian that he is, he decided to get rid of this complex by confessing its contents to the Greek people.

It is certain that more "confessions" and "revelations" will follow--since we gulped up the first ones with such greed--in order to slake our thirst for "sincere information" which only Washington's philhellenic services can give us. The source with Phoebus' verbose water is now located in Washington.

Only the other day U.S. Assistant Secretary of State Vest, another great philhellene, informed us that NATO does not want Greece's return under the status in force in 1974, before its withdrawal.

It is only after we make our own concessions to Turkey that NATO would be able to make the concession to us by once again clasping us to its bosom. This is where we have been led by Karamanlis' mistake of withdrawing the country from NATO's military wing. This is revealed to us now by Vest and only after the junta press has been telling it to us for years.

All these are signs that the United States has decided to play its game in Greece by opening or manufacturing secret dossiers in order to blackmail and erode parties and politicians, to create confusion and mistrust in political affairs. This is another form of intervention in the country's domestic political affairs. It is a dirty method which, however, was proved effective in the more distant past.

In 1945 they toppled Plastiras as prime minister by revealing his letter to the Greek ambassador to Vichy France in 1941. In 1950 the attempt was repeated by the leaking of a fabricated letter to the press which allegedly Plastiras wrote to the Soviet Embassy in Athens and to the KKE leader of that time, Zakhariadhis. The exact same methods are repeated today.

The problem is how to render such attempts useless so the domestic political struggle may develop without influence from foreign interventions in the form of blackmailing revelations and the spurious opening of real or manufactured secret dossiers.

Responsibility forneutralizing such methods rests exclusively with the government. It is only the government which can make the ground fallow and unproductive for such attempts within our political affairs. The only way to do this is to wipe out mistrust toward its intentions. A mistrust which the government itself cultivated with its absolutely secret diplomacy, its handlings and its policy on national issues.

The monotonous repetition of the sentence: "The government knows how to protect national interests," leaves all doors open to the well-prepared foreign supply of information, genuine or spurious it makes no difference, in the effort to intensify mistrust and confusion over critical national issues. One knows how to correctly protect national interests when one knows how to strengthen national unity of spirit in dealing with foreign impositions. [paragraph continues]

This unity of spirit can be maintained only when political differences, no matter how severe they might be even on matters of foreign policy, develop on the basis of true facts and on the basis of a responsible, full and sincere supply of information. It is only this that can effectively strike against the suspicious centers which attempt to entrap the country's political affairs and to exploit political differences between parties by tuning them to the spurious goals of these centers.

The government has a duty to make this information available to the opposition and to the entire Greek nation. This supply of information may reveal an even deeper difference between the policy and handling adopted by the government and that of the opposition. These differences, however, will be clear and in their proper dimensions without being lost within the web of mistrust woven around these differences by the foreign-supplied information channeled to the public at a moment chosen in every given instance by these suspicious foreign centers. In this way the government will not be blackmailing through revelation of its positions and policy on national issues nor will the opposition and public opinion be trapped by spurious reports and information. The "secret dossiers" will remain only burnt pieces of paper in the hands of those who manufacture them and use them to blackmail and erode political personalities and parties.

It would be the ultimate delusion if the government believes that the traps being set in the country's political affairs through use of such "suspicious and spurious reports" will strike at the opposition if tomorrow they are proved truly spurious and suspicious. The only thing that could happen is that the government is blamed for helping this spurious dirty game of erosion, blackmail and traps being played by the "suspicious foreign centers" at this critical period in order to undermine national unity of spirit and the democratic political calm of the country. This is because it is only the government which can neutralize political differences on national issues of foreign policy and free them from the network of the suspicious foreign centers and their web.

As for the opposition, the least one could say to it is that it should be even more suspicious of Danaans when they are bearing gifts. Its own responsibility for protecting the calm political life of the country at least starts where the government's responsibility is exhausted.

NO PRESIDENT ELECTED AFTER FOURTH ROUND OF VOTING

TA261618 Ankara Domestic Service in Turkish 1610 GMT 26 Mar 80 TA

[Text] No results were obtained in the third and fourth rounds of votings held today at the joint session of the Senate and National Assembly for the election of the president of the republic. The Grand National Assembly will recovene tomorrow to continue the voting. Bingol RPP Deputy Hasan Celalettin Ezman was the only candidate at the third and fourth rounds of voting held today. During the third round of voting in which 504 parliamentarians participated, Ezman received 81 votes [as heard]; 186 votes were cast for members of parliament who were not candidates. Two hundred and twenty-eight votes were blank, and 9 votes were declared void. A fourth round of voting was held when no results were obtained in the third round. During this voting, 253 members of parliament voted, but votes cast in this round were not counted as there was no quorum in the parliament. The Senate and National Assembly will meet in a joint session tomorrow in order to continue the voting for the election of the president.

LIBYAN MINISTER CALLS ON DEMIREL, ERKMEN, KIRATLIOGLU

[Text] Libyan Economy Minister [title as heard] Abu Zayd 'Umar Durdah, who is in Ankara for an official visit, called on Prime Minister Demirel at 1130 today, State Minister Orhan Oren was also present at the meeting. The Libyan minister began his contacts this morning by calling on Energy and Natural Resources Minister Esat Kiratioglu. At the meeting Kiratlioglu expressed the belief that Turkish-Libyan relations would always continue to broadon. 'Umar Durdah said the Muslim countries needed unity and solidarity in the face of world developments. He said: Turkish-Libyan relations constitute the best example of such solidarity.

The Libyan minister was then received by Foreign Minister Hayrettin Erkmen, who said during the meeting that the countries had good relations strengthened by historical and cultural ties. Erkmen stressed the importance of speedily developing these relations in the economic sphere as well, pointing out that the Muslim countries had great potential Abu Zayd 'Umar Durdah expressed the belief that if their potential were realized multifaceted changes could take place in international relations.

OECD MEETING ON AID TO TURKEY POSTPONED TO 15 APRIL

[Text] The OECD meeting held in Paris in connection with the urgent economic aid to be extended to Turkey did not produce any results. Another meeting will be held on 15 April. The representatives of the OECD countries met under the chairmanship of OECD Secretary General Emile van Lennep in Paris yesterday. A Turkish delegation headed by Turgut Ozal, the prime ministry undersecretary and the deputy undersecretary of the State Planning Organization, also attended the session held yesterday morning. In the afternoon, the representatives of the countries that will extend aid to Turkey and the representatives of various international economic organizations held a long meeting. The Turkish delegation was invited to the meeting at 1900 local time and was informed that the meeting was postponed to 15 April. The representatives of the OECD countries said that the reason was that some of the countries had not been able to complete the relevant work due to technical reasons.

At a news conference held at the end of the meeting, OECD Secretary General Van Lennep said the meeting was postponed due to a technical obstacle that had emerged at the last minute. However, he added, significant progress has been made regarding the efforts to extend aid to Turkey.

WORLD MUSLIM CONGRESS SENDS CABLES TO DEMIREL, KARAMANLIS

TA261438 (Clandestine) Bayrak Radio in English to Cyprus 1215 GMT 26 Mar 80 TA

[Text] The Eighth Session of the World Muslim Congress is continuing at the Salamis Bay Hotel in Famagusta today. Today's session is being chaired by the Indian delegate, who is also a member of the Indian Parliament, Mr (Mohammad Yunus Salim). The subject of today's session is the education and culture of Muslim children.

Before beginning the formal discussions, the delegates unanimously adopted a resolution to send a cable of thanks to the Turkish prime minister, Mr Demirel.

Speaking before the resolution was adopted, the Lebanese delegate extended heartfelt thanks to Turkey for its support and defense of the Islamic cause in Cyprus and all over the world. A member of the Turkish delegation, and member of parliament, Mr Feyzullah Degerli, repeated that Turkey had not invaded Cyprus, but had been forced to intervene, using the rights granted to her by international treaties to save the Muslim Turkish Cypriot community from annihilation.

In the cable, the congress delegates thanked Prime Minister Demirel for the Turkish support and for pointing out that, with unity and solidarity, the Islamic countries would be able to overcome all difficulties facing them. The cable said that with these expressions of support Turkey had once again proved its [word indistinct] defense of Islam all over the world.

The World Muslim Congress also adopted a resolution protesting the Greek Government's decision not to allow the Turkish minority of western Thrace to participate in the eighth session of the congress in the Turkish Federated State of Cyprus. The congress authorized the secretary general, In'amullah Khan, to send a telegram of protest to the Greek prime minister, Mr Karamanlis. The telegram, which was sent today, says: The delegates to the Eighth Session of the World Muslim Congress, Mu'tamar al Alem al Islami, meeting in Famagusta in the Turkish Federated State of Cyprus strongly protest the refusal of the Greek Government to allow the Muslims of Komotini and Xanthi to participate in the said session of the Congress. The delegates considered this to be a new sign of the Greek Government's consistent policy of preventing the Muslim Turkish minority of western Thrace from exercising their local rights which were granted by the Treaty of Lausanne and urgently call upon the Greek Government to refrain from violating these basic rights.

Attack on Turkish Diplomats Condemned

[Text] The World Muslim Congress, which is being held in Gazimagosa [Famagusta] in the Turkish Federated State of Cyprus, has adopted a resolution denouncing attacks in various parts of the world against Turkish diplomats. A petition to the chairman of the congress to this effect was unanimously adopted. According to this resolution, these attacks are being perpetrated by clandestine Armenian terror organizations with the cooperation of the Greek Cypriots. The congress is expected to conclude its work tomorrow. A joint communique to include the Cyprus problem will be issued at the end of the congress.

EEC SUSPECTS U.S. OF PROTECTIONIST MOVES AGAINST STEELMAKERS

[Phillippe Lemaitre dispatch: "Brussels Studies Retaliatory Measures To Meet the U.S. Threat To Stop Buying European Steel"]

[Text] Brussels (European Communities)--The Brussels Commission is seething with anger at the U.S. initiatives. The EEC states that despite intensive consultations with the United States (Mr Davignon, the European commissioner in charge of industrial policy, was in Washington again last week), Mr Carter's administration has done nothing to stop the machinery of protectionism being set in motion.

Despite its promises, it has not respected the 1977 OECD collective commitment to try to maintain the flow of traditional exchanges. The European Commission's first reaction was to inform Washington that it considers this attitude very regrettable.

What has happened? The U.S. administration has recently told the Commission that it would discontinue the widely termed "trigger price mechanism" [TPM] should U.S. iron and steel firms complain of dumping by the Community's exporters. The trigger price acts as a minimum price of imports to the United States below which foreign steel suppliers are not allowed to go. Reliable sources in Brussels suggest that, in the meantime, it has become known that not only the U.S. Steel Corportation (whose move in this direction was expected and finally accepted by the EEC on condition that it was an isolated one), but also other U.S. iron and steel groups were preparing to lodge complaints of dumping against the Community's manufacturers on 21 March.

In brief, Mr Davignon's fear is materializing: An avalanche of complaints against the EEC resulting in a very rapid cessation of orders for the Community's blast furnaces and, as a corollary, the abandonment of the TPM, a moderate protection mechanism to which people were accustomed and which, for 3 years, had permitted the maintenance of a roughly satisfactory level of European iron and steel sales to the United States.

Is this the result of an unfortunate sequence of events that the Carter administration finds itself involuntarily powerless to oppose? Not at all. Brussels believes that official U.S. departments have behaved just as though their real aim was to provoke this crisis in order to block imports from the Community. In the fight against inflation they refused, in fact, to lift the trigger price as demanded by iron and steel producers from across the Atlantic.

More seriously, by announcing that the TPM would be discontinued if certain U.S. iron and steel producers lodged complaints against Europe (and it was known that U.S. Steel intended doing this), they urged those U.S. iron and steel producers who did not intend following U.S. Steel's example to guard against the probable disappearance of this mechanism for regulating imports by taking their turn at accusing EEC producers of dumping.

Brussels' first reaction of strong displeasure has apparently already been conveyed to Washington.

'Discreet Negotiations' Foreseen

LD271017 Paris LE MONDE in French 25 Mar 80 p 48 LD

[Ph.L. report: "The Brussels Commission Tries To Negotiate a Modus Vivendi With Washington"]

[Text] European Communities (Brussels)--After the American giant U.S. Steel submitted as expected on Friday, 21 March, a series of charges of dumping against enterprises in the seven Common Market countries which export steel girders and sheet steel to the United States, the U.S. administration immediately decided to suspend the trigger price mechanism [TPM]. The trigger price acted as a minimum price for imports. Introduced following an arrangement reached within the OECD in 1977, it had moderately protective effects and had hitherto made it possible to maintain a substantial level of community exports to the United States.

Washington's argument is that the U.S. steel industry cannot enjoy two forms of protection, the TPM and that resulting from the selfdumping procedure. However this suppression of the TPM is also inciting other steel companies to submit charges of dumping against European producers. An avalanche of charges considered to be "virtually certain" will have the effect of suspending orders from Community steel companies. Brussels thinks that there are many valid arguments to be put forward against U.S. Steel. If the Carter administration had really wanted to help eliminate the protectionist process it would have postponed the elimination of the TPM for at least 6 weeks, the Commission points out.

Dr Davignon's office is examining the legal possibilities for taking retaliatory measures against the United States, whose behavior is in keeping with the GATT rules. However, that by no means settles the problem of Community steel sales to the United States. It would seem likely that discreet negotiations might be opened between the United States and the Community, with the European steel industry agreeing to impose voluntary limits on its exports to the United States. There is reason to think that offers will be made to the Americans to try to reach a modus vivendi, rather than lose everything or almost everything.

GOVERNMENT SOURCES CITED ON POSSIBLE SANCTIONS AGAINST IRAN

[Text] Cologne--Following the latest developments in the Tehran hostages affair the United States is reported to have raised the question of economic sanctions against Iran after all. Citing "top Bonn government sources," KOELNISCHE RUNDSCHAU reports in its Friday edition that proposals to this effect were received in Bonn and other West European capitals from Washington on Wednesday. There has been no official confirmation of these reports. Talking to the paper, Federal Government spokesmen merely pointed out that public references about economic sanctions have recently been revived in the United States.

The paper added that the federal chancellor's office and the Foreign Ministry still maintain their negative, or at least skeptical, attitude toward such measures. Bonn fears that the position of Iranian President Bani-Sadr, who is regarded as a moderate, might be shaken and that extremist forces might gain the upper hand. Moreover, the Federal Government apparently believes that Western sanctions might lead Iran and the USSR to draw closer together.

FORMER U.S. ENVOY REVEALS SECRET NEGOTIATIONS WITH USSR

[Text] Berlin--Kenneth Rush, the former U.S. ambassador to Bonn and U.S. negotiator during the four-power talks on Berlin, conducted secret talks in Berlin with the Soviet side during the negotiations in 1970 and 1971. In an interview on FRG television this evening, he disclosed that, besides the official negotiations, he had conducted--without the knowledge of the British and French, or the U.S. State Department--secret talks with the Soviet negotiator, Petr Abrasimov, and the then Soviet ambassador to Bonn, Valentin Falin. He said that he had been authorized by U.S. President Richard Nixon.

Rush said that he had had talks with the Soviets until a draft treaty had been formulated. Radio Free Berlin prereleased excerpts of Rush's account. The treaty draft had then been included in the official negotiations. Shortly before the conclusion of the talks between the four powers, William Rogers, the then U.S. secretary of state, unaware of the secret talks, had demanded that the negotiations be broken off. But Nixon had given full approval to the negotiations.

The negotiations between the three Western ambassadors to the Federal Republic and the Soviet ambassador to the GDR began on 26 March 1970 and concluded on 3 September 1971 with the signature by the ambassadors of the Quadripartite Agreement.

It had previously become known that, besides the agreement proper, the four powers had made a secret agreement, not so far published, which is said to refer to curbs on activities of the National Democratic Party in West Berlin. This agreement was seen as a Western concession to the Soviet Union.

MATTHOEFER INTERVIEWED ON TURKISH ECONOMY, GREEK-FRG RELATIONS

AT271605 Athens MESIMVRINI in Greek 27 Mar 80 pp 1, 3 AT

[Exclusive interview with West German Finance Minister Hans Matthoefer, date and place not given]

[Text] Question: The campaign you have undertaken to collect a significant amount of economic aid for Turkey is nearing its end. Do you believe that this aid will contribute decisively to the stabilization of the Turkish economy?

Answer: All of us have an interest in Turkey's economic and political stability. This country is facing a serious economic crisis that politically could have beomce even more threatening had its government not taken, with international support, certain measures to restore the health of the economy.

The relevant steps taken last January by the Turkish Government were courageous and in the right direction. Thus in the future the exchange value of the Turkish currency will fluctuate within realistic levels, the Turkish economy will be rid of bureaucracy to a significant degree, public enterprises will reduce their deficits and Turkey will facilitate more foreign investments while at the same time expanding the export character of its economy. In this way prerequisites will be created for the utilization of the economic aid which is being provided.

This aid is, on the one hand, provided by the international monetary fund--which recently released a new margin of credit from the credits which had been approved last year--and, on the other, by the World Bank and by the European Investment Bank. At the same time, a multilateral loan has become necessary from member-states of the OECD about which relevant decisions were made in Paris yesterday.

In addition to all this, there will be a restructuring of Turkish debts.

This international aid to Turkey is based on the mutually accepted principle of contributing to rehabilitation programs that will be implemented by the aid recipient through his own means.

Question: The Greek side can only view with reservation and skepticism the provision of such financial aid to a neighboring country the governments of which, through the invasion of Cyprus, the constant provocations in the Aegean and the flouting of the relevant UN resolutions, maintain an atmosphere of tension and threat to peace in the area. How do you assess this uneasiness?

Answer: I cannot and I would not like to adopt the evaluation of Turkish policy which is reflected in your question. I believe that if the solidarity of its allies will help Turkey confront its current difficulties, this will benefit stability in the area gradually and contribute to the removal of Greek-Turkish differences.

Question: The deeper Greek uneasiness concerns the maintenance of military balance. What guarantees are there that the aid that will be given to Turkey will be exclusively used to provide relief for the truly unfortunate Turkish people and not for arms that would upset the balance of forces in the area?

Answer: The immediate aid given by the OECD aims exclusively at filling urgent Turkish needs for the import of goods. Its use for military purposes has been categorically precluded.

Parallel to its economic character, the further program for our immediate aid to Turkey contains a military factor which aims at strengthening the Atlantic alliance's defensive ability and filling the true needs of the Turkish armed forces within the framework of their allied commitments.

Question: In your opinion, how are Greek-German relations developing, especially in the economic field?

Answer: There are traditionally good economic relations between the Federal Republic of Germany and Greece. In recent years bilateral commercial transactions have continuously expanded. In 1979, their total volume surpassed DM6 billion, showing an increase of DM1 billion, or 19 percent, compared with 1978.

The Federal Republic of Germany has long been in the first position among Greece's trading partners and at present it accounts for almost one fifth of Greek imports and exports.

In any event, in recent years German investments have steadily increased, and in the autumn of 1979 they amounted to DM360 million. These investments are principally in the fields of electronics, chemicals, engineering, construction and pharmaceuticals.

The Greek side has repeatedly expressed its serious interest in even greater German investments and in strengthening technology transfers.

The measures to restrict imports which the Greek Government took recently are being carefully examined by international organizations, and especially by European Community organs. One should praise the fact that the Greek Government has placed time limits on these restrictions. The Government of the Federal Republic of Germany believes that these measures will not be extended beyond the time limits which have been announced.

Question: What is your opinion of the course of the Greek economy in view of Greece's complete accession to the EEC?

Answer: The still valid Treaty of Association has already significantly influenced the preparation of the Greek economy for full accession. Nevertheless, Greek industry and Greek agriculture cannot be immediately exposed to competition in the framework of the Common Market. For this reason the Treaty of Accession envisages a transitional period for those sectors of the Greek economy which need protection.

Allow me to add that this period should be utilized for the solution of the problems which in my opinion are most important:

Guaranteeing the competitiveness of especially small and medium-sized businesses and alleviating the structural problems of regional development.

From the talks I had with the representatives of the Greek Government and, more generally, with personalities of the Greek economy (note: he means during his previous visit) I gained the impression that these problems have been fully identified and that an effort is being made to solve them.

MUNICH NUCLEAR POWER STATION SHUT DOWN AFTER MISHAP

[Summary] Munich--The Isar nuclear power station reactor had to be shut down today after radioactive steam leaked into the power station's engine room. This was monitored at 1610 by the nuclear reactor monitoring system at the Environment Ministry. A ministry spokesman said that steam had been released into the engine room simultaneously with the leakage. Forty minutes after the automatic signal, the reactor was switched off. Environment Ministry personnel said that leakage was due to a leak in the condensation tank. The leak was repaired after decontamination operations. The Environment Ministry said that the area around the power station had at no time been endangered.

AUSTRIAN CHANCELLOR ADDRESSES MUNICH PRESS CLUB

[Text] Munich--Austrian Chancellor Bruno Kreisky firmly expects his policy toward the PLO to meet with a response sooner or later. Addressing the Munich Press Club and speaking to the American Chamber of Commerce in Germany only a few weeks after the accreditation of a PLO representative in Vienna, he said: "Many people would like to (?follow suit), and sooner or later almost everybody will."

The sooner the existence of the Palestinian people, consisting of 3 million individuals and a political organization, is taken into account, the less credit would be lost and the sooner those forces in Israel which are willing to negotiate an be strengthened. Several national liberation organizations have put an end to t error the moment they achieved their ends. In this connection Kreisky pointed t former Irish president, Eamon De Valera, and the former Kenyan head of state omo Kenyatta, who was once head of the Mau-Mau movement. Kreisky also said that current Israeli Prime Minister Begin was once "not at all averse to these methods." Kreisky said that he abhors such methods and is not excusing them, but they are facts, and it is unfair to demand from the PLO that it renounce this means now.

Kreisky can see no sense for his country to take part in an Olympic boycott. He asked whether the decision to give the games to Moscow had not been taken "with open eyes," knowing that this is a communist country. At the last world soccer championships in Argentina it had not occurred to anyone to boycott them because of tens of thousands of political prisoners. Participation in the Olympic games could only be forbidden "if there were laws providing for this."

SPORTS ASSOCIATION EXECUTIVE OPPOSES MOSCOW OLYMPICS

[Text] Hamburg--The secretary general of the German Sports Association (DSB), Karlheinz Gieseler, has declared himself against the Olympic games being held in Moscow. In an article in the latest issue of the journal of German sports youth, "OLYMPISCHE JUGEND," in which he violently criticizes the behavior of the IOC, Gieseler says, among other things: "Moscow is the symbol of the IOC's inadequacy and the beginning of total sports war. The blame for this does not rest with Jimmy Carter's boycott appeal, but solely with the IOC, which did not pass its moral test."

"Olympic games in the capital of a powerful country that is making war on a small neighbor, games to spread the cloak of peace and the world's applause over the untold suffering and misery of forcibly subjugated people, are something new in modern Olympic history and offend all principles of the Olympic movement." The DSB secretary general accuses the IOC of lacking in courage and confidence. Like fearful ditherers, the successors of former IOC President Avery Brundage had "clung to their rules and drawn up long statements where a single sentence would have sufficed."

This comment implies indirect criticism also of the president of the German National Olympic Committee and member of the IOC, Willi Daume, who was one of the authors of the statement in support of Moscow as the venue of the summer Olympic games, which was unanimously adopted by the IOC at Lake Placid.

MOROCCO'S HASSAN II, GISCARD MEET ON NEAR EAST SITUATION

[Unattributed report: "During his Visit to France: King Hassan II Declares: 'President as-Sadat must categorically reject the American proposals on Palestinian autonomy'"]

[Excerpts] The first of three scheduled meetings between King Hassan II and President Giscard d'Estaing took place on Monday, 24 March (LE MONDE 25 March) and dealt mainly with the Near East issue. The Elysee spokesman noted that there was a "total concurrence of views on this matter" between the two heads of state, while the monarch expressed the wish that "President as-Sadat should reject categorically" the proposals in the Carter plan for Palestinian autonomy.

Under present conditions, the king said, "the views of the president and myself are of greater legal validity. It is my wish that for the sake of the good name of Egypt and the position which Egypt occupies in the Arab world, President as-Sadat should categorically reject the proposals for autonomy in the form in which they have been made."

Mr Habib Chatti, secretary general of the Islamic Conference, whose chairmanship Hassan II is now resuming, was in turn received by Mr Jean Francois-Poncet. He expressed his satisfaction at the stance taken by Paris in favor of the right of the Palestinians to self-determination, and affirmed that the Islamic world "is counting on France and Europe for their assistance in solving the Palestinian question." He also stated that the issue of Afghanistan neutrality as proposed by the EEC will be studied at the 16 April meeting of the Islamic Conference in Pakistan.

It appears that the conflict in the Western Sahara will be discussed on Wednesday at the lunch to be attended by the king and the chief of state, accompanied by the foreign ministers. The battles now in progress in south Morocco will give this conversation special importance, although the monarch has denied that his army has suffered reverses.

Replying to a question on an eventual solution to the conflict, Hassan II took up a formula which he used recently (LE MONDE 14 March): "One is fighting only in order to negotiate, one is not fighting for the sake of fighting." Similarly, on the subject of an eventual solution to the conflict, he stated: "At the right moment, France's historical role in [achieving] peace and bringing people together will be demonstrated in the most eloquent manner."

GISCARD PROMISES CAR'S DACKO 'EXCEPTIONAL SUPPORT'

[Unattributed report: "Mr Giscard d'Estaing Mentions 'The Overthrow of a Regime Which Had Become Brutal and Contemptuous'"]

[Text] In a speech delivered Tuesday, 25 March, after a lunch in honor of [Central African] President Dacko, who is on a "working visit" to Paris, Mr Valery Giscard d'Estaing promised the Central African Republic [CAR] "Exceptional support from France."

"You can expect exceptional support from our country, notably for urgent development tasks. We will also help you insure the continuity of economic and social life to spare your country these periodic upsets which disrupt the payment of civil servants and the smooth running of the economy. This support will show France's solidarity," the French head of state said.

Previously the head of state had mentioned the operation mounted by the French Army to overthrow Bokassa in these terms: "It was only natural that we should respond to the appeal which you and your compatriots struggling both inside the country and elsewhere made to France when overthrowing a regime which had become brutal and comtemptuous. The overwhelming relief felt by the Central African people and the retrun to the republican principle led you to resume your task of restoring the country's democratic life. Africa was not mistaken in this."

In his reply Mr David Dacko paid "tribute to the personal action (of the French head of state--LE MONDE note) to help us not only restore a humane and liberal republic but also to meet the difficult times awaiting us in rebuilding our country." The Central African president continued: "It is obvious that France's aid cannot take the place of the sacrifices and efforts which we Central Africans must make to repair the widespread damage we have suffered and put an end to regression, whose effects can still be seen each day." In his conclusion, Mr Dacko renewed his appeal for "effective support in men and equipment." "It is only in France," he said, "that we will find the generous and disinterested setiments which assure us of aid without strings which is a guarantee of our freedom."

According to official French sources Paris' aid amounted to Fr68 million for the last quarter of 1979 and Fr10 million during the first 2 months of 1980. The aim of the French is economic and financial recovery and the revival of investment.

After their lunch at the Elysee the two presidents had a 45-minute private conversation. In the evening Mr Dacko attended a dinner given by Mr Francois-Poncet at the Quai d'Orsay. He spent Wednesday in contact with businessmen and will be received by Mr Giscard d'Estaing again Thursday afternoon before returning to Bangui on Friday.

'Unprecedented' amount of Aid

CANADIAN FOREIGN MINISTER ARRIVES FOR FIRST OFFICIAL VISIT

LD271239 Paris LE MONDE in French 26 Mar 80 p 8 LD

[Text] Canadian external Affairs Minister Mark MacGuigan arrived in Paris from Montreal on Tuesday, 25 March. Mr MacGuigan, who is paying his first visit abroad since his appointment to Mr Trudeau's Cabinet, is leading a delegation taking part in the extraordinary general meeting of the Agency for Cultural and Technical Cooperation, a body which brings together most of the French-speaking countries. Mr MacGuigan is also to attend a working lunch on Friday, 28 March, at the Quai d'Orsay to be given by French Foreign Minister Mr Francois-Poncet.

[Text] "Eurocommunism yes, Euro-left no." This phrase was coined by Georges Marchais last night when he addressed tens of thousands of people at Porte de Pantin [in Paris]. Obviously, the Communist Party leader could not stomach the recent summit meeting between French Socialist Mitterrand and Italian Communist Berlinguer:

[Begin Marchais recording] To replace Eurocommunism with this so-called Euro-left would mean abandoning the struggle for real political change and push the workers' and democratic movement into the guagmire of social-democratic collaboration with the bourgeoisie. That is why we firmly say "no" to this impasse. [end recording]

LE MONDE: KENNEDY WINS SHOW CARTER 'POLITICAL WEAKNESS'

[Editorial: "Sudden Spurt by the Challengers"]

[Text] Senator Kennedy's unexpected victory in the New York and Connecticut Democratic primaries has brutally highlighted a fact which international tension had concealed for several months: Mr Carter's political weakness. It only took a diplomatic blunder, in which the respective responsibility of the White House and State Department has not been clearly established, to make the New York Jewish voters abandon the President and swing en masse to the senator's camp.

From New York, the Jews, worried by the looming possibility of Israel being "dropped," the blacks and Spanish-speaking immigrants, disappointed by the budgetary austerity announced by Mr Carter which deals a severe blow to the social programs from which they benefit, have sent clear and energetic messages to the White House incumbent. The Jews reminded him that they had rallied unenthusiastically to him in 1976, despite their initial repugnance at his strong Baptist convictions, only because he said the right things about Israel. The Spanish-speaking immigrants and especially the blacks, who have a longstanding debt of gratitude to the Kennedy family, had been convinced of Mr Carter's merits 4 years ago by prestigious spokesmen in their respective communities. Those voices are not to be heard now. If he wants to make up lost ground Mr Carter will have to prove that he is prepared to sacrifice some elements of his anti-inflation package on the altar of welfare and urban redevelopment.

Moreover, even the international crisis is no longer enough to achieve a holy alliance around the President. Mr Carter has shown he is incapable of getting the Tehran hostages released or of prompting the Soviets to relax their hold on Afghanistan by however little it might be. With the former Iranian shah's departure for Cairo, Washington's policy once again seems clumsy and uncertain in its application. Did Mr Carter not want to spare President as-Sadat the risks which the former sovereign's presence in Egypt is bound to create? The fallen monarch's flight from place to place is not evidence of the soundness of U.S. diplomacy which last December had already accepted, rather irresponsibly, the personal offer made by Panama's strongman General Torrijos despite the reservations of the government and people. According to an opinion poll published Tuesday, the American people's satisfaction with the President's foreign policy has dropped 20 points in 3 months....

However, in the "volatile" and even unpredictable atmosphere which characterizes the race for the White House, Tuesday's results should not be overestimated. Neither Mr Kennedy's double victory on the Democratic side nor, on the Republican side, Mr Bush's unexpected spurt in Connecticut, the state where his father was formerly senator, can disguise the fact that Mr Carter and Mr Reagan are well ahead in the race in terms of the number of delegates they already have for the summer conventions. Of course the die is not yet cast but the challengers have very little chance.

COSSIGA TO PROPOSE TRIPARTITE COALITION GOVERNMENT

[Excerpts] The solution of the government crisis, barring unforeseen surprises, is now clearly outlined. The next executive which premier-designate Cossiga will propose to President Pertini and the two houses of Parliament will be a tripartite coalition comprising Christian Democrats, Socialists and Republicans. The acceptance of the Republicans came at the end of today's Directorate meeting which approved the report by Secretary Spadolini and accepted Cossiga's invitation to enter a government on the basis of an emergency program which, according to the Republicans, must fight inflation and terrorism in defense of a coherent institutional policy, remaining entirely faithful to the Atlantic and European line. Giorgio La Malfa and Adolfo Battaglia will contribute, as representatives of the Republican Party [PRI], to the drafting of the program of the future government.

The Socialist Party [PSI] Directorate has given the green light to the program negotiations following political clarifications received from the Christian Democratic Party [DC] which, in the opinion of Secretary Craxi, opened with the abandonment of the DC's former opposition to the principle of an alternation in the leadership of the government. The Socialists will actively support a government of guarantee, that is a guarantee against any possible involution of the situation and towards a political framework open to every possibility of meeting with the entire political and trade unionist left.

The leftwing of the PSI, in differing degrees, is now waiting for the program to be defined before expressing a definitive position at the Central Committee meeting which will be called on the final phase of the government crisis.

On the front of opposing the idea of a tripartite government, the Communists (PCI), at the Directorate meeting which is to conclude during the night, are defining their "no" to Cossiga. According to Senator Armando Cossutta, the solution now delineating itself is not the one the country needs. Above all we shall judge this government, he said, on what it succeeds in doing, but it is clear that the attitude of the PCI can only be one of opposition.

The Social Democrats [PSDI] have expressed harsh views on Cossiga, who is accused of transformism by Secretary Pietro Longo. Longo, while reiterating his opposition to a tripartite government, nevertheless left a loophole. He said that if Cossiga moves in such a way as to enable the PCI to enter the executive, the PSDI will mount a powerful opposition. If, instead, the orientation of certain components of the Christian Democratic Party in favor of a resumption of the agreement with all the lay parties were to prevail, the Social Democrats would change their attitude toward the tripartite government.

An even more virulent criticism of the DC was expressed by PSDI President Giuseppe Saragat in an editorial of the party organ UMANITA. Saragat accused the Christian Democrats of manipulating for their own political purposes the term "national solidarity."

[Text] Rome, March 27 (ANSA)--New signs that the Italian government crisis was well on its way toward a speedy settlement came today when the Socialist (PSI) and Republican (PRI) Party leaderships gave their approval to the idea of joining a coalition with the Christian Democrats (DC).

The approval came in the form of authorizing their respective delegations to negotiate the terms of a three-party ruling partnership, the first of its kind in the multitude of political arrangements that have characterized Italy's 41 post-war governments.

Even the definition of the set-up as coined by PSI Secretary Bettino Craxi was a novelty: "guaranty government". According to Craxi, the name was appropriate in terms of "the nation's need for political stability and vitality as well as for assuring the authority of its institutions". The PSI leader also indicated that the arrangement would provide an assurance of "the possible development of political relations, of dialogue and of confrontation between democratic forces". In his address to the "PSI" leadership panel this morning, Craxi said that the new government would "operate in a political framework consisting of solid convergencies" and would be open to all possible encounters with the entire political and labor union left.

But the Socialist Party's powerful leftist faction, headed by out-going Party Chairman Riccardo Lombardi, kept its reservations about the new government, saying that it will take a stand on it after the "platform negotiations" were over. As "PSI" Deputy Secretary Claudio Signorile put it, the "guaranty government" will have to provide real guarantees that it will move in the direction of "national solidarity".

The Republican Party leadership ruled unanimously here today to join negotiations for the new government, although the PRI delegation conducting the talks got detailed instructions. "The platform must be guided by principles of rigor and coherence, especially in the fight against inflation, the battle against terrorism, the defense of a coherent institutional policy and continuity of a pro-Atlantic and pro-European foreign policy," PRI leadership ruled.

The Social Democrat Party (PSDI) confirmed plans today to vote against a DC-PSI-PRI government. PSDI Secretary Pietro Longo asserted that premier-designate Francesco Cossiga had described the three-party set-up as a "bridge government", designed to regain the PSI as a government ally with the prospect of moving toward a five-party coalition with the Social Democrats and (right-of-center) Liberals (PLI). Longo complained that there was something "cross-eyed" between what Cossiga said and the statements issued in Rome this afternoon. "We shall try to better understand what this government wants to represent politically and we shall work from our opposition benches to lead it toward a political stand that is acceptable to us," Longo stated.

The Liberal Party has not yet come up with a reaction to the three-party arrangement.

The PLI delegation went to Cossiga this afternoon for an explanation of what he meant when he talked about "national solidarity". What it wanted to know, Party Secretary Valerio Zanone said, was "whether it meant a constructive relationship between majority and opposition for the sake of national interest, or the preparation of a subsequent state that would entail having the Communists in the government". According to Zanone, the latter prospects was unworkable because of "the domestic political situation and especially because of the international situation".

Cossiga called upon the "PLI" to give the government its vote of support without, however, entering as a Cabinet member.

SPEECHES AT PSI MEETING FOCUS ON GOVERNMENT CRISIS

LD271229 [Editorial Report LD] Rome AVANTI in Italian 22 March 1980 carries on pages 2-4 a 10,000-word unattributed report on speeches delivered at the 21-22 March Italian Socialist Party [PSI] Central Committee meeting.

Among the prominent speakers, foreign relations bureau chief Carlo Dira Di Meana welcomes the fact that his party has taken "its own autonomous decision as an autonomous leftwing party" to permit the formation of a parliamentary majority and government, but laments that "this radical change has taken place over the past 3 months mainly as a result of the veto which emerged from the Christian Democratic Party [DC] Congress with regard to a possible national unity government formula." He repeatedly stresses the "asymmetry" within the PCI, whereby "despite the Italian Communists' steps toward a shared opinion with the West, the Soviet regime's steps toward increasingly strict forms of totalitarian and imperialist regression are quicker."

Di Meana attributes the unprecedented split in PCI ranks in the recent parliamentary vote on foreign policy to "a pro-Soviet legitimization to vote that way." He therefore completely dismisses the idea of a "joint program" with the Communists. He warns his party, in its quest for a government solution, against "ridiculous, incomprehensible and prejudiced reprisals against the Social Democratic and Liberal parties."

Riccardo Lombardi, who recently resigned as party chairman, however, asserts that "the leftwing alternative" is, "culturally, if not yet politically ... the only trump card we have to play for a leftwing worthy of the name." He appeals for a "government of public health," dismissing a three-party government of Christian Democrats, Socialists and Republicans and describing a five-party government, including Social Democrats and Liberals as well as "absolutely and radically unacceptable."

Former Secretary De Martino says that "the Socialist Party must make a positive contribution to resolving the crisis by guaranteeing its support to governments which, on the basis of their political aims, program and composition, are aimed at a resumption of the national unity policy... But," he warns, "the Socialist Party's willingness cannot extend as far as direct government participation under present conditions, because that would enable the DC to postpone the necessary correction of its approach indefinitely."

Deputy Secretary Claudio Signorile points to the commitment made at the latest congress that the party would participate only in "forming governments of democratic solidarity" but says that the Central Committee must seek "specific results and political conditions and guarantees which will justify a broad interpretation of the congress mandate, in view of the present need." He says the Socialists must continue their demands for an emergency government, though such a government is impossible now.

Craxi Supports 'National Unity'

LD261335 Rome AVANTI in Italian 22 Mar 80 pp 1, 5 LD

[Unattributed report on Italian Socialist Party (PSI) Secretary Bettino Craxi 21 March concluding address to Central Committee meeting: "Democratic Strategy To Surmount Political Crisis"]

[Excerpt] In his concluding remarks to the Central Committee, Comrade Craxi said that two paths could be followed with regard to the Cossiga government: Either the government could be kept until the regional elections, while continuing to denounce its shortcomings in a political situation demanding very different solutions and guarantees; or we can work for a political clarification, to give the country the stable government for which we all grasp the need. As Socialists, we have decided on the latter path, and in taking this decision we could not fail to take into account also the political commitment which it implied for our party. [paragraph continues]

This does not mean prefabricated solutions, but announcing the Socialists' desire to carry out a verification with the other democratic forces to see whether the conditions exist for negotiations, in accordance with the national unity policy which the country's situation still indicates is necessary. When we have verified these conditions we will submit them to the Central Committee's scrutiny, so that it can take whatever decisions prove opportune at the time. This stance on our part implies no split on the left, though we would have preferred the Italian Communists to adopt the same stance as Spanish Communist leader Carrillo did when he said that he was willing to support both in parliament and throughout the country a government including the Spanish Socialist Party. Nevertheless, we take note of the process underway within the PCI and believe that if the conditions emerge for a government with an emergency program capable of meeting the demands of the labor world and which will create a political framework of democratic recovery and regeneration, this must be incorporated into the currently possible line of national solidarity, which is open to future developments. Craxi concluded by saying that he did not want to launch any appeals, but that he did believe that the party must approach the points on the agenda for the next few days with the utmost possible unity, so as to lend weight and credibility to the Socialist proposals.

BALZAMO WARNS PCI AGAINST 'ENTRENCHED' STANCE

LD261209 Rome AVANTI in Italian 20 Mar 80 p 3 LD

[Unattributed report on Italian Socialist Party (PSI) lower house floor leader Vincenzo Balzamo 19 March speech to lower house: "The Country Must Be Given a Stable Government To Tackle the Emergency"]

[Excerpt] The military intervention in Afghanistan has confirmed the Soviet Union's dangerous expansionist tendency. The consequence has been a hardening of relations between the two world superpowers, unparalleled since the cold war era. Nuclear and supernuclear weapons must not allow peace to be exposed to deadly risks. Does Europe have a role to play in retying the knots of detente and at the same time in dissuading the USSR from its expansionist aims? We believe it does. This is the role which Social Democrat Chancellor Schmidt is patiently trying to build in his international relations and to which Italy can make its own autonomous contribution, as long as it entrusts its credibility as an international partner to the solution of its many serious domestic problems.

But there is another point to be made about the left, if for no other reason than the historical role which the left as a whole has to play in opening the way to the prospects of rotation, which we have mentioned before and which remains one of the principal objectives of Italian democracy. We can understand why the PCI has been pushed increasingly toward opting for a return to the opposition, in view of the Christian Democratic Party's negative attitude.

This option taken by the PCI, however, does pose two problems. The first problem was cited realistically by Deputy Napolitano in his address to the PCI Central Committee, when he said that unitary relations between the PSI and PCI must also take into account the two parties' differing stances with respect to the government, because if the entire left were to go into opposition, there would be no possible government and therefore no opposition--only early elections.

The second problem concerns the quest for convergence, agreement and unity between the two parties, even in the event of adopting different stances with respect to the government. At present it is the fate not only of a Cabinet but of the institutions themselves which is at stake. It would therefore be an unpardonable error if each political party were to become entrenched in the defense of its own individual interests. If the ship sinks, we all sink with it.

L'UNITA VIEWS BERLINGUER MEETINGS WITH EUROPEAN SOCIALISTS

[Augusto Pancaldi report: "Berlinguer and Mitterrand Have Cordial Meeting"]

[Excerpt] Strasbourg--French Socialist Party [PS] First Secretary Francois Mitterrand and Enrico Berlinguer had a lengthy cordial meeting yesterday afternoon in the heart of this Strasbourg which increasingly aspires to become--on the banks of the Rhine bloodied by a hundred wars--the symbol of a united, hard-working and peaceful Europe.

At the end of the meeting, which lasted about 2 hours, the following communique was released: "While in Strasbourg PS First Secretary Francois Mitterrand and PCI Secretary General Enrico Berlinguer met Monday afternoon, 24 March, and had a lengthy cordial conversation during which they discussed some of the most pressing problems in the international situation. In particular they agreed on the need for initiatives which can contribute to disarmament, detente and cooperation in Europe and throughout the world and for the observance of human rights and all countries' independence. They also agreed that favorable conditions must be prepared right away for the holding of the Madrid conference and for its success. They also stressed the specific role, in the present difficult phase of international relations, in realizing such objectives which belongs to the workers movement, to its various representative parties and the West European popular and democratic leftwing forces."

A fortnight after his meeting with SDP Chairman Willy Brandt--a meeting on which LE MONDE, among others, commented in depth, as a most important event in European political life--this conversation between the PCI secretary general and France's top Socialist representative can only be viewed as the development of a strategy which, despite the difficulties and problems, is designed to draw the major political forces of the European workers movement closer together through dialog and the patient quest for convergences on which gradually to base a different kind of Europe, more democratic and more open to the workers' participation.

And let us not forget the recent past--in October last year Enrico Berlinguer, guest in Lisbon and Madrid of the Portuguese and Spanish Communist parties, met with Socialist leaders Mario Soares and Felipe Gonzalez, who are calling for their countries' entry into the EEC and who know they have the Italian Communists' backing in this connection.

The overall reflection which stems from this series of meetings must not, we believe, be restricted to a "major diplomatic action on Berlinguer's part with respect to the European socialist and social democratic parties," with the essential aim of securing credit for the PCI as a government force (this being the comment made by some European papers following the talks with Willy Brandt). It appears to us more as the progressive building of the political and strategic blueprint which sees Europe as a force for detente and peace in relations with the Eastern bloc and for balance and fairness in relations with the Third World and which therefore implies the workers' increasingly effective participation in building this force and the prime need for a constructive dialog among the parties which represent the interests of the European workers movement, irrespective of the diversity of their ideological stances.

It should be added--and we consider it opportune to explain--that the crisis in the Union of the Left in France and the polemical situation existing between the French Communists and Socialists must in no way constitute a pretext for ascribing to the Mitterrand-Berlinguer meeting a content which it did not have and could not have had: This meeting was not conceived "against" anyone, but "for" the whole of the vast area which, as the communique states, comprises the workers movement and its representative parties.

WORKERS END 3 DAYS OF DEMONSTRATIONS FOR AGRARIAN REFORM

[Excerpt] Today was the last in a series of 3 days of struggle called by the General Confederation of the Portuguese Workers [CGTP] in defense of agrarian reform. Workers from various sectors of production stopped work to demonstrate solidarity with farm workers in the agrarian reform area. Here is a report from the area by Joao Martins, ANOP journalist in Evora:

Without incident and in a calm atmosphere, farm workers met today in Evora and Portalegre districts and held a demonstration in Beja District, thus bringing to an end the 3 days of struggle called by the CGTP in support of agrarian reform. Farm workers gathered in Estremoz and Evora but the march which was to have taken place through the streets of Evora City was canceled at the last minute due to bad weather conditions. The proposal to cancel the march was unanimously approved by the demonstrators gathered in Evora's main square tonight. According to trade union sources, 30,000 demonstrators were gathered in Evora and 6,500 in Estremoz, and support for the strike by workers from other sectors was quite high: The turnout in the private agricultural sector stood at 80 percent and at 70 percent in other sectors of production.

PCP'S CUNHAL VIEWS AGRICULTURAL REFORM

AU270930 Vienna VOLSKSSTIMME in German 25 Mar 80 p 3 AU

[Bruno Furch interview with PCP General Secretary Alvaro Cunhal in Lisbon--no date given]

[Text] The Portuguese democracy is waging a hard defense struggle, a struggle to defend the achievements of the revolution of 25 April 1974. The old Salazarist ruling classes, the latifundio owners and capitalists, have launched their "Reconquista" [Portuguese word used] with the aid of the reactionary Sa Carneiro government: Their primary aim is the annihilation of the agricultural reform in the south of the country, in the Alentejo, where latifundism was virtually liquidated in 1975. Brutal robbing of land, cattle and machinery with the use of military means, committed against the 550 cooperatives which in 1975 replaced the large estates, have become an everyday experience in the Alentejo.

The capitalist news agencies are not carrying any reports about the daily brutal violation of human rights in southern Portugal. This is why the Austrian Communist Party [KPOe] Central Committee has sent its member Bruno Furch to Portugal to gather information.

After his arrival in Lisbon, Bruno Furch asked Alvaro Cunhal, general secretary of the PCP Central Committee, for an interview on the subject of agricultural reform and the struggle at the peasant cooperative. Here is the interview:

Question: Why was the agricultural reform necessary for Portugal?

Answer: In Portugal there were strong regional differences in agricultural structures. In central and northern Portugal, small and medium farms predominate, while in the south (in the Alentejo and Ribatejo) there were the large agricultural estates (latifundios) with thousands of hectares which belonged to a handful of families. The latifundios were characterized by extensive grain cultivation and enormous uncultivated areas. At the same time, the workers were unemployed for several months every year.

In that region the percentage of active land workers is more then 85 percent. There are only very few farmers in that region. The agricultural reform launched there after the Portuguese revolution was a regional reform of the latifundios. It was an objective necessity to end the noncultivation of land and to eliminate the chronic umemployment, to develop agriculture, and to liberate the workers from exploitation by the large estate owners. The reform was also necessary in order to break the power of the large estate owners who were and still are the main basis of reaction and of fascism.

Question: Can you give me some explanations and essential data on the way in which the agricultural reform was implemented, and on its extent?

Answer: The Portuguese agricultural reform was not decided by the political powers. It was an action of the land workers, when the provisional government passed the agricultural reform bill in July 1975 the workers had already occupied over 500,000 hectares of land that was neglected by the latifundios, and had organized numerous collective units (UCP's) and cooperatives (coops). This process was continued in the subsequent months, already under the protection of the law, altogether, 1,120,000 hectares of land of the latifundios were thus expropriated.

The government's offensive against the agricultural reform began in 1976, since that time more than 200,000 hectares of land, more than 20,000 head of cattle, more than 50,000 sheep, more than 500 tractors, as well as installations of all kinds. Dams built by the workers were forcibly taken from the cooperatives with the aid of considerable military forces, and were handed over to the large estate owners.

The workers continued to wage a determined struggle against this offensive. They defended their land, their machinery, their cattle, their crops. They defended the agricultural reform--"the finest achievement of the revolution."

Question: What was the attitude of the PS "one-party government" (1976/77) toward the agricultural reform?

Answer: It was the PS government which launched the first major offensive against the agricultural reform. Mario Soares, PS general secretary, denounced the agricultural reform as "theft." The PS, in league with the reactionary parties, is to blame for the fact that the Assembly of the Republic passed a new bill called "Basic Law on Agricultural Reform" (also known as the "Barreto Law," named after Minister of Agriculture Barreto), a law which for all practical purposes laid the juridical "foundation" for the restoration of the latifundios. At present the PS criticizes the government's actions against the agricultural reform, but this attitude becomes demagogical in light of the fact that the PS keeps up its hostility toward the PCP, whose extraordinarily strong and decisive influence among the workers involved with the agricultural reform is incontestable.

Question: What is the role of the UCP's and the coops in the framework of the Portuguese economy?"

Answer: The UCP's and the coops still control somewhat less than 900,000 hectares of land, about one tenth of Portugal's total area. The UCP's and coops produce over half of the grain produced in Portugal, and over half of the cork, which constitutes a great national wealth.

However, the significance of the UCP's and coops for our economy goes beyond the importance of their production. The UCP's and coops constitute a noncapitallist form of economic organization. They are an outstanding example of the creative work and creative energy of the workers. The Portuguese agricultural reform has a socialist character, and this is precisely why the violent attacks of all reactionary and opportunist forces against them have been launched.

Question: Do the UCP's and coops confine their activities to agricultural production, or have they set for themselves other tasks as well--social, cultural tasks and so forth?

Answer: As far as agricultural production is concerned, the UCP's and coops have shown enormous initiative, and an irrepressible determination to work and make progress. They have made arable hundreds of thousands of hectares of uncultivated, neglected soil. In the regions of traditional monoculture, they have made great efforts for a diversification of crops. They have enlarged the irrigated soil area by building dams and water storage basins, ponds and so forth, by introducing fodder cultivation and new crops (for example, tobacco), and they have given a strong impetus to cattle breeding.

At the same time, despite all difficulties, important social programs were implemented: new apartments, nurseries, kindergartens, old-age homes, etc. By the time of the beginning of the reactionary offensive, unemployment had been eliminated in the region, and the workers' lives had undergone a fundamental change. This explains the invincible tenacity of the workers, the women and the young people in the struggle against the reaction and for the defense of the agricultural reform. This also explains the fact that in most of the electoral wards of the agricultural reform region the PCP obtained the absolute majority of votes in the legislative assembly elections of 2 December 1979, and that it obtained the leading positions in nearly all local communities with an absolute majority in the local elections of 16 December 1979.

Question: What is the situation of the coops and UCP's now, under the rightist government?

Answer: The Sa Carneiro government is a reactionary government. Its goal is the destruction of the achievements of April, above all the nationalization and the agricultural reform, and the liquidation of the democratic regime and of the Constitution, the restoration of the economic and political power of the monopolist groups and the large estate owners. The government is violating the Constitution and democratic legality every day. It provokes social and political destabilization, and it is also seeking to bring about military destabilization.

Its offensive against the agricultural reform is an example of that. Every day we experience unlawful, arbitrary and forcible actions against the UPC's and coops, to deprive them of land, cattle and machinery. The government is using strong military units, sometimes hundreds of soldiers of the GNR (National Republican Guard) with armored vehicles and dogs. But the struggle goes on. The workers are resisting the offensive, and magnificent mass actions are mobilizing the entire population of the agricultural reform region.

As the workers say: "A luta continua, a reforma agraria vencera!"--The struggle continues, the agricultural reform will triumph!"

DEFENSE MINISTER DISCUSSES SECURITY POLICY

LD271715 Helsinki Domestic Service in Finnish 0600 GMT 27 Mar 80 LD

[Text] Norway has begun to refute the suspicions about changes in Norway's security policy as a member state of NATO. Most recently, Norwegian Defense Minister Thorvald Stoltenberg during his visit to Stockholm gave assurances that the basic principles of Norway's security policy are unchanged despite the doubts expressed particularly in the Soviet press. Juhani Lompolo reports from Stockholm:

[Begin recording] [Lompolo] The Soviet press has criticized among other things, the NATO military exercises held last week, and before that, the plans for the Norwegian bases' storage of equipment for NATO troops who would be flown to assist Norway in a crisis situation. Norway has now begun to answer the accusations on a broad front, and most recently here in Stockholm the Norwegian defense minister, Thorvald Stoltenberg, explained Norwegian security policy.

[Stoltenberg recorded speaking in Norwegian, fading into Finnish translation] The Norwegian defense is based on Norwegian troops. Norway is defended by Norwegians, and this is the main thing, says Defense Minister Stoltenberg. He denies that the Western military alliance, NATO, could decide on Norwegian defense matters over the head of Norway. The Norwegian foreign and defense policies are decided on by Norwegians in Oslo, he says.

He says that suspicions about Norway's intentions are based on erroneous information. He describes the January report, according to which Norway is alleged to have increased the number of its troops on the border with the Soviet Union, as totally false. The situation on both sides of the border is quite normal, says Defense Minister Stoltenberg. He says that it is a good thing that both the Norwegians and the Soviets are well acquainted with the situation on both sides of the border, and for this reason he is not worried about the report, since he knows that the Soviet Union knows that the situation on the border is normal.

Regarding the idea that there already is equipment in Norway for 18,000-20,000 U.S. Marines, Stoltenberg says that the matter has not even been discussed yet. Stoltenberg refutes as unfounded the suspicions that nuclear weapons would be involved. He gives assurances that there has been no change in Norway's policy regarding nuclear weapons, according to which no nuclear weapons are wanted on Norwegian territory in peacetime. Neither has there been any change in the policy with regard to military exercises, which Norway does not permit to take place closer than 500 km from the Soviet border. The recently ended "Anorak Express" exercises were at a distance of 500 km when closest to the Soviet border, he said.

Altogether, Stoltenberg said, Norway wants to keep tension low in the north. He also adopts a stand towards the Swedish offer to host a European disarmament conference.

Norway clearly supports all measures which can in a concrete way lead to disarmament, Stoltenberg says. But he says there is reason to be very cautious in undertaking many measures concerning procedure, which only raise expectations but do not lead to concrete results, as he puts it. [paragraph continues]

Defense Minister Stoltenberg says it is extremely important that the new proposals should not cause difficulties for the forthcoming European security conference in Madrid. Referring to the French proposal for promoting disarmament, Stoltenberg says that we should not discuss the proposals and conferences to such an extent that we cannot then get to the point itself.

Juhani Lompolo, Stockholm. [end recording]

USSR REFUSES TO NEGOTIATE ON DUAL NATIONALITY ISSUES

LD261413 Stockholm SVENSKA DAGBLADET in Swedish 12 Mar 80 p 7 LD

[Ingmar Lindmarker report: "Soviet Union Will Not Negotiate."]

[Text] Surprisingly the Russians have declined to negotiate with Sweden concerning dual nationality. As a result, thousands of Swedes born in the Baltic states must still be classed as Soviet citizens against their will.

On the Swedish side there is irritation over Moscow's "nyet." The Swedish Foreign Ministry has indicated its dissatisfaction with "surprise and regret."

After giving a promise of negotiations last autumn the Soviet Foreign Ministry announced in January that the "proper Soviet authorities" have not shown any interest in the matter.

"We have asked the Russians to clarify whether this is to be taken as a final answer," Hans Danelius, chief of the Foreign Ministry's legal department, told SVENSKA DAGBLADET.

When the Soviet Union annexed Estonia, Latvia and Lithuania in 1940 all persons in the countries became Soviet citizens whether they wanted to or not. Those who fled to Sweden and eventually became Swedish citizens still retained their Soviet citizenship according to Soviet law.

"For many of them it is a psychological problem knowing that they are still regarded as Soviet citizens," Danelius says, "they can formally ask for exemption, but that is the same as admitting citizenship."

For years the Soviet Union dismissed the suggestion of negotiations with the excuse that the legislation concerning citizenship was being revised. When the new law took effect last year Sweden made new promptings and on the Soviet side a positive attitude to negotiations was shown.

No explanation for the changed attitude has been given. The latest Soviet answer came at the same time as the criticism in the West during the weeks following the invasion of Afghanistan.

NUCLEAR POWERPLANTS TO BEGIN OPERATING

LD271540 Stockholm Domestic Service in Swedish 1130 GMT 27 Mar 80 LD

TFSC OFFICIAL COMMENTS ON KLIRIDHIS OFFER FOR TALKS

TA272040 (Clandestine) Bayrak Radio in Turkish to Cyprus 1530 GMT 27 Mar 80 TA

[Text] Prime Minister Mustafa Cagatay said that no time, venue or agenda was fixed for his proposed meeting with Democratic Rally Party leader Kliridhis. In a statement to the Greek Cypriot daily O AGON published today, Kliridhis said that he would meet Cagatay on Saturday. Replying to questions by reporters on this issue, Cagatay said: The proposal for talks was made by Kliridhis. However, as pointed out in O AGON today, no date or agenda has been set for these talks. I see no inconvenience in our meeting with Kliridhis. I shall be glad to talk with him. However, his statement to O AGON is binding only on him.

COLUMNIST CHALLENGES STATEMENT BY U.S. AMBASSADOR

NC280700 Nicosia KHARAVYI in Greek 28 Mar 80 p 3 NC

[From the "Views and Comments" column: "The American Policy"]

[Text] The other day the U.S. ambassador claimed that the U.S. interest in the Cyprus problem is great and sincere. He made this statement during a ceremony marking the signing of a bilateral agreement at the Ministry of Foreign Affairs. The Washington envoy said: "We continue to do all we can in order to support a just solution for your problem, and within the framework of this effort we shall continue to assist the United Nations and the UN secretary general."

Definitely we did not expect Mr Stone to criticize the foreign policy of the United States, since he is its envoy in Cyprus. But his praise for it is a challenge because, regardless of Mr Stone's claims, reality is totally different and it cannot be concealed.

Of course, the continuing U.S. concern in recent years has not been for the Cypriot people, but for the conversion of Turkey into a base and a gendarme for the Middle East in order to represent American interests. To achieve this, Washington does not show lack of generosity in spending millions of dollars and supplying ultramodern weapons. The United States knows that its ally, Turkey, has invaded Cyprus and continues to occupy 40 percent of Cyprus territory. Yet, it does not pressure Ankara to have respect for international law, treaties or the UN resolutions. On the contrary, it encourages Ankara's intransigence and thus prevents overcoming the current stalemate in the intercommunal talks. Along with this, sometimes covertly and sometimes overtly, Washington has been striving to entangle the Cyprus problem in the NATO framework and to resolve our problem in a way that would serve its own interests at the expense of our people. For all these reasons we consider the statement by the Cyprus Government representative, who cosigned the agreement with Mr Stone, thanking the U.S. ambassador for his country's policy, as unacceptable.

DEFENSE MINISTER LEAVES ON OFFICIAL VISIT TO ATHENS

SIGNIFICANCE OF HOLDING ISLAMIC CONGRESS IN TFSC STRESSED

TA231158 (Clandestine) Bayrak Radio in Turkish to Cyprus 1030 GMT 23 Mar 80 TA

[Text] The minister of foreign affairs, defense and tourism, Kenan Atakol, said that holding the Eighth General Session of the World Islamic Congress in the Turkish Federated State of Cyprus is very significant from the viewpoint of the federated state and the Turkish Cypriot community. In a statement to the TRT, Atakol recalled that the peace operation had been launched over 6 years ago.

He added: All the efforts exerted by the Greek Cypriot leadership, which avoids meaningful negotiations with the Turkish Cypriot side despite all its good will, are directed toward economically destroying the federated state and preventing its political recognition. The economic genocide policy pursued by the Greek Cypriot leadership since 1974 is a continuation of the genocide policy it pursued against the Turkish Cypriot community between the years 1963 and 1974. The world cannot ignore the fact that the rights of the Turkish Cypriot community have been violated for 16 years.

The world cannot ignore these realities. Therefore, holding the World Islamic Congress meeting in the federated state is very significant and meaningful. The congress proves that brotherly Islamic countries have understood that the Turkish Cypriot community is right, and that it has a right of ownership to Cyprus. I thank all those who have enabled this congress to take place in the federated state, I greet all those who are participating in the congress, and I hope that all the resolutions adopted by the congress will be auspicious to the Islamic world and to humanity.

Resolution May Spur Greek Cypriots

[Text] President Rauf Denktas has expressed the belief that the Greek Cypriots may come to the negotiating table following the World Islamic Congress resolution which was adopted yesterday and which fully supports the Turkish Federated State of Cyprus.

Commenting on the resolution to reporters this morning, President Denktas said it was a strong resolution supporting the Turkish Cypriot community in all areas and befitting Islamic unity and the spirit of Islamic unity. Thanking all the Muslim brothers who played a role in and voted for the resolution, Denktas said: We hope that the same spirit will dominate the conference in Islamabad and that a stronger resolution will facilitate the peaceful settlement of the Cyprus problem.

Denktas pointed out that the primary reason why the Cyprus problem had not been solved through negotiations so far was that the Greek Cypriots considered themselves the Government of Cyprus, that they believed that the Turkish Cypriots were isolated, and that they could never get any support from anyone. He added: I believe that the Greek Cypriots might come to the negotiating table earlier and realistically if they see that the Islamic world supports our partnership rights and status. Consequently, Denktas added, this resolution and other powerful resolutions that support the Turkish Cypriot community facilitate the peaceful settlement of the problem.

FRG FINANCE MINISTER CONCLUDES ATHENS VISIT

[Text] West German Finance Minister Matthoefer who is in Athens today will meet for the second time with Foreign Minister Rallis and at noon he will depart for Saudi Arabia.

Yesterday, the West German minister was received at the political office by Prime Minister Karamanlis. Matthoefer explained to the prime minister the economic situation in Turkey and the reasons for which an effort is being made to financially strengthen this country. The prime minister told Matthoefer that it is necessary not to disturb the balance of military aid that is given by West Germany to Greece and Turkey in such a way as to upset the current correlation of forces between the two countries.

Matthoefer assured Karamanlis that the West German Government is aware of these Greek views and is seriously taking Greek interests into consideration when formulating its policy in this area.

Last night, the West German official attended a dinner that was given by Minister for Coordination Mitsotakis and Foreign Minister Rallis.

Second Meeting With Rallis

[Text] Foreign Minister Rallis was visited this morning by West German Minister of Finance Matthoefer and had a talk with him which lasted almost 1 hour. Matthoefer was accompanied by West German Ambassador in Athens Sigrist and various experts. Secretary General of the Foreign Ministry Theodhoropoulos and the relevant ministry officials participated in the discussion.

Further Details

[Excerpt] Athens--Federal Finance Minister Hans Matthoefer ended his talks with the Greek Government on the Western program of aid for Turkey in Athens this morning and flew on to Riyadh. During the concluding discussion this morning, Matthoefer promised Greek Foreign Minister Yeoryios Rallis that Greece will be kept informed about the progress of the aid program for Turkey. Rallis had given a warning that very substantial aid to Turkey from the West could create the impression in Greece that Turkey is being favored at the expense of Greece. Such an impression has to be avoided, especially since there is a large section of voters who are, in any case, skeptical about strong links between their country and the West.

Matthoefer pointed out that the Federal Republic is having to find the millions of marks for the aid to Turkey in a changed economic and financial situation, and that it has large debts itself. He also gave a reminder that Greece would be one of the net contributors to the EC after its entry into the European Community next year.

KARAMANLIS CONFERS WITH BULGARIAN DEPUTY CHAIRMAN

[Text] Bilateral relations, the situation in the Balkans and international developments were examined by Prime Minister Karamanlis and Bulgarian Deputy Chairman Tanchev who visited him yesterday and handed a friendly message to Karamanlis from Chairman of the People's Republic of Bulgaria Zhivkov.

During the meeting, it was agreed that relations between the two countries be further promoted through the fulfillment of the decisions which were made by Zhivkov and Karamanlis during their meeting in Corfu last April.

COMMENTATOR DHROSOS VIEWS GREEK-YUGOSLAV RELATIONS

[The "Political Issues" column by G.N. Dhrosos: "Relations Between Greece and Yugoslavia"]

[Text] Relations between Greece and Yugoslavia have been excellent not only in the recent past, but in the distant past as well. What is more gratifying is the fact that the leaderships of both countries are doing everything they can to maintain them at a good level. Not only are our neighbor's leading cadres convinced that state interest dictates the maintenance of good relations with Greece, but among the masses--especially the Serbs--there is an innate friendship and sympathy for our country.

The warmth of our relations with our neighbor was capped by the recent visit Karamanlis paid last March. The Greek delegation was received with great cordiality and the discussions which were held covered many issues and were absolutely frank. It should be noted that during those discussions both sides expressed the view that the international situation was fluid.

Another very significant visit was the one that was paid 5 months ago by the then chief of the armed forces, Davos, which took place in an atmosphere of special cordiality and in an obvious effort to publicize it. The well-known issue which casts a shadow in relations between the two countries [the Macedonian question] was diligently ignored, and if some petty manifestations occurred by our neighbor, these were due to the initiatives of the central government in Belgrade [as published].

Regardless of how much good will exists between adjacent countries, petty issues--especially of an economic nature--always crop up between them. This is the case between Greece and Yugoslavia without, however, these outstanding issues being able to disturb the more general relations between the two countries.

For instance, there is a large trade deficit in our balance of payments. The issue of Yugoslav licences to Greek transporters has not been solved. We have asked for complete freedom for Greek trucks and we accepted and promoted the construction of an oil pipeline through which southern Yugoslavia could be linked with northern Greece. The Yugoslavs merely agreed to issue an increased number of transit licences for trucks. They do not accept the viewpoint that an oil pipeline constitutes a means of transportation and consequently that road transport and an oil pipeline are linked.

Common interests between Greece and Yugoslavia undoubtedly dictate the maintenance of good relations. This has always been Marshall Tito's policy and it is inconceivable that any successor or any collective leadership will think otherwise. After all, geography too, that is, the continuation of a neutral and nonalined policy, dictate to Yugoslavia the maintenance of a second outlet to the Western world, in addition to the one through Italy; otherwise it will be almost surrounded by countries of the Eastern bloc.

After all, the well-known issue, which for us is nonexistent, that sometimes casts a shadow over relations between the two countries, would not be put forth by Yugoslavia if the constantly renewed tension with Bulgaria did not exist. Thus the entire issue is stirred up and somehow, inevitably, we are involved. However, these possibly alien instigated stirrings of the issue by Bulgaria are something which could worry us, because it may constitute an effort to keep an issue open so that someday some intervention of one form or another can be justified.

International affairs are very fluid and nobody knows what tomorrow may bring, nor consequently how internal Yugoslav affairs may develop in the distant future. The things we have said are valid for the first post-Tito phase and for some period only. Nobody can be sure about the distant future.

We should not forget how much Yugoslavia's independence cost the Soviet Union in 1948. Nor should we forget how much effort has been exerted since then, one way or another, to have the prodigal son return to the family fold; nor should we forget the reprints by the Soviet press of some articles which are very unpleasant for the Yugoslavs precisely these days; and of course, without Tito Yugoslavia will be less strong than with Tito.

I VRADHINI SCORES 'CRIMINAL POLICY' TOWARD TURKEY

[From the "Evening" column: "A Criminal Policy"]

[Text] As predicted, the OECD countries will give Turkey $1.5 billion to save its economy from catastrophe. Of course, the Americans, through common contributions, tried to guarantee at least $20 billion for their protege, but even the $1.5 billion is a colossal amount.

Nobody wishes Turkey to go bankrupt, since its economic destruction would have painful repercussions beyond Turkey itself. However, we cannot but observe that the responsibility for the situation which has been created among our neighbors is the result of the stupidity and recklessness of Turkish leaders who, instead of occupying themselves with their country's development and progress, have adopted arrogant plans for expansion and have frantically applied themselves to an arms race.

The Americans and the OECD countries rightfully worry about the fate of the Turkish economy. They are rightfully vigilant and they are rightfully seeking contributions to save it. However, a question arises: Why are they not equally interested in occupied Cyprus and in the drama of the 200,000 refugees in the Megalonisos? Had they desired they could have provided a just and reasonable solution to the Cyprus problem in 24 hours by making this just and reasonable solution a prerequisite for the granting of the great economic aid. Had they wanted, but they do not. But is this not a criminal policy?

NO RESULTS IN FURTHER ROUNDS OF VOTING FOR PRESIDENT

TA271620 Ankara Domestic Service in Turkish 1600 GMT 27 Mar 80 TA

Demirel Comment

Demirel said: We do not deserve the reproaches and accusations directed against us. We do not consider them our collocutors. It is unthinkable to allow this most lofty position to be in unworthy hands by saying 'let a president be elected urgently whoever he may be.' We may have to pay the price later. No one can say 'let the elections last as long as they can, let the result be achieved whenever it can.' We cannot be held responsible for the deeds of others. Noting that all parliamentarians will cast their votes freely during the elections and that no one has the right to needlessly pressure others on the issue, Demirel said that Justice Party parliamentarians will not be influenced by anyone. Pointing out that there is no need to panic because a president has not yet been elected, Demirel said everything will proceed in accordance with the rules and regulations. Demirel added that if alliances can be established, then a result can be achieved.

Ecevit Proposes Dialog

[Excerpt] RPP leader Bulent Ecevit has said that his party's parliamentary group was consciously regarding the issue of the election of the president as an important matter of state and the democratic system and not only as a party matter. Speaking at the joint session of his party's Senate and Assembly groups, Ecevit said that the inquiry he conducted the other day among the party group members on the issue of their preference on the election of the president had been very beneficial. Pointing out that he found that there was no final preference on the names of candidates for this post, Ecevit said that he found the members of the groups in an atmosphere of healthy and unbiased searching. Ecevit said that the majority of hte party group members were not willing to commit themselves before the names of those who were thinking of submitting their candidacy for the post of president were definitely and formally known. Ecevit added: Our party group members have expressed their tendency toward converging all their votes in an unbiased way on a candidate--who meets the prerequisites of our party group for this post--for whom the probability of being elected emerges.

Ecevit said that while following a healthy and democratic process and strategy [in the election of the president], tactics should be avoided. Recalling that no party parliamentary group was capable of determining the result of the elections alone, Ecevit said that, therefore, an interparty dialog and cooperation was necessary. Noting that some of the other party parliamentary groups were in an atmosphere of constructive searching, Ecevit said that the Justice Party's refusal to hold a conclusive and fruitful dialog was a factor which impeded and delayed the election of the president. Saying that he did not want to put an early diagnosis on the aims of the Justice Party, Ecevit said his party was waiting with good will to enter the process of a fruitful dialog with this party without much delay.

GREEK PROTEST ON SEA WOLF EXERCISES REJECTED

[Text] Turkey has rejected the Greek protest regarding the "Sea Wolf" exercises held by Turkey in the Aegean some time ago. The Greek ambassador to Ankara presented the verbal protest to the Foreign Ministry Secretariat General yesterday. In its protest, Greece claims that military airplanes entered the Athens FIR [Flight Information Region] area during the Sea Wolf exercises without prior notification. In reply to the Greek protest, Foreign Ministry officials pointed out to the Greek ambassador that, according to regulations of the Civil Aviaition Association, there was no need for prior notification of flight plans for military flights in international airspace. Officials recalled that international airspace was under the sovereignty of no state and added that Turkey rejected Greece's protest on this issue.

LIBYAN MINISTER MEETS WITH OFFICIALS ON TRADE ISSUES

TA261523 Ankara ANATOLIA in English 1450 GMT 26 Mar 80 TA

[Text] Ankara, 26 Mar (AA)--Libya's Economy Minister Abu Zayd 'Umar Durdah, who is currently on an official visit to Turkey, called on Energy and Natural Resources Minister Esat Kiratlioglu and Foreign Minister Hayrettin Erkmen today. Erkmen noted during their interview, Libya and Turkey "complemented" one another from the economic point of view, and it was for their statesmen to put this complementary element into operation. Durdah reiterated the importance Libya attaches to relations with Turkey. He believed if the Islamic world used its potential correctly, it could even affect the world map.

Turkish Exports

The undersecretary of the Turkish Trade Ministry said talks conducted with the Libyan team led by Durdah had been very constructive, with three committees set up on trade, defense, and services including construction. It was agreed in principle, he added, that Turkey should pay for her oil imports from Libya through exports such as meat, cereals, livestock, fresh fruit and vegetables, textiles and clothing, electrical appliances, motor vehicles, and building materials. The Libyan team will stay on for a few more days than planned in Turkey, he announced, to confer with representatives of state enterprises and private firms.

Protocol Signed

[Text] A Turkish-Libyan protocol aimed at developing trade and economic relations between the two countries has been signed in Ankara. The protocol was signed by Minister of State Erkrem Ceyhun on behalf of Turkey and by Libyan Secretary of Economy, [title as heard] Abu Zayd 'Umar Durdah on behalf of the Socialist People's Libyan Arab Jamahiriyah.

In a statement at the signing ceremony, Ceyhun said that with the protocol and the recent Turkish-Libyan talks, relations between the two countries will speedily develop. Durdah expressed the belief that new fields of cooperation in the interests of the two countries as well as of the whole Islamic world will be found in future talks. A TRT correspondent reports that the protocol determines the new principles aimed at speedily implementing the Turkish-Libyan trade agreement signed in 1978.

Foreign Ministry Statement

[Text] It has been announced that all difficulties regarding trade relations between Turkey and Libya have been solved and that an agreement has been reached on the amount of Turkish exports of grains, flour, cattle and meat. The Foreign Ministry Information Directorate General issued a statement in connection with talks being held for 3 days between Turkey and Libya in Ankara. The statement says that trade relations between the two countries were examined in detail during subcommittee meetings and that all the difficulties were eliminated. The statement adds that all subjects regarding trade and economic cooperation between the two countries were included in a protocol and says that an agreement was also reached on the matter of service project offers in favor of the Turkish public enterprises. The statement also notes that an agreement has been reached for the visit of a delegation from the Turkish Chambers Union to Libya during the coming days.

Libyan Minister of Economy [title as heard] Abu Zayd 'Umar Durdah left Ankara today for Istanbul. Durdah and the delegation accompanying him will leave Turkey tomorrow.

FEDERAL FINANCE MINISTER ARRIVES FOR TALKS ON AID

TA272059 Ankara Domestic Service in Turkish 2000 GMT 27 Mar 80 TA

Matthoefer, who arrived in Ankara at 2110, made a statement to the TRT correspondent at the Esenboga Airport. In his statement, Matthoefer said that what was important was not the amount of aid to be extended to Turkey but the conditions under which this aid would be extended. Matthoefer continued: A new date has been fixed for the next OECD meeting. In fact, what is significant in this matter is the economic measures taken by the Turkish Government. What we can do from the outside is only s small contribution to these efforts. During my visit to Greece, no complaints were made on the issue of OECD aid being extended to Turkey. I only briefed the Greek officials on the latest developments on the issue of aid to Turkey.

A TRT correspondent has learned that Matthoefer will begin his official talks tomorrow. During his visit to Greece, the federal finance minister met with Prime Minister Karamanlis and Foreign Minister Rallis. In a statement following his meetings in Athens, Matthoefer said that his country was ready to extend a substantial transitional loan to Turkey. Pointing out that aid by OECD to Turkey could be delayed, Matthoefer called on other Western countries that had promised aid to extend a transitional loan to Turkey.

Matthoefer is expected to meet tomorrow with Prime Minister Demirel, Finance Minister Sezgin as well as the Prime Ministry's under secretary and the deputy under secretary of the State Planning Organization, Turgut Ozal.

FINANCIAL ADVISER RETURNS FROM PARIS OECD MEETING

[Excerpt] The Prime Ministry under secretary and deputy under secretary of the State Planning Organization, Turgut Ozal, has said that the commitment meeting held within the framework of the OECD was postponed due to the fact that some countries had not been able to complete their technical preparations and due to some steps taken to improve aid to be extended to Turkey. The Turkish delegation under the chairmanship of Ozal, which participated in the OECD commitment meeting held in Paris yesterday, returned home today.

In a statement at Ankara's Esenboga Airport, Ozal said that Japan, Canada, Sweden and Switzerland had failed to determine the amount of aid to Turkey due to some technical reasons. Ozal added that all OECD countries agreed to announce in a new commitment meeting to be held on 15 April the definite amount of aid to be extended to Turkey. Ozal said that work was being done to increase the amount of aid to Turkey by countries which had already announced their aid to Turkey. Ozal said that the amount of economic aid to be extended to Turkey during the current year would be more than $1 billion and that OECD countries had agreed for this aid to be granted under suitable conditions.

Ozal explained that the issue of the postponement of Turkey's foreign debts was also discussed during the OECD meeting. Ozal pointed out that the OECD countries had reached a common approach for the realization of a long-range postponement of Turkey's foreign debts. Ozal added that a decision was reached for the issue of the postponement of Turkey's foreign debts to be discussed during a meeting to be held in the middle of May.

Ozal then replied to questions by reporters. In reply to a question, Ozal said that steps were being taken to improve conditions of the proposed OECD aid and to create the possibilities for a new transitional loan. Recalling that the world was facing more difficult economic problems than last year, Ozal said that, nevertheless, he was convinced that a definite decision would be reached during the OECD meeting to be held on 15 April and that the conditions under which this loan would be extended would be beter than those of last year. Answering another question, Ozal said that Turkey had accomplished a transfer of $1.3 billion [to pay foreign debts] from 25 January 1979, when the new economic measures were announced, to 19 March 1980.

NSP Deputy Comment

[Text] National Salvation Party deputy leader Sevket Kazan said that the West was not ready to extend loans to the Demirel government until the presidential elections are held and the aftermath of the elections are in sight. In a statement made in Ankara today, Kazan noted that the OECD meeting held in Paris regarding urgent economic aid to be extended to Turkey was postponed until 15 April in its first session.

Kazan continued: What is regretful is that the Turkish delegation which went to Paris with such expense was not even allowed into the meeting. Meanwhile, the Federal Finance Minister Matthoefer charged with coordinating international financial aid to Turkey stopped in Athens again on his way to Saudi Arabia. Matthoefer's visit to Turkey 1 month ago corresponded with the lifting of NOTAM 714 when he proceeded to Greece. What concessions are to be expected following his next visit to Turkey? Kazan said that all this proved how the government drifted away from an independent foreign policy for the sake of a loan of a few dollars.

KREISKY VISIT TO BELGRADE DETAILED

AU261446 Vienne DIE PRESSE in German 26 Mar 80 p 1 AU

[Text] Chancellor Kreisky will pay his visit, announced earlier, to Yugoslavia right after Easter, in the period 8-10 April, as was learned on Tuesday [25 March]. He will be accompanied by the governors of Carinthia and Styria. Thus it is safe to assume that border region cooperation and minority problems will be primary topics to be discussed. Kreisky and SFRY Premier Djuranovic met last November on the occasion of the laying of the foundation stone for the Karawanken road tunnel project. The last visit to Yugoslavia by an Austrian chancellor--Chancellor Klaus--was 15 years ago.

U.S. ARMS DEALERS 'LOBBYING INTENSIVELY' AGAINST RAPIER

LD251323 London THE DAILY TELEGRAPH in English 25 Mar 80 p 5 LD

[Report by defense correspondent Clare Hollingworth: "U.S. Firms Resist Rapier"]

[Text] American arms manufacturers are lobbying intensively to prevent the purchase of Britain's Rapier surface-to-air missile for the defence of seven United States air bases in Britain. The issue has become a test of the validity of NATO's "two-way street" doctrine.

American ministers and officials have paid lip service to the doctrine under which the United States would buy in Western Europe to counter the big contracts European nations have with American arms producers. So far few European weapons have been purchased by the United States.

Long before the American manufacturers opened their campaign against the Rapier, a vital disagreement arose between the American Army and Air Force on "roles and missions."

The American defence secretary, Mr Harold Brown had issued an instruction that the Rapier could be purchased but the order was never placed. Neither the army nor the air force would agree to fund or man the missiles.

No Response

In an effort to break the deadlock, Mr Geoffrey Pattie, British defence under secretary with responsibility for the RAF, suggested last October that Rapiers bought by the United States could be manned by the RAF regiment. But so far no firm response has been received to this proposal.

The United States would pay for the manning of the missiles through some form of offset agreement linked to one of the many British purchases or facilities in the United States.

The deployment of Rapiers around American air bases would strengthen the defence of Britain.

EEC POSTPONES SUMMIT WITH CEMA; HARDENING POSITION SEEN

LD291714 Brussels in French to Africa 1600 GMT 29 Mar 80 LD

[Summary] In a letter addressed to Mr Fadeyev, CEMA secretary general, Mr Wilheilm Haferkamp, EEC commissioner for foreign relations, has stated that the Community does not judge it advisable for the moment to hold a summit meeting between the two bodies. Although Mr Haferkamp links this decision with the lack of progress during the meeting of experts in Geneva in March, it is being said in EEC circles in Brussels that the posponement of the summit marks a hardening of the EEC position as a result of the Soviet intervention in Afghanistan.

PROGRESS REPORTED IN ROMANIAN-EEC COOPERATION TALKS

[Text] Brussels, March 28 (ANSA)--The latest session of talks between the European Economic Community (EEC) and Romania achieved good progress towards a bilateral agreement covering industrial goods, reliable sources said here today. The talks concluded yesterday and, according to the sources, made important steps ahead, especially towards defining the conditions for the access of Romanian products to the nine. The same sources said that the next round of talks, which may well be the decisive ones, should be held in this capital during May. An EEC spokesman recalled that the EEC-Romanian understanding signed on February 8 for the formation of a joint commission would only take practical effect when the negotiations are concluded.

The commission's tasks will include following the development of bilateral economic relations and checking out the application of the agreement on industrial trade. According to diplomatic sources, the EEC-Romanian negotiations form an important precedent for relations between the Nine and the state-controlled economies grouped in COMECON, the EEC's East European counterpart.

FRANCOIS-PONCET, THORN HOLD TALKS ON EEC PROBLEMS

[Unattributed report: "Talks Held in Luxembourg between Jean Francois-Poncet and Gaston Thorn on European Affairs"]

[Text] The French foreign minister and Mrs Francois-Poncet spent the evening of Saturday 22 March with the Luxembourg foreign minister and Mrs Thorn at the Chateau of Sennigen in the Grand Duchy. The discussions held covered all aspects of Community difficulties, particularly the British budget claims. The French and Luxembourg points of view have always been quite close. Paris and Luxembourg are in agreement that the status quo of the European Parliament seats should not be made an issue.

An exchange of views took place on Afghanistan and Iran. (There are those in the Community who look forward happily to a break in relations with Tehran, but the French Government supports the idea of great caution). The only problem between France and Luxembourg is that of the French project to expand the Cattenon nuclear center near the border with the Grand Duchy. A demonstration was staged by ecologists on Saturday outside the Chateau of Sennigen. Mr Thorn is in no way an opponent of nuclear energy, and during the next few days the Luxembourg Government will examine new French proposals to harmonize the two countries' interests as affected by the Cattenon development project.

SCHMIDT WRITES TO BANI-SADR URGING RELEASE OF HOSTAGES

[Text] Bonn--Federal Chancellor Helmut Schmidt has appealed for the release of the American hostages held in the U.S. Embassy in Tehran. Government spokesman Armin Gruenewald said today that Schmidt had written to Iranian President Abolhasan Bani-Sadr, appealing to him to exhaust all possibilities to free the hostages. Gruenewald added that German Ambassador in Tehran Ritzel had handed Schmidt's letter to the Iranian president.

KHOMEYNI AIDE REPORTEDLY TALKS WITH FRG OFFICIALS

DW311010 Hamburg BILD in German 29 Mar 80 p 1,2 DW

[Wolfgang Osinski interview with the "Spokesman of Ayatollah Khomeyni," Dr Muhammad Sadeq Tabatabai: "Iran Wants New Power Stations From Us"]

[Text] Essen, 29 March--BILD: Dr Tabatabai, the shah is now in Egypt. Does that change the situation of the hostages?

Dr Tabatabai: It does not. Yet President Bani-Sadr told me over the telephone today that the second round of the parliamentary elections will be delayed by at least 4 weeks--because of the alleged election manipulations. Only after the elections can the situation in the U.S. Embassy be discussed.

BILD: How will Iran's relations with the Federal Republic develop?

Dr Tabatabai: We already have from the Federal Republic the promise that we will import agricultural machinery and technology instead of the five submarines. The KWU [Kraftwerksunion] Corporation will build some more power stations in our country, though no nuclear power stations.

BILD: How do you assess the Soviet assault on Afghanistan?

Dr Tabatabai: What the Soviets are doing is regular mass murder. Friday, 2 weeks ago, at least 12,000 people reportedly were killed by Soviet helicopters. The rebel movement is regarded by us as a pure liberation movement. We are in a position to grant them any aid they need.

BILD: Why are you in Germany?

Dr Tabatabai: My wife studied pedagogics in Bochum. We are now moving to Tehran. Besides, I talked with Foreign Minister Genscher about the situation at the next OPEC conference and about the U.S. citizens in Tehran. I had other talks with the SPD politicians Wischnewski and Ehmke.

GENSCHER COMMENTS ON SOVIET ARMS, OLYMPIC BOYCOTT

[Text] Bonn--Federal Foreign Minister Hans-Dietrich Genscher has again contradicted SPD floor leader Herbert Wehner's opinion on the defensive nature of Soviet arms.

In a WDR [West German Radio] interview today, Genscher stated that arming which exceeds the amount required for one's own defense and which aims at superiority is in no way defensive. Genscher said that he was not accusing the Soviet leaders of wanting to attack the Federal Republic, but a violation of the state of equilibrium and striving for supremacy always has automatic psychological effects which are not defensive. They lead to the expectation that others will submit or lead to destablization. "Neither of these can be in our interests, and therefore we want equilibrium." Asked about a possible boycott of the Olympics, Genscher said that the Soviet Union, through the withdrawal of its troops from Afghanistan, had to create the conditions for teams from all countries to take part in the Moscow Olympics. He opposed application of the term "boycott" to the Western side, because it is the games, which ought to be called games of peace, that are being boycotted by those who want to be "both hosts of the games and occupiers of another country."

UK-FRG Talks on EC Viewed

[Text] Bonn--Federal Foreign Minister Hans-Dietrich Genscher has said with reference to the EC problems discussed at Chequers that the EC is facing an acid test of its ability to act and agree. Genscher, who accompanied Federal Chancellor Helmut Schmidt at the discussions with British Prime Minister Margaret Thatcher, said in an interview for West German Radio today that his impression is that the British Government is as interested in a fair compromise of the financial problems as the Federal Government, is. That also applies to the French Government. He believes that part of this compromise consists of attempts to settle different questions jointly. It is not simply a question of the British contribution to the Community, but also of the disputed fisheries issue. In this connection a certain understanding on energy policy also must be reached. Agricultural problems, which the French have, are also part of this.

In an interview for "WELT AM SONNTAG," Genscher has said that the London talks had shown that the Federal Government and the British Government agreed in their assessment of the main world political porblems. The British Government was making a serious effort to solve the Community's current problems in a constructive way. Genscher said that he did not have the slightest doubt that the sense of European responsibility of all member states would overcome the present situation and that agreement would be reached. All member states were aware of what the Soviet intervention in Afghanistan meant for all of them and that "from this we all are obliged to constructively solve the problems in our own house."

MATTHOEFER RETURNS AFTER TALKS IN TURKEY

[Excerpt] Bonn-Federal Finance Minister Hans Matthoefer, who has ended his talks with the Turkish Government on the new aid program, returned to the Federal Republic today. In Ankara, Matthoefer, who is in charge of the OECD countries' second aid operation, discussed further steps for restoring the NATO partner's economy to a sound footing. He talked with Prime Minister Demiral, Finance Minister Ismet Sezgin, and Turgut Ozal, the government official in charge of the aid program. Today Matthoefer had a talk with the leader of the Turkish Social Democratic opposition, Bulent Ecevit. While official sources expressed appreciation of the new Western aid program, the press expressed strong criticism that, in contrast to original expectations, not all the OECD countries had immediately joined in the aid program with specifically detailed promises. According to Matthoefer, Turkey can count on aid of $3.1 billion, which is necessary to offset the balance of payments deficit this year.

GAULLIST PARLIAMENTARIANS CRITICIZE GISCARD MIDEAST POLICY

NC281833 Paris AFP in English 1807 GMT 28 Mar 80 NC

[Text] Saint-Raphael, South France, March 28 (AFP)--President Valery Giscard d'Estaing's recent policy line on the Middle East was criticized here today at a meeting of Gaullist members of Parliament. On a recent tour of Arab countries, the president came out for a homeland for the Palestinians and asked that Yasir 'Arafat's Palestinian Liberation Organization be associated in any Mideast negotiation.

The Gaullist Party's chief spokesman on international affairs, Jean de Lipkowski, said he was not taking issue with Mr. Giscard d'Estaing's position as such which he said was "right"--France's pro-Arab policy was actually inaugurated by General de Gaulle himself--but with its timing. Mr. de Lipkowski, a former state secretary for foreign affairs, explained that "by proclaiming the Palestinians' right to self-determination, the French chief of state gave the impression he was disavowing the Egyptian president," Anwar as-Sadat. "We have not the right," Mr. de Lipkowski went on, "to condemn a man's action when he had the courage to risk his life in the search for peace. Before condemning the Camp David agreements, one should read them with care."

The Gaullists are allied with Mr. Giscard d'Estaing's coalition of liberals and conservatives in the government, but 13 months ahead of the next presidential elections in which they will run their own candidate, Gaullist dissatisfaction with presidential policies has been steadily mounting. The elections dominated the Gaullist meeting here, a fact that was dramatized yesterday when former Premier Michel Debre, 68, a possible candidate, walked out after Claude Labbe, chief of the Gaullists' parliamentary group, declared the man to be picked was Jacques Chirac, the 48-year-old party chief and mayor of Paris.

GISCARD ADDRESSES FOREIGN ENVOYS AT CREDENTIALS CEREMONY

LD281431 [Editorial Report LD] Paris LE MONDE in French on 22 March carries on page 10 a 500-word report on the presentation of credentials to President Giscard d'Estaing in Paris on 20 March by the ambassadors of Lebanon, Malaysia, Rwanda and Paraguay. Replying to Mr Butrus-Dib, the new Lebanese ambassador, Mr Giscard d'Estaing said that the "necessary" solution of the Lebanese crisis could only come with a settlement of "the Middle East problem, in its entirety." Mr Giscard d'Estaing asserted that a "lasting" settlement must be based on the recognition of the right of "the Palestinian people to determine their own destiny." Replying to the Malaysian ambassador, Mr Abdul Rahman Bin Abdul Jalal, President Giscard d'Estaing said that the 7 March economic and trade agreement between the EEC and the Association of South East Asian Nations showed their "shared will to strengthen relations between these two communities." He also commented on France's "real emotion" over the "distressing" Vietnamese refugee problem. To Mr Tharcisse Nyandwi, the Rwandan ambassador, Mr Giscard d'Estaing emphasized that French-Rwandan relations were "drawing continually closer." Mr Giscard d'Estaing stated to the Paraguayan ambassador, Mr Jorge Hamuy, that France was prepared to assist in the industrialization of Paraguay.

LE MONDE: PARIS IN 'IMPOSSIBLE SITUATION' IN CHAD

[J.-C.P. article: "A Dilemma for Paris"]

[Text] The growing tension which had prevailed in Ndjamena for several weeks has led to an armed confrontation which, once again, only French mediation has been able to stop. For how long? The 21 August Lagos agreements evantually--3 months later after laborious negotiations--made it possible to unite the 11 signatory "factions" in a "government of national union," chaired by Mr Oueddei.

This precarious balance in an apparently ungovernable country whose strategic position is coveted by many people has now been broken, notably by Mr Hissein Habre's growing influence. Habre's supporters last week attacked their Common Action Front [CAF] adversaries in two areas in the center of the country--Bokoro and Mongo. Moreover, on this occasion the three CAF representatives in the government, who seem to enjoy Tripoli's support, threatened to withdraw from the Cabinet if Mr Goukouni Oueddei "fails to assume his responsibilities" by calling Mr Hissein Habre to order.

The French, who are accused by the CAF of supporting Habre, deny the allegation and claim to observe the strictest neutrality among the existing "factions". Nonetheless, having failed to withdraw in time, Paris is once again in the middle of an impossible situation. In the present tense situation a French withdrawal would probably lead to the de facto break up of Chad and would be interpreted as an "abandonment" by certain African states. Maintaining French elements in Chad while forbidding them to intervene places them in an untenable situation without helping to solve an insoluble problem.

PCF DEPUTIES CALL FOR OLYMPICS PARTICIPATION, HIT GISCARD STANCE

[Unattributed report: "France Must Participate in the Olympic Games"]

[Text] The PCF national deputies meeting in Le Havre yesterday approved the following statement:

"According to certain reports, the French Government is preparing to boycott the Olympic games. The PCF national deputies express their indignation and absolute opposition to such a decision.

"At the present time the Olympic games provide an unequalled framework for high-level sport, for the achievement of great performances and for propaganda for sport throughout the world. They are a great and peaceful festival of youth and friendship between peoples.

"Hence the justifiable attachment of the athletes and their representative organizations to the games, and their attachment to the fact that the athletes' participation is their responsibility alone. This deep attachment to their liberty and rights was forcefully expressed by the athletes and their organizations when, with the support of international public opinion, they rejected Carter's intolerable pretention using them as hostages in his electoral and political operations.

"Until now the French Government seemed aware of this just demand. Now it appears that, by not adopting a stance, the Giscard government was merely seeking to gain time and to disarm the sporting movement's vigilant action so as to submit more easily--at the last moment--to the dictates of Carter and Schmidt.

"The PCF national deputies stand firm against any move by the president of the republic or by the government to impose on the athletes and the National Olympic Committee any decision contrary to their clearly stated choice: participation in the Olympic games. They demand the Giscard government's commitment, without restriction or prior condition, to leave the French National Sports and Olympic Committee and the athletes free to apply their choice, as well as its abstention from any overt or hidden pressure.

"France must participate in the Olympic games. This is in the interest of sport, in the interest of our country's youth and of peace."

MARCHAIS VOICES RESERVATIONS ABOUT BERLINGUER-MITTERRAND TALK

LD280957 Paris L'HUMANITE in French 26 Mar 80 p 5 LD

[Unattributed report: "The French People Are Not Taken In by the Machination Against the PCF"]

[Excerpts] Georges Marchais took part in French television Channel 1's 1300 hours news program direct from Le Havre yesterday. He was interviewed by Patrick de Carolis and Yves Mourousi.

Patrick de Carolis: You say that the right and the Socialist Party [PS] want to be rid of you. Do you think that the almost secret meeting which Francois Mitterrand had with Enrico Berlinguer is part of this PS strategy?

[Answer] I have no comment to make on the principle of such a meeting between Francois Mitterrand and Berlinguer. Not on the principle. However, I think this meeting was inopportune. In view of the current situation in our country I would not have agreed to such a meeting.

I would not have done it at a time when the PCF and its secretary general are the targets of a violent campaign whose objective is to weaken our party. Nor would I have agreed to hold such a meeting in Strasbourg at the very time when not only the immediate fate but the future of French peasants are being discussed.

Nonetheless I understand why this meeting took place.

I repeat that, in principle, I have nothing against it. Nonetheless it is true that there are broad areas of agreement between the PCI and the PS. Both support austerity--we are against it. Both are in favor of expanding the EEC to Greece, Portugal and Spain --we are against it in the interests of the peasants and our nation. Both are in favor of giving the EEC supranational rights--we are opposed to that.

I would like to mention another factor which, I believe, was Francois Mitterrand's objective in this meeting. Fundamentally he went to ask Enrico Berlinguer's support for his policy of alliance with the right. You probably remember that, for a time, Francois Mitterrand criticized the PCI's "historical compromise" policy--in other words seeking an alliance with the Christian Democratic Party. That policy may be conceivable in Italy but it is not valid for France. What France needs is a leftwing union: Well! Since Francois Miterrand has abandoned the leftwing union and is now preparing to rally to the right--in other words to a Giscard-Chirac-PS coalition for implementing an antisocial, antidemocratic and antinational policy--he probably thought it was a good idea to seek some kind of support from Enrico Berlinguer. Let us say that Francois Mitterrand will now walk under the historical compromise umbrella....

Circumstances 'Ill-Chosen'

[Unattributed report: "Georges Marchais Statement on the Enrico Berlinguer-Francois Mitterrand Meeting"]

[Text] Questioned yesterday in Le Havre--where he is participating in the PCF national deputies' meeting--on the Strasbourg meeting between Enrico Berlinguer and Francois Mitterrand, Georges Marchais stated:

"Clearly, I have no observations to make on the princple of the matter. On the other hand, we believe that the time and the place are ill-chosen.

"Moreover, as our recent Central Committee session emphasized, our party and its secretary general are the victims of a political plot in which Francois Mitterrand is participating directly alongside the reactionary forces of Giscard and Chirac whose clearly stated aim is to weaken the PCF. So far they have not succeeded. Their whole effort is now aimed at the presential elections, hence their desperate attack on the PCF and its presumed candidate.

"I should add that by throwing all our forces into the battle to defeat this plot we are struggling fundamentally against the degradation of political morals, and Italy's example shows clearly how far the degradation can go.

"It is, moreover, regrettable that Enrico Berlinguer and Francois Mitterrand chose Strasbourg for their meeting. Taking place there now is an extraordinary session of the EC assembly where a reactionary and socialist majority is preparing to strike a new and very severe blow against the French peasantry and agriculture. It is quite true that the French peasants will be demonstrating their firm opposition to this pernicious plan tomorrow. I am aware that the French Socialist Party and the PCI have clear convergences of view on the European agricultural policy and the enlargement of the Community to include Greece, Portugal and Spain, whereas we, the PCF, stand firmly by our peasants in their struggle for their demands and for the defense of our agriculture.

"I believe that it would be advisable for our Italian comrades to bear in mind the situation's dual aspect."

PCF CENTRAL COMMITTEE SCORES 'SLANDERS' ON MARCHAIS' PAST

[Apparent text of PCF Central Committee resolution published in Ivry on 19 March 1980: "The Struggle for Truth in All Spheres Is Revolutionary"]

[Text] The Central Committee analyzed the odious, libelous campaign against Party Secretary General Georges Marchais. It expresses its indignation at the baseness of the methods used to try and attack a man's honor and serve petty political interests. It assures Georges Marchais of its fraternal and warm sentiments of complete solidarity. It approves the energetic action taken by the Politburo and by the secretary general himself to assert the truth and it welcomes the fact that this has led to the rapid collapse of this slander.

The Central Committee draws the attention of Communists and of all workers and democrats to the nature and objectives of this machination.

Indeed this machination had assumed considerable dimensions both by the violence of the accusations made in the face of all the facts and without any shadow of proof, by the ignominy of the lies, the bitterness of its instigators and the scope and convergence of the means used.

The scope of this enterprise shows the size of the political stake and the present conditions of the class struggle.

Faced with the deep crisis affecting its system capital needs to further strengthen its policy of austerity, unemployment, attacks on freedom and human rights and of national resignation.

In view of popular discontent and the will for change it can only do this and maintain its power by obtaining new support--by obtaining in some form or another the Socialist Party's [PS] direct cooperation in the implementation of its policy.

To attain this goal it must weaken the party which is paralyzing this harmful enterprise, which is defending the workers and the nation and which is fighting for the union, for change and for socialism--the PCF. The right and the PS have been pursuing this objective for many years, especially since 1974--in vain. They failed to succeed in 1978 and in the past 2 years.

However, the presidential election is approaching. This election will highlight the balance of political forces which will exercise a very important influence on the latter course of the struggle. It is therefore essential for the right and for the PS to create on this occasion the conditions which will enable them to attain their objective. For them there is no question of quietly awaiting the election or even the selection of candidates and the start of the campaign. They must now use all the means they have to create the situation most favorable to them whatever the cost. That is why they are now launching an exceptionally broad attack on the PCF and on the man who is regarded as that party's most likely candidate: Georges Marchais.

The Central Committee notes that the other three major political parties are taking part in this anticommunist plot. It observes the curious division of tasks among those who have taken the PCF secretary general as their target.

Giscard d'Estaing and Chirac--who have had documents and evidence establishing the truth for 10 years--have allowed the slander to go ahead. They have even encouraged it in particular by giving free reign to lies, distortion, and aggressiveness on radio and television. In view of the slanderers' failure they are now trying to clear themselves while attempting to prepare the ground for new maneuvers.

The Socialist leaders are fully involved in the operation while covering themselves with a few hypocritical statements. PS press organs or those associated with the PS are taking part and even spearheading the campaign. The official PS publication has made insinuations about Georges Marchais' past and thinks that the forthcoming presidential election "fully justifies the journalists' curiosity." LE NOUVEL OBSERVATEUR, LE MONDE and LE MATIN are now laboriously producing unlikely suggestions to back the old lie of the PCF's and its secondary general's owing "allegiance to Moscow."

At the same time the French Democratic Confederation of Labor leaders are reverting to outrageous procedures which we had hoped were a thing of the past in the workers movement, and are using a local episode to mount a sensationalist anticommunist operation. Worse still, they are calling for the bourgeois state's repression against the Communists. Meanwhile, the employers are stepping up authoritarian action and sanctions against Communist militants in enterprises and against trade unions which adopt a struggling position. [apparent line drop]--show that the leaders of this party are feverishly seeking a way out of the blind alley into which this line has led them at any price.

In face of the difficulties which the anticommunist machination is encouraging, a new maneuver is now being tried: It is aimed at giving credence to the idea of solidarity among the so-called "political class." The Central Committee disdainfully rejects this ridiculous idea. The Communists have never had and never will have anything in common with exploiters and their political henchmen. The working class party is a different party, completely alien to intrigues, scandals, ambitions, surrender, blackmail and the cynicism of petty political intrigues.

Do not therefore count on the Communists to apply the law of silence! On the contrary. All major politicians should explain their actions during World War II and the colonial wars. All those who associated with Bokassa and those who benefitted from his activities should explain themselves. All politicians should publish their true incomes and inheritances. All political parties and press organs should agree to have their accounts and the sources of their financing checked out.

The struggle for truth in all spheres is revolutionary. Lies and slander reflect the degrading nature of the system based on money, exploitation, inequality, injustice and oppression. These defects have grown worse since Giscard's government came to power. Giscard d'Estaing is attacking all forms of democratic life proper to France--Parliament's power, the commune's power, the media, and party and trade union prerogatives. He encourages centralization, authoritarianism, secrecy and personal power. Under his system hidden pressures, string-pulling, corruption and scandals hold political life to ransom.

At the same time, Giscard d'Estaing is trying to use this situation, for which he is responsible, to sicken the people's masses with, and alienate them from, politics. He would like to make them passive and use this as a means for obtaining the consensus he is seeking.

The Communists are therefore struggling more than ever for a different view of politics, based on growing participation by workers and citizens in debates and struggles for social justice, progress and democracy.

The Central Committee is determined to do all it can to insure that the machination rebounds on its perpetrators, its instigators and all those who hope to benefit from it.

Expressions of indignation at the lies and messages of sympathy and support for Georges Marchais are arriving in the thousands each day. They come from Communists and many other big-hearted men and women who care about honesty and decency.

The Central Committee confidently calls on Communists to extend the counterattack and defeat the current petty political operation. It urges them to step up their struggles together with the people's masses in all spheres: for living standards and jobs; against inequality; for workers' rights, freedom and democracy; for peace and national independence. It calls on them to vigorously repel the ideological war being waged by capital's forces.

It calls on the workers to give the PCF the political support it needs to win this battle. It urges them to join the party in large numbers and to read L'HUMANITE and L'HUMANITE DIMANCHE.

TOULOUSE POLICE STATION DESTROYED BY BOMB

LD300729 Paris Domestic Service in French 0700 GMT 30 Mar 80 LD

[Text] There was an attack carried out in Toulouse last night. Our permanent correspondent, (Jean-Noel Deleage), reports that a police station was literally blown to pieces by an explosion on Rue Saint-Leon, at 0500 this morning, just opposite Saint-Michel Prison. Nobody was hurt, but damage is extensive. Police found on a wall the set of initials of the Direct Action Organization, which has already claimed the machinegunning of offices of the Ministry of Cooperation in Paris a few days ago.

BERLINGUER EXPRESSES SUPPORT FOR POLISARIO AT ROME RALLY

[Giorgio] Migliardi report: "Italian Communists With Saharan People"]

[Text] Rome--A warm demonstration of internationalist solidarity welcomed to Rome yesterday the leaders of the POLISARIO Front, the representatives of a people, the Saharan people, who are struggling to end a long period of colonial domination through the recovery of their national sovereignty and the winning of independence. The Rome rally, presided over by Comrade Enrico Berlinguer, follows similar rallies in Paris in November and in Madrid in January, organized at the initiative of the PCE, PCF and PCI.

Opening the rally, Berlinguer explained its objectives: "Our aim," he said, "is to provide the working masses, the young people and the democratic forces of our three countries and the whole of Western Europe with a more thorough acquaintance with the conditions under which the POLISARIO Front's just battle is being waged, to promote stronger and broader popular solidarity in support of the front, and to demand from the governments the recognition of the Saharan Democratic Arab Republic and the establishment of relations with the POLISARIO Front."

Political commitment and specific action in support of peoples fighting for their independence, Berlinguer said, are deep-rooted in the internationalist awareness of Communist Party members. They are now an essential part of our struggle to defend peace and for new positive relations between the West European peoples and countries and the Third World countries.

Having pointed to the major victory gained a few days ago by the Zimbabwe people, and to the Palestinian people's struggle for their own homeland and state, Berlinguer appealed to the workers and all democratic workers for solidarity with the Saharan people for their self-determination and independence.

Berlinguer invoked the grave dangers to peace deriving from the continuation of the Moroccan aggression against the Saharan people. "The support granted to Morocco by governments such as the French and U.S. governments," he said, "threaten to provoke a conflict of graver proportions in an area, northwest Africa, which is close to the Mediterranean, to Italy and to Europe." "Partly for this reason," he concluded, "to ward off the threat to peace--apart from reasons of justice--we consider it necessary to work and we also urge Italy to work, for a peaceful solution based on the recognition of the Saharan people's right to self-determination and to establish positive relations with the POLISARIO Front."

Next Berlinguer gave the floor to PCE representative Manuel Azcarate and PCF representative Maxime Gremetz, leaders of their respective parties' international relations sections.

Azcarate pointed to "Spain's special responsibility" for the tragic events in the western Sahara. This responsibility dates back to the Spanish colonization of this territory, and particularly to the Madrid November 1975 accords, which constituted an open betrayal (there are no other words to describe it, he said,) of all the promises solemnly made by Spain to the Saharan people with regard to their independence. With the Madrid accords, which the Spanish democratic forces consider null and void, Spain in fact sentenced the country to another colonization, under Morocco and Mauritania.

Maxime Gremetz stressed imperialism's new aggressiveness in the region and the special "gendarme" role being played by the French Government in Africa. He confirmed the support of all French democrats for the Saharan people's liberation struggle.

The statement "A people small in number, but great in their desire for independence!" was welcomed by a great burst of applause. This is how POLISARIO representative Sadik Malainin described the Saharan people's commitment to struggle and the recent military and political successes achieved by the front. On the military plane, Malainin pointed out, Morocco has suffered grave setbacks on its own territory (most recently last week, when the crack Moroccan troops were routed in the south), while on the international plane the Rabat government has never been so isolated. The POLISARIO Front, he said, now controls 95 percent of national territory and has been officially recognized by the OAU and the United Nations as the Saharan people's sole legitimate representative.

"The war which King Hassan II is waging against us," Malainin said, "is not the war of the Moroccan people--still less of that country's workers." Next he appealed to Morocco to abandon its policy of aggression and blind stubbornness before it is too late, and to negotiate a solution of just and lasting peace with the POLISARIO Front.

Comrade Gian Carlo Pajetta closed the rally. He pointed to the long and stormy road which Europe too has travelled in the formation of its nations and national states and the contradictions which have occurred in this process, even within the workers movement. It is not surprising if these contradictions are emerging again today in the new liberation struggles in the Third World.

In the POLISARIO fighters, Pajetta said, we salute today the new protagonists of decolonization, at a time when the problems of social and national liberation are closely linked. We are hoping, he said, for a peaceful negotiated solution on the basis which the OAU itself indicates as the only possible one for avoiding further grave crises, namely the recognition of the borders inherited from colonialism. Then, he added, the quest for new forms of association and unity will still be possible, but within the framework of peace and democratic coexistence among the peoples.

"We are," Pajetta pointed out, "in favor of freedom for all nations, all countries, without outside interference--a need which we recently asserted in an unequivocal manner."

LOWER HOUSE SPEAKER JOTTI RECEIVES BULGARIA'S TANCHEV

[Text] Rome--Lower house speaker Nilde Jotti yesterday morning received a courtesy call at Montecitorio [Chamber of Deputies] from Petur Tanchev, first deputy chairman of the Bulgarian State Council and secretary of the Bulgarian National Agrarian Union, who is on a working visit to our country. Mr Tanchev delivered an official invitation to Speaker Jotti to visit Bulgaria and announced that a similar invitation will be made to an Italian parliamentary delegation within the framework of intensifying relations between the two countries' legislative assemblies.

ACTIONS AGAINST TERRORISTS UNDERTAKEN IN FRANCE, GENOA

[Text] (ANSA) Paris, March 31--French authorities have dashed hopes that Mario Moretti, considered one of the leaders of the Italian terrorism, was nabbed by French police. A Moretti was picked up in Marseilles over the weekend on charges unrelated to terrorism, but he proved to have nothing to do with the man who leads the Rome branch of the Red Brigades terrorist organization.

On Friday French police arrested 4 Red Brigadists in Toulon. The quartet are believed to have been involved in the 1978 kidnapping and assassination of former Italian Premier Aldo Moro and the slaughter of his 5-man escort. The four are Franco Pinna (28 years old), Enrico Bianco (28, his wife Oriana (28) and a man identified only as F. Amadori, apparently of French origin. Police have also nabbed another Italian terrorist suspect, 23-year old Olga Girotto, in Paris.

During a lightning operation Friday, Italian police swept down on a reputed Red Brigades hide-out in Genoa killing all four persons on the premises. Police task forces also uncovered five other presumed urban guerrilla bases in the northern region of Piedmont, near the French border The proximity between Genoa and Toulon seemed to indicate some sort of operational link between the two sites.

The terrorists arrested in France are accused of the armed robbery of 4 million dollars in miners' funds. Justice Minister Roger Peyrefitte voiced the hope that they, along with French members of the extremist "Action Directe" group, would be brought to trial before the tribunal for state security.

Meanwhile, Italian police were still trying to identify the fourth person killed in their Genoa raid Friday. Three of the victims were known to be Anna Maria Ludmann, the owner of the apartment, Pietro Panciarelli and Lorenzo Betassa. For a while, the fourth victim was thought to be Luca Bertolotti, but police were able to rule this out Sunday.

The investigation was rocked yesterday when the Red Brigades sent a leaflet to the ANSA office in Genoa which stated that the 4 comrades slaughtered by the regime's hired assassins "were members of the strategic leadership of our organization". The leaflet identified them as "Roberto" the sailor, "Pasquale", a worker at the Lancia factory in Chivasso, "Antonio" the FIAT worker and "Cecilia". Police thought that the "Roberto" mentioned might be Lorenzo Bettassa who used to work for the Italsider steel mill in Genoa. "Pasquale" apparently was Panciarelli while "Cecilia" was probably Anna Maria Ludmann. The identity of "Antonio" remains a mystery. The Brigadist leaflet also warned that "nothing will go unpunished".

Meanwhile it was confirmed that police found the names of over 5,000 persons: magistrates, police, businessmen, doctors, journalists, politicians and state and local officials in the Genoa hide-out. There was so much material that police said it would take at least four months to fully examine it. They also found copies of all Red Brigades leaflets from the time of the 1976 kidnapping of Judge Mario Sossi until the present time.

RED BRIGADES THOUGHT TO ATTACK ARMY BARRACKS

[Text] (ANSA) Padua, March 31--A non-commissioned army officer was wounded Sunday in an attack on military barracks in Padua. Six or seven men broke into the building around 18:00 local time, overpowered guards and grabbed weapons. They then fled aboard two army vehicles on the premises, but not before wounding 25-year-old Sergeant Gabriele Sisto, who was coming down the stairs at the time. The two vehicles were later found a short distance from the barracks. One of them contained the stolen arms. Police believed the raid was carried out by the Red Brigades terrorist organization. On the inside walls of the building the words "glory and vengeance for our killed comrades" were written (four Brigadists were killed by police in Genoa during a Friday raid) along with the five-pointed star used as the organization's symbol. This would be the first time that an army barracks was the target for a Brigadist attack.

GOVERNMENT PREFERS CHANGE IN OLYMPIC VENUE

LD291549 Lisbon DIARIO DE NOTICIAS in Portuguese 23 Mar 80 p 13 LD

[Unattributed report: "Portugal Wishes To Attend Olympics But Disagrees With Holding Them in Moscow"]

[Text] The secretary of state for youth and sports stated yesterday that "Portugal will do its utmost to insure that its athletes take part in the 1980 Olympic games."

On his arrival in Lisbon from Strasbourg, Araujo e Sa stated that Portugal does not support a boycott of the Moscow Olympics.

He stated that Portugal disagrees with the venue for the games, arguing that "a place in keeping with the Olympic principles should be chosen."

The Portuguese official in charge of sports denied reports carried by international news agencies that Portugal, Britain and the Netherlands advocated boycotting the Moscow Olympics but did not disclose the Portuguese stance at the Strasbourg meeting of sports ministers of the Council of Europe member countries.

Araujo e Sa emphasized that the final decision on Portugal's participation in or absence from the Moscow games rests with the Portuguese Olympic Committee.

SA CARNEIRO WILL NOT RUN IN PRESIDENTIAL ELECTION

LD301557 Lisbon in Portuguese to Europe 1300 GMT 30 Mar 80 LD

[Excerpt] Sa Carneiro will not be running in the next presidential election. That was the major and definitive conclusion to emerge from the meeting of the National Council of the Social Democratic Party [PSD] held in a Lisbon hotel last night during which this was categorically stated by the prime minister himself. Meanwhile, the PSD National Council has agreed not to press him any more to become a presidential candidate.

Later on, and in reply to a question put by the media about the chances of the Democratic Alliance supporting Ramalho Eanes in the event the latter decides to run again for the presidency, Angelo Carreia--speaking in his capacity as PSD spokesman--said that one could not expect from the head of state any move toward or acceptance of the requirements laid down by the Democratic Alliance such as would enable the latter to lend him its support. Angelo Carreia stressed that in these circumstances the president of the republic is the one who is keeping his distance from the government coalition and excluding himself from such a possibility.

The final choice of a presidential candidate to be backed by the Democratic Alliance, the PSD spokesman added, does not depend exclusively on the PSD, but will rather jointly unite--in accordance with the agreement on which the Democratic Alliance is based--both the PSD and the Social Democratic Center Party since the remaining partners are not bound to the agreement on this specific issue.

FOREIGN MINISTERS' CONFERENCE OPENS IN HELSINKI

LD281120 Helsinki in English to Europe North Africa Far East Australasia and South America 0930 GMT 28 Mar 80 LD

[Excerpts] A 2-day meeting of foreign ministers of the five Nordic countries opened in Helsinki Thursday. Earlier in the week the joint Nordic labor organization presented a list of demands to the Nordic foreign ministers on new initiatives aimed against South Africa. The demands include clarification of trade between the Nordic countries and South Africa, action by the governments with an interest in the SAS airline to halt flights to South Africa, and negotiations on development cooperation with Zimbabwe.

In separate talks in Helsinki the foreign ministers of Iceland and Norway discussed the dispute between their countries over the rights to waters surrounding the island of Jan Mayen in the far north. According to the Norwegian news agency NTB, talks between Norwegian Foreign Minister Knut Frydenlund and Iceland's Olafur Johannesson were intended to clear the way for an agreement on fishing zones in the region next month and later negotiations concerning rights to exploitation of the seabed around Jan Mayen.

DENMARK

'DRAMATIC' GOVERNMENT MOVES ON ECONOMY PREDICTED

LD291027 Copenhagen AKTUELT in Danish 23 March 80 p 4 LD

[Hr. report: "Now the Alarm Bells Are Ringing: Dramatic Move on Crisis Policy on the Way"]

[Text] After Easter the government will make a political move which will be discussed with "a few parties," and the outline of the most far-reaching crisis package we have seen was approved yesterday by a unanimous Social Democratic group in the Folketing as a basis for the government to work on further. Both the government and the Folketing group are trying to keep this outline secret.

"The government must be able to finish its work in peace," the prime minister said.

The question is whether there are any other surprises in the package--apart from its scale. The situation is traditional: too big a balance of payments deficit. The only new element in the present situation is that the deficit is now reaching such gigantic proportions that the government intervention must be on a correspondingly large scale.

Economic Policy

The government's courses of action are, on the other hand, limited to proven methods. It is their scale which may be dramatic. As far as we can tell, the government is working on a new crisis package which will simultaneously comprise measures for the encouragement of industry, which are designed especially to strengthen exports and reduce imports, a stimulus for employment and significant energy savings. The whole package is intended to lead to a marked change in the balance of payments situation.

There is a feeling for example that economic policies should be so tough that an approach to balance can be made in the latter half of the 1980's.

Such a political aim is not new. But what is new is that oil price rises--or price rises for energy as a whole--have had such a negative influence on the Danish balance of payments, along with the interest paid on foreign loans, that Denmark will not be able to continue to satisfy its need to borrow abroad.

It is certain that the government will put forward proposals for a new energy tax, but if the goal is to collect 5 billion kroner in new duties in 1981 the energy tax will not be enough, and so we can imagine new income taxes, levied for example on the highest income levels; but there is also the possibility of the state property tax that has already been discussed, and it would be natural to invest in further expansion of public transport and on the other hand to take steps to limit private transportation. Special new duties on gasoline will hardly be feasible--for, among other reasons, the price of gasoline is already rocketing simply as a result of crude oil price rises. On the other hand, it will come as no surprise if there are proposals for new increases in motor vehicle tax.

The chairman of the Social Democratic Folketing group, Knud Heinesen, said yesterday that the meeting in the Social Democratic Folketing group was a "midway encounter" and Prime Minister Anker Jorgensen added that he had "given a detailed briefing" on the outline on which the government wanted support.

It is clear that the government is seeking talks with several parties in order to assure itself of a majority in advance, and if the main points, which Anker Jorgensen mentioned yesterday after the group meeting, hold, there is in the draft an invitation to both the Liberal, Conservative and Radical Liberal parties--perhaps even to others, for example the Socialist People's Party, the Christian People's Party and the Justice Party. The intention is that industry and agriculture should have better conditions in order to be able to compete in export markets, which are becoming more and more stagnant. On the other hand, it is believed that there are always "niches" for new ideas and for just those products which can be produced in Denmark.

It is indicative of the government's line in the expected package that yesterday the Social Democrats supported a move for a bad-debt adjustment fund for agriculture of 105 million kroner a year for 3 years to be put at the disposal of the young cattle farmers who have got into difficulties. The aid takes the form of loans at only 11 to 12 percent.

Christiansborg realizes that "the greatest intervention yet seen" is a matter of urgency. There is talk of industry having grown passive because it is being squeezed in the markets of those of our consumer countries which are trying to follow exactly the same economic policies that are the subject of speculation here. It is also said that there is an imminent "explosion" within agriculture, and that production is falling, even if it can not be disposed of through exports. We must therefore expect that the greatest effort will be put into new economic policies. But at the same time savings must be made.

Local and municipal authorities are already moving quickly toward a zero growth rate. There is no question of reducing total budgets, but rather of bringing down to zero the growth rate in the budgets within the course of only a few years. However, this will have dramatic consequences, and you do not need to be clairvoyant to predict that both education and social services will be hit.

It is clear that in the first round local authorities will bear the brunt, and that national government will soon follow. The decline that this will lead to--also in terms of employment--will only be able to be offset if the "active economic policy" under discussion is successful. It is clearly to this that the government is devoting its powers.

Content of the Crisis Package

The background to the crisis package which will be presented after Easter is a balance of payments deficit which is steadily growing and which is at the moment around 18 billion kroner.

The crisis package's main contents are:

1) Strict limitations on the growth of public spending. Local authorities will be down to zero growth within 3 years.

2) Policies to encourage industry with support for exports and increased capital investment in industry, through new depreciation rules, for example.

3) A new duty on energy, both to limit energy consumption and to create new sources of government income. New duties, through increased vehicle tax for example. A state property tax. Extra taxation on higher income brackets.

SWEDISH ENERGY VOTE PROMPTS CALL FOR CLEAR DANISH LINE

LD281201 Copenhagen BERLINGSKE TIDENDE in Danish 25 Mar 80 part 1 p 7 LD

[Jb. Report: "Demand for Date for Danish Decision on Nuclear Power"]

[Text] Sweden's yes to nuclear power has had an immediate effect on Danish politics. Former Minister for Energy Arne Christiansen (Liberal Party) has demanded that Energy Minister Poul Nielsen consult with the Folketing energy committee by Thursday at the latest to clarify the situation.

"The Swedish people have, in their positive response, staked out a clear and definite line for the continued development of one of the world's most modern industrial nations," Arne Christiansen said. "Here in Denmark we ought to take note of the important arguments which have led to the decision: The confidence in the safety measures appeartaining the disposal of waste and to the reactors themselves; the acknowledgement of nuclear energy as clean and cheap in comparison with coal and oil and the consequent significance for the future of the industrial welfare state."

"The Danish Government must now set a date for an early decision about the first Danish nuclear power station. It borders on hypocrisy that Denmark is willing to buy electricity from Swedish and German nuclear power stations, but does not itself want to have any part in producing."

FOREIGN MINISTER FRYDENLUND TO VISIT GREECE

LD281207 Oslo AFTENPOSTEN in Norwegian 25 March 80 p 8 LD

[Unattributed report: "Frydenlund to Greece"]

[Text] Foreign Minister Knut Frydenlund will pay an official visit to Greece 20-23 April. During his stay he will hold talks with his Greek counterpart on international questions. It is also expected that the talks will touch on the situation on the south flank of NATO, where Greece and Turkey play a central role. It is probable that Greece will also repeat her previous application to be allowed to buy Norwegian oil which would slow the disintegration of the Acropolis. This application has been sent to Statoil, which will make a decision about it at a later date when the company has larger oil stocks at its disposal than it has today.

SCHMIDT, THATCHER DISCUSS UK'S EEC BUDGET CONTRIBUTION

[By David Healy, PA political staff]

[Text] Mrs Thatcher and West German Chancellor Helmut Schmidt started tough talks today over Britain's contribution to the Common Market budget. The two leaders are at Chequers for the regular six-monthly Anglo-German summit.

After Mr Schmidt flew to Britain last night the two leaders discussed over dinner a wide range of world problems without touching on Britain's budget contributions.

But today Mr Schmidt and Mrs Thatcher began talking in earnest about Britain's 1.2 billion pounds net contribution to the Community budget--a sum which Mrs Thatcher is determined to have wiped out.

Chancellor Schmidt has so far backed the French in saying that discussion of the budget must be linked to a package including Britain's North Sea oil and its supply to Common Market partners. German support for Britain over the budget problem is essential to a solution.

The two leaders are also discussing the Common Market's response to Russia's invasion of Afghanistan and particularly, an Olympic games boycott. They were due to hold a press conference later.

SOVIET MEDIA OFFICIALS WALK OUT OF TV DEBATE ON DETENTE

LD311041 London THE DAILY TELEGRAPH in English 29 Mar 80 p 34 LD

[Text] Two Russian officials who had agreed to take part in a TV debate on the motion that "detente has failed" walked out yesterday after receiving phoned orders from Moscow.

They were told they must not appear in the same programme as dissidents.

The programme, "Thames Debate," was being recorded by Thames Television at the Irormongers Hall in the city of London with Lord Bethell and Mr Peter Shore, the shadow foreign secretary, as principal speakers.

Among those invited to take part were four Russian and Polish dissidents and the two Soviet representatives, Boris Kalyagin of Soviet TV and Vladimir Simonov of the NOVOSTI news agency.

The atart of the recording was delayed for an hour because Mr Kalyagin had not arrived. When he did get there he spoke to his colleague and said he had been in touch with Moscow. The two Russians then withdrew from the debate but stayed sitting at the back of the audience.

The debate opened with the chairman, Lew Gardner, explaining what had happened and adding: "Not to appear on television is part of our democratic right." At this both Russians picked up their coats and left.

A Thames spokesman said last night that the recording went ahead normally. "But of course the balance of the debate was somewhat affected."

DENKTAS AGREES TO WALDHEIM'S PROPOSALS TO RESUME TALKS

[Text] President Rauf Denktas said that the Turkish Federated State of Cyprus agrees to the UN secretary general's 23 August proposals--on which Waldheim had made some alterations and had submitted to him again--for the resumption of the intercommunal talks on the condition that the proposals are binding on both sides. Denktas said that if the Greek Cypriots also agree to these principles, then the intercommunal negotiations might resume. President Denktas received the UN secretary general's special envoy in Cyprus, Reynaldo Galindo-Pohl, and his aide, Remy Gorge, this morning. The minister of defense, foreign affairs and tourism, Kenan Atakol, Turkish Cypriot negotiator Umit Onan and his adviser, Necati Munir Ertegun, were also present at the meeting.

In a statement to Bayrak Radio after the meeting, Denktas said: As you know, Waldheim had made certain proposals on 23 August. We had announced that the Turkish Cypriot side would sit at the negotiating table within the framework of these proposals. The Greek Cypriots, however, had rejected these proposals. Secretary General Waldheim informed the United Nations of this situation in his November report. The obstacles created by the Greek Cypriots after that to prevent the resumption of the talks are known to all. The secretary general made certain alterations in his 23 August proposals in order to eliminate these obstacles and to insure the resumption of the talks. He then sent the altered proposals to us for study. We agreed to them immediately on the condition that they are binding on both sides. If the Greek Cypriots agree to these proposals, the negotiations might resume.

Rolandhis Responds

[Text] Foreign Minister Mr Rolandhis stated tonight that the Cyprus Government has submitted two new alternative proposals on resuming the intercommunal talks to the UN secretary general. The proposals are to be conveyed to Turkish Cypriot leader Denktas. The two new alternative proposals, Mr Rolandhis said, were submitted despite the negative attitude shown by Mr Denktas and as part of the efforts of the government of the republic to break the deadlock. In his statement Mr Rolandhis said that what Denktas referred to today in his statement as accepting the latest proposals from the UN secretary general in substance constitutes a rejection because the Turkish Cypriot leader has selected and accepted only those parts of the proposal that suit him, and has rejected the rest. Mr Rolandhis then says: Consequently, Mr Denktas has rejected the proposal in its entirety. One part of the latest proposal of the UN secretary general, the minister said, contains, among other things, the known Turkish positions. This is why, he added, the second part of the proposal balances its content. Mr Denktas has accepted the part that contains, among other things, the Turkish positions and has rejected the rest of the proposal.

The Cyprus Government and the Greek-Cypriot side, Mr Rolandhis stressed, have accepted during the past 2 months, various proposals from the UN secretary general which Mr Denktas has either rejected or amended. Concluding, the minister said that Mr Denktas' efforts to mislead Cyprus and world opinion by appearing to be conciliatory do not serve any useful purpose.

Mr Denktas' statement to which Mr Rolandhis was referring was made today after a meeting between the Turkish Cypriot leader and Mr Galindo-Pohl. The UN secretary general's deputy special representative, Mr Gorge, and the Turkish Cypriot interlocutor, Mr Onan, also attended the meeting.

Details of Denktas Reaction

[Excerpt] President Rauf Denktas said the following in connection with the amendments to the Waldheim proposals sent by the minister of foreign affairs of the Greek Cypriot administration, Rolandhis, and brought by UN Special Representative Galindo-Pohl this morning: The proposals sent to us completely destroy the basis for a conciliation prepared by Waldheim and take us back to 22 June. [as heard] These meaningless proposals show that the Greek Cypriots have not changed their views in the least. We immediately accepted Waldheim's recent proposals which we thought were conciliatory. We call on the Greek Cypriots to accept them as well.

In reply to a question by a reporter who recalled that the time granted by the UN General Assembly to Waldheim to resume the intercommunal talks expired on 31 March and that in accordance with the same resolution the Cyprus problem should be referred to a UN committee following the time limit, Denktas said: You are referring to a UN General Assembly resoltuion which the Turkish Cypriot side has rejected. This resoultion is not binding on us. A committee to be set up in accordance with this resolution cannot contribute to the solution of the Cyprus peoblem. It can only render the problem more complicated and further establish a de facto situation.

Galindo-Pohl met with Denktas and Rolandhis yesterday. After the meeting Denktas announced that the Turkish Cypriot side accepted Waldheim's proposals. Prior to his meeting with Denktas today, Galindo-Pohl met with Rolandhis.

Reply to Denktas Statement

[30 March statement by Greek Cypriot Foreign Minister Rolandhis--read by announcer]

[Text] In his statements today Mr Denktas is now rejecting the two new proposals that we submitted yesterday to Mr Galindo-Pohl. Mr Denktas is calling on us to accept the recent proposal by the UN secretary general. We reply--as we also replied yesterday--that we have accepted the proposal in its entirety as it was submitted by the UN secretary general and that it is Mr Denktas who has rejected it. What Mr Denktas is calling on us to accept is a part of the whole proposal which serves the Turkish positions. We cannot treat this part separately from the total proposal and accept it.

In concluding I find it necessary to list my disappointing experiences regarding Mr Denktas' negative actions during the past 2 months:

1. Mr Denktas has rejected proposals that I discussed very positvely with Mr Waldheim in New York on 4 and 7 February 1980. These proposals have been described as very constructive by Mr Waldheim and by other governments.

2. Mr Denktas has discouraged the visit of Mr Perez de Cuellar to Cyprus to promote the dialog. This visit had been agreed on in New York on 7 February.

3. Mr Denktas has categorically rejected the text of opening statement by the secretary general which was submitted in February. Mr Denktas has submitted many amendments to the opening statement and these amendments amount to rejection. We reacted in a constructive manner.

4. Mr Denktas has rejected for the second time the idea of a mid-March visit to Cyprus by Mr Perez de Cuellar. We had immediately agreed to the suggestion.

5. Mr Denktas has rejected the secretary generals' latest proposal in its entirety. He selected that part of the proposal which suits him and accepted it, and rejected the rest, which is very important.

6. Lastly, Mr Denktas rejected both proposals that we submitted yesterday.

CAGATAY-KLIRIDHIS HOLD MEETING TO FOSTER GOOD WILL

TA290910 (Clandestine) Bayrak Radio in Turkish to Cyprus 0900 GMT 29 Mar 80 TA

[Text] The prime minister and National Unity Party leader, Mustafa Cagatay, and the leader of the Greek Cypriot Democratic Unity Party, Glavkos Kliridhis, met in the Turkish Cypriot sector of Lefkosa [Nicosia] this morning. Before the meeting, which was held at the National Unity Party headquarters, Prime Minister Cagatay said that he was pleased to be meeting with Kliridhis. He expressed the hope that such meetings would help the resumption of the intercommunal talks. Kliridhis said that he was pleased that he would meet Cagatay, the leader of a Turkish Cypriot Party with the same political philosophy, views and principles as his party's. He pointed out that he had always believed that the leaders of the two parties should meet in order to create an atmosphere of understanding and good will between the two communities. He added that the creation of such an atmosphere would help the just and peaceful solution of the Cyprus problem.

Kliridhis said that they would meet without an agenda. He stated that he was not an official negotiator and for that reason they would not discuss the issue of a solution. However, he added, they hoped through this meeting to insure the resumption of the intercommunal talks.

The meeting, which began at 1000 this morning, was still in session when this news bulletin was prepared.

Issue Joint Statement

TA291112 (Clandestine) Bayrak Radio in Turkish to Cyprus 1030 GMT 29 Mar 80 TA

[Excerpt] Prime Minister and National Unity Party [NUP] Chairman Mustafa Cagatay and Greek Cypriot Democratic Rally Party leader Glavkos Kliridhis held a meeting in the Turkish Cypriot sector of Lefkosa [Nicosia] this morning. The meeting was held at the NUP headquarters and it began at 1000. A joint statement issued after the meeting between the two party leaders says that the meeting was held in a sincere and constructive atmosphere. The statement says that the aim of the meeting was to establish a direct contact between political leaders and create an atmosphere of understanding and trust between them. It says that the two leaders believe that such meetings will be of help to the intercommunal negotiators in their efforts to find a peaceful, just and realistic solution to the Cyprus problem.

The joint statement says that there was no agenda at the meeting, but that an exchange of views was held on several issues concerning the Cyprus problem, and that wide-ranging talks were held on these issues. The joint statement points out that the two leaders decided to continue holding meetings and that Cagatay agreed to Kliridhis' invitation to meet at the Democratic Rally headquarters in 10 days.

SPOKESMAN DENIES KNOWLEDGE OF NEW ROGERS PLAN

[Text] "The government has no information about a new 'Rogers Plan'," government spokesman A. Tsaldharis stated yesterday in reply to a question inspired by reports in yesterday's press.

In addition, there are reports from good sources that the relevant circles in various ministries have certain indications that there will be some sequel to this issue. That is, it is believed that the NATO supreme commander will not want to see his initiative for Greece's return to the alliance's military wing fail so ingloriously.

MOVE OF U.S. BASE AT ELLINIKON PREDICTED

[Exclusive report by Uiorgos Karalis]

[Excerpt] The U.S. base will be moved from Ellinikon in 1980--more than likely at the end of the summer.

According to our exclusive reports, the U.S. base which is one of the greatest and most important ones in our country will, for the most part, be moved to the other U.S. base in Nea Makri, although it has not been learned where the remaining part (principally aircraft and support services) will be moved. The transfer of the U.S. base will cause a great social and economic upheaval in the broader area from Paleo Faliro to Vouliagmeni since all Americans and their families will necessarily have to move. The number of Americans serving on the Ellinikon base is estimated to be about 1,500.

TO VIMA CITES SENATE FOREIGN RELATIONS COMMITTEE REPORT

[By TO VIMA correspondent St. Evstathiadhis]

[Text] Washington, 29 March--The United States has undisguisedly intervened in Greece's internal affairs since the first postwar years. In the summer of 1965 it "openly took a stand" against the government of Yeoryios Papandreou and supported Constantine because "obviously the U.S. Embassy did not trust Andreas Papandreou," accepted with satisfaction the installation of the junta and currently has created so much reaction in Greece that no Greek politician risks supporting U.S. positions, given the fact that in the next elections "Greeks may possibly vote in an atmosphere where their political choices will be influenced by concepts about the United States."

Elections may be held in Greece well before the fall of 1981, with foreign policy the pivotal issue and Papandreou the possible victor whose electoral force "seems to continue to increase" especially as it is believed that Karamanlis will move to the presidency of the republic and that "the center and the parties of the right perhaps will not be in a position to bring to the electoral fight an equally charismatic leader (like Papandreou) or such a formidable coalition as PASOK allied with the Greek Communists."

The above admissions regarding the U.S. role in Greece and the forecasts about political developments in the country and the corresponding judgements and conclusions are contained in a report by the Senate Foreign Relations Committee. [paragraph continues]

The report, entitled "Turkey and NATO: The Weakened Alliance," was drafted by (Hans Binenjic) and (Alfred Fredley) who visited Athens, Ankara, Nicosia and the NATO headquarters in Brussels last November after an invitation and on behalf of the Senate Foreign Relations Committee. The report consists of 64 pages, is divided into 8 chapters and deals specifically with the internal situations in Greece and Turkey and with the role of U.S. aid to both countries, Greece's relations with NATO, the issue of Greece's return to the NATO military wing, the Cyprus problem and so forth.

As a whole, the Senate Foreign Relations Committee report is sufficiently objective, without the absence, however, of certain pro-Turkish exaltations, projections of extremist Turkish positions and justifications of U.S. policy especially toward the Greek-Turkish dispute or the Cyprus problem. The report also does not lack certain unjustified and unfounded claims against Greece--for instance, that a large proportion of Greeks have expansionist designs and "believe that Greece's expansion did not end with (the annexation) of the Dodecanese"--and other things.

The Foreign Relations Committee report, which was drafted early in March and in the light of recent developments in bilateral relations and Greece's return to NATO, reveals that the United States strongly opposes the 10-mile limit which Greece has fixed for the Aegean island airspace, that on the contrary the United States fully supports the Turkish position for the 6-mile limit, and for the first time it reveals that "since 1974 the Turks have been protesting Greece's claim of a 10-mile limit by flying military planes inside the disputed zone of the (remaining) 4 miles. In 1975 Greek Air Force batteries opened fire on a Turkish plane inside this disputed zone, but since then direct conflicts have been avoided."

The committee's report is revealing with regard to U.S. reaction to the entire issue of Greek reintegration into NATO. First, it notes that "as is mentioned by a U.S. official (note by TO VIMA: it concerns Secretary of Defense Brown) in most respects Greece has already returned to NATO." It also indirectly recognizes that "the Greek return to the NATO command structure" is influenced by the course of Greek-Turkish differences on the issue of the continental shelf and of civil air control over the Aegean. Regarding prospects for reintegration in light of the rejection of the Rogers plan, the report affirms that "according to appearances, there is not much room for negotiations and observers believe that there may be a clash between the United States and Greece on the conditions of Greece's return to NATO."

Examining the Greek political horizon, the Foreign Relations Committee report recognizes that since the beginning the U.S. Embassy has always meddled in Greece's internal affairs and predictably mentions the case of Ambassador Purifoy (1952) regarding the use of an electoral system that would favor the right, and the case of the defectors when "during a protracted confrontation in the summer of 1965 the United States openly supported King Constantine against Yeoryios Papandreou--the prime minister who was dismissed by the young king."

Certainly this is the first time the Senate has recognized and admitted so unequivocally the United States' intervention in Greece against the government of Yeoryios Papandreou and, more generally, against the forces of the center. However, it is characteristic that the report states in conclusion that "the United States will continue to constitute an important factor in Greek politics but will be in a difficult position to promote its own interests (in Greece)."

Noting that the U.S. intervention continued during the government of the center in 1963-1964 "in almost the same way as was being done since 1948," the report refers to a statement by a senior government official in Athens who affirmed that it is a great liability for a Greek politician to support U.S. positions and observed that "what makes this statement significant is not only the fact that it is correct but that perhaps the Greek people may vote earlier--this year--in an atmosphere where political developments may be influenced by concepts about the United States."

The report refers to the two protagonists, as they are considered in Greek political life, and observes:

Karamanlis still has prestige and popularity and it is generally believed that he will move to the presidency of the republic. Political analysts are not yet in a position to assess the consequences of Karamanlis' move to the presidency or on his overall political career.

"The other dominant personality on this political scene is Andreas Papandreou. Not only has he inherited his father's political followers, but Papandreou has proved, in two electoral contests, that he is a formidable orator and a genuine political leader. PASOK seems to continue its electoral rise. Should Karamanlis move to the presidency, the center and the parties of the right perhaps will not be in a position to bring to the electoral battle against PASOK a leader as charismatic (as Papandreou) or such a formidable coalition as PASOK allied with the Greek Communists."

On the basis of discussions in Athens principally with government sources, the report does not preclude the holding of elections in Greece well before the fall of 1981 as envisaged by the Constitution, and although the economic issue and accession to the EEC will constitute significant issues, the report foresees foreign policy as the central issue of the elections, especially Greece's position toward the United States and NATO in the light of the Greek-Turkish dispute.

The Senate Foreign Relations Committee report also sees possibilities of Greece's completely abandoning NATO and proceeding to join the nonalined nations regardless of whether Papandreou wins the elections.

The authors of the report have written in this connection:

"As there is a possibility that Andreas Papandreou may assume power--in part by exploiting anti-Americanism--most informed Greeks with whom we talked believe that Greece's return (to NATO) can be implemented only with Karamanlis. His move to the presidency of the republic, regardless of whether it is accompanied by a Papandreou victory in the elections, not only will leave Greece outside the NATO military wing--informed people in Athens say--but will also open the road for Greece's complete withdrawal from the alliance toward the position of the nonalined policy supported by PASOK."

DHROSOS ASSESSES STATE OF RELATIONS WITH BULGARIA

[The "Political Issues" column by G.N. Dhrosos: "Our Relations With Bulgaria Are at an Excellent Stage"]

[Text] During the past several years Greek-Bulgarian relations have been good and in fact their development has clearly progressed. The pinnacle of these good relations was the Bulgarian chairman's visit to Corfu in April and Foreign Minister Rallis' subsequent visit to Sofia. A new push in economic cooperation bwtween the two countries was given by the "coordinated instructions" which were signed for closer economic cooperation in various sectors.

At this point the special care and practical spirit should be noted which were manifested in all official contacts by the Bulgarian chairman. Thus, at this moment nothing threatens relations between the two countries and prospects for the future are excellent. However, Zhivkov has been ruling his country for 23 years and it is possible that someday he may withdraw from power. It is also possible that the policy of Bulgaria's great ally in this region may change. It is possible that relations between Bulgaria and Yugoslavia may become more tense, and consequently it is possible that we may find ourselves in a difficult position. Furthermore, the principal base for our close interstate relations is mutually beneficial economic cooperation. Actually, agreements have been signed on specific issues which extend up to 1985. However, the economic situation in all countries--including ours--is very fluid, but perhaps more so in Bulgaria than in Greece. An intensive effort that is being made--perhaps actually at Soviet suggestion--to strengthen agriculture and restrain industrial development may mean that Bulgarian industry is no longer finding outlets for its products and it is considered more prudent to let Bulgaria apply itself to the guarantee of essential items and to becoming absolutely self-sufficient in the agricultural sector.

Meanwhile, the prices of liquid fuel doubled recently and the prices of all goods, including foodstuffs and essentials, were greatly raised. These increases in prices were sudden and excessive, and the readjustment of salaries which was made was not enough to fill the gaps that were created. The increase in prices of imported raw materials and advanced technology maintained the balance of trade at high levels with a consequent increase in foreign debt. Some sources estimate this debt to be $3 billion, which is a large amount for a country with low convertible currency revenues. Of course, in Bulgaria too, as in the other communist countries, the crises in the capitalist world and the international market have had their unfavorable repercussions. According to authoritative estimates, although wholesale and retail prices of almost all commodities increased last Novemeber between 40 and 100 percent, salaries and wages increased between 20 and 50 percent.

The texts which were signed in Corfu between Karamanlis and Zhivkov have created prerequisites for closer Greek-Bulgarian cooperation in industry, transport, communications and electrical energy. Purchases of large quantities of Greek alumina were agreed upon as well as the opening of a new road link near the Maritsa River. Last year, the size of reciprocal trade amount to $140 million through a clearing account. However, part of this--especially Bulgarian meat--was paid in convertible currency. In any case, Greek-Bulgarian trade last year totaled $400 million, $200 million of which consisted of oil products that Greek oil companies bought with convertible currencies.

The clearing system has been in operation in our commercial transactions for 25 years. Beginning next year, however, because of our accession to the EEC, the system of commercial transactions in free currencies will be established. The Bulgarians are afraid that our accession to the Common Market will make Greek-Bulgarian trade difficult because of the implementation of the common foreign customs regulations of the EEC, the possible imposition of countervailing contributions and so forth. For this reason they have proposed the establishment of joint Greek-Bulgarian enterprises. However, perhaps for legal reasons or reasons connected with guarantees and so forth, thus far they have not shown eagerness to accept Greek investments in their country, although they seek the estblishment of such enterprises in northern Greece.

Finally, it should be noted that progress has been made in the areas of educational and cultural relations and in the sports sector. Yet more Bulgarian groups visited Greece than Greek groups visited Bulgaria. Let it also be noted that in the field of scientific-technical cooperation many exchanges of visits between Greek and Bulgarian scientists were held, especially last year.

DEFENSE, ECONOMIC COOPERATION AGREEMENTS WITH U.S. SIGNED

[Text] A Turkish-American defense and economic cooperation agreement and three complementary agreements concerning defense industry, the bases and defense support were signed in Ankara today. The defense and economic cooperation agreement was ceremoniously signed by Turkish Foreign Minister Hayrettin Erkmen and by the U.S. ambassador in Ankara, James Spain. The implementation agreements and complementary agreements were signed by the director of the general plans and principles department of the Office of the Chief of the General Staff, Lt Gen Necdet Oztorun, and by Ambassador Spain.

In a speech at the ceremony, Foreign Minister Erkmen expressed the hope that the agreement would be placed within a framework based on the principles of mutual understanding, respect, friendship, peace and loyalty to democratic principles existing in Turkey and the United States. Erkmen pointed out that the mutal help and cooperation among allies emerged as necessary not only for the interests of one or two countries but for the long-term interests of all NATO. He added that the necessity of reinforcing Turkey--which was in NATO's southeastern wing--in all fields had great significance in this respect.

James Spain said during the ceremony that the Turkish-American relations based on sovereignty, equality and mutual respect were being developed for the future and in the common interests of the alliance of which the two countries were members. He added that the agreement was a good example of how free persons and democratic countries could work together for their joint defense and their people's economic prosperity.

The defense and economic cooperation agreement signed today restricts the cooperation between the two countries concerning the NATO region and NATO commitments. Under the agreement, the United States is allowed to participate in the joint defense operations in certain installations that in principle belong to the Turkish Armed Forces. However, the Turkish Government's agreement must be obtained first for defense operations to be conducted in those installations whose commanders are Turkish.

The complementary agreements say that the defense support to be extended by the United States must be extended within a certain program. These agreements also include the principles of the cooperation to be conducted for the development of the Turkish defense industry and increasing production. The agreements which go into force temporarily from the date of the signature will be submitted for the approval of the Turkish Grand National Assembly.

Foreign Ministry Statement

[Excerpt] The complementary agreement on defense support to the Trukish-American defense and economic cooperation agreement, which was signed in Ankara today, states that the United States agrees that the Turkish Armed Forces need a modernization program in order to fulfill their duties and it undertakes to exert every possible effort in order to insure this.

According to the statement issued by the Foreign Ministry in connection with the agreements signed today, the Turkish Armed Forces' needs arising from joint defense demands will be met in accordance with a 5-year plan. This plan will be reviewed annually and extended for an additional year, and the 5-year planning will thus be uninterruptedly maintained. A joint committee including U.S. military officials will be established in order to implement the continuous 5-year plan, which will be prepared by Turkish military authorities in accordance with joint defense targets and plans.

The committee will seek ways to meet the needs in the most effective manner, including recommending to the U.S. Government the annual amount of aid needed by the Turkish Armed Forces. Loans, leases and all other means will be used in meeting these needs.

Under the complementary agreement concerning joint defense production, the sale to NATO countries of defense materiel and equipment produced by Turkey will be facilitated. Meanwhile, the United States will to the extent possible extend technological know-how to Turkey. The United States will also minimize the requisites for quality and competition. The joint production projects will be realized only by Turkey, as Turkish-American bilateral projects or as multilateral projects with the participation of other NATO and friendly countries. The seven most important projects for the Turkish Armed Forces will be implemented in the first stage. The United States will also give equipment worth $29 million to Turkey in the first stage.

The third complementary agreement signed between Turkey and the United States stipulates the principles and regulations regarding the participation of the United States in joint defense measures to be effected in certain Turkish Army installations. It was announced that the abovementioned installations invlove the following: the Incirli, Sinop, Pirinclik, Kargaburun and Belbasi installations, and the Yamanlar, Karatas, Sahintepe, Elmadag, Mahmurdag, Alemdag and Kulecik communication centers. It was agreed with the United States that the joint operations at the Kargaburun and Belbasi installations will cease in the near future and the full operation of these installations will be handed over to Turkish authorities.

Carter Letter Reported

[Excerpt] U.S. President Carter has said he firmly believes it is necessary to assist Turkey in every possible manner and that he gives priority to efforts in this direction. President Carter sent a letter to Prime Minister Suleyman Demirel in connection with the Turkish-U.S. defense and economic cooperation agreement, which was signed in Ankara this morning. In his letter, which was sent to Demirel via the U.S. ambassador to Ankara, James Spain, Carter noted that the agreement places a serious responsibility on the United States for strengthening the Turkish Armed Forces as well as the Turkish economy.

FRG FINANCE MINISTER, OECD HEAD HOLD TALKS ON AID

Matthoefer Meeting With Ozal

TA281142 Ankara Domestic Service in Turkish 1000 GMT 28 Mar 80 TA

[Text] FRG Finance Minister Hans Matthoefer, who arrived in Ankara last night, has begun his contacts. Matthoefer, who is charged with coordinating the economic aid to be extended to Turkey within the framework of the OECD, held his first meeting with the Prime Ministry under secretary and the State Planning Organization deputy under secretary, Turgut Ozal. In a statment at the end of the meeting, which lasted about 2 and ½ hours, Ozal said that he briefed Matthoefer about the Turkish eceonomy.

Replying to a question by a TRT correspondent, Matthoefer said that Ozal and he had exchanged views regarding the problems facing the Turksih economy. He noted that the issue of increasing Turkey's exports to EEC countries, particularly to the FRG, was also discussed during the meeting. Matthoefer will continue his contacts in the afternoon as well. He will meet with Finance Minister Ismet Sezgen at 1500. Prime Minister Suleyman Demirel will receive Matthoefer at 1615. The FRG finance minister is expected to hold a news conference at the end of his meetings. Matthoefer will leave Turkey tomorrow morning.

Confidence Expressed in Program

LD281516 Hamburg DPA in German 1406 GMT 28 Mar 80 LD

[Summary] Ankara--Federal Finance Minister Matthoefer told a news conference in Ankara today that he was confident the new aid program for the NATO partner would succeed in restoring Turkey's economy to a healthy state. Above all it is necessary to restore confidence in the country's economic future. In a private talk this afternoon with Turkish Prime Minister Demirel, which lasted several hours, Matthoefer explained further steps to be taken as part of the new Turkish aid operation. He also had a meeting with his Turkish counterpart, Ismet Sezgin. Matthoefer also stressed the importance of the measures taken by the Turkish Government itself last January to bring the currency and economy back on an even keel. These measures were something which a democratic government could sustain without breaking apart. After a talk with Turgut Ozal, the government official in charge of the aid program, Matthoefer said it was his impression that the measures were beginning to take effect.

OECD Secretary General Arrives

[Text] Federal Finance Minister Hans Matthoefer, charged with the coordination of economic aid to be extended to Turkey, is continuing his contacts in Ankara. OECD Secretary General Emile van Lennep has arrived in Ankara to hold contacts with government officials. This morning, Matthoefer met with Turgut Ozal, the Prime Ministry under secretary and deputy under secretary of the State Planning Organization. He began his afternoon contacts by calling on Finance Minister Ismet Sezgin at 1500. Their meeting lasted for an hour. Matthoefer was received by Prime Minister Suleyman Demirel at 1630. Speeding up economic aid to Turkey was discussed at the meetings Matthoefer held with both Sezgin and Demirel.

Meanwhile, Van Lennep arrived in Ankara at 1630. In a statement at Esenboga Airport, Van Lennep said that he had come to Ankara to brief government officials on the work being carried out in connection with the economic aid to be extended to Turkey. Noting that the commitment meeting held in Paris within the framework of the OECD had been postponed because various donor countries had not yet completed their technical preparations, Van Lennep added that this should not be interpreted as their having doubts about extending aid to Turkey. He concluded by expressing the hope that the amount of aid to be extended to Turkey will be determined at the commitment meeting to be held on 15 April and that the aid will begin to flow to Turkey quickly.

OECD Secretary General Van Lennep visited Finance Minister Ismet Sezgin at 1700 and conferred with him for some time. He was received by Foreign Minister Hayrettin Erkmen at 1730. Demirel received Van Lennep at 1800. Finance Minister Sezgin, Ozal and Matthoefer also attended the meeting held at the prime minister's residence in Cankaya. Matthoefer and Van Lennep are holding a news conference at the Foreign Ministry at the moment. They are expected to leave Turkey tomorrow.

Joint News Conference Held

[Text] Federal Finance Minister Hans Matthoefer, who arrived in Ankara yesterday to hold talks with government officials, has concluded his contacts. Matthoefer and Emile van Lennep, the OECD secretary general who arrived in Ankara today to brief government officials in connection with the OECD meeting held in Paris the other day, held a joint news conference this evening.

Speaking first at the news conference, Van Lennep gave information on the commitment meeting which was held in Paris the other day. Noting that the OECD meeting approved of the recent economic decision taken in Turkey, Van Lennep said that all OECD member countries shared the view that aid should be extended to Turkey. Van Lennep added that while introducing new economic possibilities, the OECD member countries decided to postpone Turkey's foreign debts within the framework of a long-term program.

Matthoefer expressed the belief that the aid to be extended will be sufficient to save Turkey from the economic difficulties it is facing. Noting that the countries which did not specify the amount of aid they will extend to Turkey at the commitment meeting held the other day will announce their final commitment on 15 April, Matthoefer said: The result to be achieved at the meeting to be held on 15 April will be satisfactory.

Matthoefer and Van Lennep later replied to journalists' questions. In reply to a question, Van Lennep said that the OECD extended aid to countries depending on the economic policies being implemented and not according to the governments in power at the time the aid is being extended. After the news conference Matthoefer and Van Lennep attended a dinner given by Prime Minister Suleyman Demirel. They are expected to leave Turkey tomorrow.

Matthoefer Visit With Ecevit

[Text] Federal Finance Minister Hans Matthoefer, who is coordinating the aid to be extended to Turkey, and OECD Secretary General Emile van Lennep have left Turkey. Before leaving Ankara this morning, Matthoefer held a meeting with RPP leader Bulent Ecevit. The meeting was over breakfast in Ecevit's residence in Cankaya. It began at 0700 and lasted 1 and 1/2 hours.

In a statement to reporters after the meeting, Matthoefer said that as a member of the FRG Social Democratic Party Administrative Council he had discussed with Ecevit the relations between their two parties. Matthoefer added that he had also briefed Ecevit on the developments regarding the aid to be extended to Turkey.

Ecevit said that he was pleased to learn that Matthoefer was optimistic about the aid to be extended to Turkey. Ecevit added that it was natural for every government to use the domestic and foreign sources it procured in accordance with its own program and economic policy. He said: What is important for the supplier of the aid is whether the aid is being used successfully or not, not the political views determining the use of the aid.

After his meeting with Ecevit, Matthoefer left Turkey aboard a private plane accompanied by OECD Secretary General Van Lennep at 0900. They were seen off at Esenboga Airport by Finance Minister Ismet Sezgin and by Turgut Ozal, the Prime Ministry under secretary and State Planning Organization deputy under secretary.

DEMIREL COMMENTS ON ECONOMY, PRESIDENTIAL ELECTIONS

[Excerpts] Prime Minister Suleyman Demirel has said that the state would assist with all its strength all victims of the landslide and flood incidents. Demirel made this statement in reply to questions by journalists as he was leaving the Cankaya presidential mansion in Ankara after his weekly meeting with the president.

Pointing out that the defense cooperation agreement with the United States would be signed tomorrow at the latest, Demirel said that the major part of Turkey's defense needs had been met. In reply to a question on whether a delay in the extension of foreign aids would negatively affect the implementation of the government economic stabilization program, Demirel said:

[Begin Demirel recording] Out of this aid, $1.2 million has already been received. Turkey has spent $810 million. It still has $600 million in its central bank. This amounts to $1.4 billion. What need is there to ask whether any foreign aid is expected or not? Everything has been settled. Does the arrangement of these matters in this way disturb some circles in Turkey? It seems that there are such quarters. This success of the present government should not be considered a success for the government only. It is only if the government is successful that the country can be saved from its troubles. If the government is not successful, then it has to step down. The government goes but the grievances remain, and as a result, the people suffer. The price to be paid if this government does not succeed would be very high. There are those who are confusing the concept of the government with the state. Turkey has never been in such a difficult situation. If there are those who want to criticize our government, let them do so. They will get the answer they deserve. But if there are quarters who wish Turkey to remain in this situation so that our government should not be considered successful in saving Turkey from it, this would be a shame. [end recording]

One journalist recalled that the political party parliamentary groups had not yet decided on their candidates for the post of president of the republic and that the public was curious to know what the tendency of the Turkish Armed Forces was on this matter, and asked for Demirel's comment on this issue. Demirel said that to think of the armed forces in any other way than as that stipulated in the Constitution would mean a lack of confidence in the democratic system and a [word indistinct] for the armed forces. Demirel continued:

[Begin Demirel recording] There is no connection between the election of the president of the republic and the armed forces, and, in fact, there should not be any. The armed forces under the orders of their commanders are exerting wholehearted efforts to defend the country against internal and external dangers. Of course, no one can ask and expect the armed forces not to be interested in the country's national issues. However, everyone's duties are determined. The armed forces respect this fact the most. With respect to the political parties, let me say for our party that it is not true that we can solve this [election] issue and we are not doing so. However, the day will come when this problem will be solved, on this level [of political parties]. These are problems caused by the instability of Turkey. The arithmetics in the parliament are so diffused that it is impossible to collect the necessary numbers for the solution of certain issues. All this instability is caused by the division of the seats in the parliament. It is impossible that in one country the seats should be divided among parties in such a way and that there should still be stability. This is impossible. It is also impossible for things to function properly in a country where the arithmetics of the seats in the parliament are so divided. Therefore, we should not be asked to pay for the bill of such a situation. [end recording]

PRESIDENTIAL ELECTIONS TO CONTINUE IN PARLIAMENT

[Text] No results were obtained in the seventh and eighth rounds of voting at the joint session of the Senate and the National Assembly for the election of the president of the republic. Voting for the post of president will resume on Monday, 31 March. RPP Ankara Senator Ibrahim Ozturk was the only candidate at the seventh and eighth rounds held today at the Grand National Assemly which met at 1500 for this purpose.

During the seventh round of voting in which 362 [as heard] parliamentarians participated, Senator Ozturk received 55 votes; presidentially appointed Senator Muhsin Batur from the RPP, who was not a candidate, received 52 votes; 57 votes were cast for other members of parliament who were not candidates; 162 votes were blank and 8 votes were declared void. An eighth round of voting was held when no results were obtained in the seventh round. But votes cast in this round were not counted as there was no quorum in the parliament. The Senate and National Assembly will meet in a joint session on Monday, 31 March, at 1500, to resume the voting for the election of the president.

ISLAMIC DELEGATION ARRIVES FROM INTERNATIONAL CONGRESS

[Text] State Minister Muhammet Kelleci, who represented Turkey at the eighth session of the World Islamic Congress held in Gazimagosa [Famagusta], and a delegation headed by the World Islamic Union secretary general, (Mehmet 'Ali al-Harekan), arrived in Ankara today. The delegation, which includes World Islamic Congress President (Mahmud al-Dualibi), Secretary General In'amullah Khan and World Islamic Union Deputy Secretary General (Saffed Saka Elenini), was received by Religious Affairs Director Tayyar Altikulac at Ankara's Esenboga Airport.

In a statement at the airport (Mehmet 'Ali al-Harekan) said the fact that the World Islamic Congress met in the Turkish Federated State of Cyprus revealed many realities about Cyprus. In his statement, Kelleci noted that the Islamic world acknowledged the Cyprus problems at the congress.

The delegation, which is visiting as the guest of the Religious Affairs Directorate, will remain in Turkey until Tuesday.

SOVIET COOPERATIVES DELEGATION BEGINS TALKS WITH KOY-KOOP

[Text] A Soviet trade delegation from the cooperatives union [as heard] has begun commercial and cultural talks with KOY-KOOP [Union of Cooperatives for Village Development and Other Agricultural Goals] in Turkey today. KOY-KOOP Director General Nedim Tarhan and the head of the Soviet delegation Dimitriy (?Ilyarionovich) said the following before the talks:

[Begin Tarhan recording] Turkish-Soviet friendship has developed in recent years. The good relations between our cooperatives have greatly contributed to Turkish-Soviet relations. In addition to the exchange of knowledge, exchange of delegations between the two countries, mutual participation in seminars and economic relations are continuing successfully. The development of cooperation in the field of cooperatives between the two countries will contribute to world peace. We believe that economic and cultural solidarity among cooperatives on the international level is a necessity. Therefore, we are trying primarily to develop our relations with cooperatives in friendly and neighborly countries. During our week-long talks, we will find the opportunity to assess our past activities. We will also discuss in depth prospects for cooperation in 1980. KOY-KOOP wishes to conduct intense talks on the export of agricultural products, joint investment in agricultural industry and import of agricultural inputs. [end recording]

[Begin (?Ilyarionovich) recording in Russian fading into Turkish translation] We [word indistinct] great dimensions in cooperation between Turkish and Soviet cooperatives. We cherish this friendship highly. [end recording]

WORLD ISLAMIC CONGRESS ENDS; COMMUNIQUE ISSUED

[Text] The World Islamic Congress has expressed the belief that the Turkish Cypriot community will be justified in requesting recognition as an independent state if equality is not achieved within the framework of a bicommunal and bizonal federation to be established. The 8th session of the World Islamic Congress, which began at the Salamis Bay Hotel in Gazimagosa [Famagusta] on Monday, concluded its work this evening. A joint communique under the title of Cyprus was issued at the end of the congress. The Cyprus joint communique, which was unanimously adopted, calls on the Greek Cypriot administration to appreciate and understand the just demand of the Turkish Cypriot community--which is a distinct and separate community with a different culture, religion and history--to live in its own region as do the Greek Cypriots.

Referring to the Cyprus issue, the joint communique states: The congress sincerely believes that the two communities should establish a balanced federation in order to live in peace and harmony. The two communities should have full autonomy in order to live in peace and to administer their own affairs. If the Turkish Cypriot community does not have the equality it deserves in the bicommunal and bizonal federation to be established, it will be fully justified in requesting recognition as an independent state. Noting that the congress has full confidence in the Turkish Cypriot leadership headed by President Rauf Denktas, the joint communique also calls on Islamic organizations to safeguard the rights of the Turkish Cypriot community at international forums and to insure the honorable and equitable settlement of the Cyprus issue. The section of the joint communique dealing with the Cyprus problem ends as follows: The congress calls upon the Islamic countries organization to grant full membership status to the federated state meeting all the basic requirements of a state.

Addressing the congress after the section of the joint communique concerning the Cyprus issue was read, Minister of Foreign Affairs, Defense and Tourism Kenan Atakol thanked the delegates participating in the congress. Noting that the past week had been an historic and meaningful one from the viewpoint of the Turkish Cypriots and the Islamic world, Atakol said that this past week proved that Muslim solidarity was becoming a reality. Noting that a billion Muslims were fully supporting the Turkish Federated State of Cyprus, Atakol expressed the wish that this support continue forever. Atakol added that Turkish Cypriots had been liberated by Turkey, the motherland, from oppression. Noting that the Turkish Cypriots are now struggling for recognition and economic liberation, Atakol added that the Muslim Turkish Cypriot community prayed for and supported the Palestinian, Afghan, Philippino and other Muslim brothers.

Atakol later read the message sent to the congress by Prime Minister Mustafa Cagatay. In his message, Cagatay said that the Turkish Federated State of Cyprus will willingly fulfill all its responsibilities concerning the full implementation of all decisions adopted by the congress. Thanking the delegates for honoring the Turkish Cypriot community with their presence and expressing his happiness over their presence in the federated state, Cagatay said the following in his message: The Turkish Cypriot community is grateful to you for your unanimous decision defending the rights of the Turkish Cypriot community which has preserved its Islamic and national values by courageously struggling against the imperialist pressure and massacre of the Greek Orthodox Church for such a long time. Expressing the belief that the delegates will defend the just cause of the Muslim Turkish Cypriot Community in their countries and at meetings they will attend, Cagatay said: We should materially and spiritually take Muslim solidarity to all Islamic soil on which struggles are being waged.

Reading of the joint communique resumed after the Cagatay message. The communique expresses support for the Palestinian, Philippine, Afghan, Eritrean and all Muslim organizations struggling for their existence. Calling for the return of Palestine to the Palestinians, the communique calls for autonomy to Muslim Filipinos and for the Soviet withdrawal from Afghanistan thus allowing the Afghan people to establish its own government. The joint communique also states that aid should be extended to some 700,000 Afghan refugees. Recalling that Eritrea had been an independent state, that it had then become a federation and that it had later been occupied through military force, the joint communique extends full support to the Eritrean Liberation Organization. The communique calls on all Islamic countries to show solidarity and cooperation in the political, economic and all other fields.

The World Islamic Congress, which began on Monday, 24 March, ended with readings from the Koran. Some 150 delegates from over 40 countries participated in the congress which lasted 5 days.

Cagatay gave a dinner in honor of the delegates who participated in the congress.

MBFR SESSION FOCUSES ON CONTROL MECHANISMS

AU281114 Vienna WIENER ZEITUNG in German 28 Mar 80 p 3 AU

[Unattributed report: "Forces Reduction: Last But One Session Before the Easter Break"]

[Text] Speaking on behalf of the Western side at the 233d plenary session of the Vienna negotiations on a reduction of forces in Central Europe, Dutch chief delegate Willem de Vos underscored the importance of "accompanying control measures" in connection with the envisaged forces reduction measures. According to a Western press spokesman, De Vos pointed out that these control measures consititue an "essential and integral constituent part of the Western proposal" for an interim reduction agreement.

A first reduction agreement, he said, must be accompanied by an appropriate control mechanism in view of the fact that even after a first reduction of forces Central Europe will remain "the world's biggest military confrontation area." The control measures, he added, would also be an essential contribution toward increasing security and stability, and would at the same time promote mutual confidence.

An Eastern spokesman declared in this context that accompanying control measures could be discussed only in the closest connection with the decisions about a potential forces reduction, and must be adjusted to such decisions. The Eastern side is by no means opposed to discussing this question, but only in very close connection with the reduction talks.

The next and last plenary session of the 20th round of the talks will be held next Thursday. The 19 state delegations will resume their talks in mid-May after the Easter break.

DEPUTY PREMIER PLANS PUBLIC SPENDING CUTS

LD010701 Brussels LE SOIR in French 22 Mar 80 00 1-2 LD

[Guy Depas report: "A Trimmed Down Budget--Mr Spitaels Refuses To Provide 34 Billion for the State"]

[Excerpt] The state spends too much money. Austerity is called for. Deputy Prime Minister and Budget Minister Guy Spitaels has recently suggested that his colleagues be denied the 34 million for supplementary expenditure which they have sought for 1980.

At the end of occasionally quite difficult negotiations, the cabinet, which had been informed of this decision Friday morning, concurred with Mr Spitaels' views and accepted the economic plan proposed by him.

In fact, the government has decided to reduce all budgets by a total of 17 billion. Only the budgets of the postal services, the national debt and unemployment benefits will be unaffected.

As far as the remaining 8 months of the year are concerned, all budgets will be reduced 2.2 percent.

While awaiting any proposals which all concerned have been asked to put forward by mid-April, Mr Spitaels suggests:

The provisional freezing of 2.2 percent of the financial means put at the government's disposal except those to be used for covering any increase in employment benefits, salary indexation and interest paid on public loans; and Increased selectiveness in the recruitment of administration personnel with a view to keeping manpower at the 15 March 1980 level.

This means that since all ministerial departments are to be treated in the same way, the following reductions are to enforced: 1,608,000,000 reduction in the national defense budget; 1,786,000,000 in the social security budget; 2,218,000,000 in the budget of the Dutch sector of national education; 1,706,000,000 in the budget of the French sector of national education; 558,000,000 in the public health budget and so forth.

Mr Spitaels emphasized that if 34 billion in supplementary credits were allowed, the 1980 budget would increase 11.35 percent compared with the 1979 initial budget. This would be tantamount to breaking a promise given in principle--included in a government statement and confirmed in July 1979--to stick to "zero growth" in the public expenditures sphere, that is, to an increase not exceeding the expected increase in the economic growth rate (8.54 percent).

As for any unavoidable supplementary expenditure, the budget minister is prepared to accept only that which relates to servicing the national debt, which, as we have already mentioned, has increased as a result of an increase in the interest rate, and, according to the Finance Ministry, will amount to some 12 billion; that which has been linked with the inflation rate through agreement and which will amount to 3 billion; and that which is a result of unemployment and which will amount to 2 billion.

Since all other requests have been rejected--including some requests about which a great deal has been written very recently, such as the request relating to an increase in the operational costs of the armed forces resulting from increased fuel prices--the attitude adopted by Mr Spitaels was bound to arouse strong reactions within the government. In view of the fact that the Socialist deputy prime minister has forced his colleagues not only not to improve their departments' style of living but even to reduce it, the acceptance of his austerity plan has caused a stir.

The 1981 Budget

Announcing these important decisions, Prime Minister Wilfried Martens stated that the 1981 budget will also be marked by very strict implementation of the "zero growth" principle according to which no public expenditure except priority expenditure--national debt and unemployment benefits--must increase at a faster rate than inflation.

Savings To Be Achieved in the Energy Sector

As far as energy is concerned, efforts will be made to save it in various sectors of consumption and also by replacing oil with other energy resources both in powerplants and in certain industrial sectors.

This program mentions the following main measures to be adopted: First, strict measures are to be taken to reduce energy consumption in the public sector and strict budget control is to be imposed on energy expenditure provisions in all ministerial departments.

Second, at the sectorial level, powerplants now using fuel oil are to be converted to the use of coal; action programs are to be prepared with a view to achieving specific energy savings and replacing oil with other fuel in certain industrial sectors including the iron and steel industry, the cement industry and the sugar industry and also in the agricultural, horticultural and sea fishing sectors; and a plan providing for short, medium and long term measures is to be implemented in the communication and transport sectors.

And third, with respect to the republic, restrictions on the supply of oil fuel are to be maintained; the informational activities of the energy conservation board are to be intensified and developed with a view to making the public aware of the situation; and a large-scale plan for insulation of both existing and newly constructed buildings and for the insulation of heating equipment is to be prepared.

This means that the aim of the entire program is to achieve annual energy savings of 5.2 billion tons oil equivalent by 1985, that is, a reduction amounting to 36.5 billion constant value francs--at a price of 7,000 francs per ton of oil equivalent--in our balance of payments deficit, representing an annual reduction of some 9 billion.

To these figures must be added 12 billion representing the reduction in the deficit resulting from conversion of powerplants from the oil to coal.

The exact terms of this program will be determined at a meeting of the ministerial committee for economic and social coordination on 27 March and will be published immediately.

ARMS FOR URUGUAY PLAN SPARKS POLITICAL 'STIR'

LD291457 Brussels LE SOIR in French 21 Mar 80 p 3 LD

[Jean-Paul Marthoz report: "A Contract for the Sale of Arms to Uruguay Causes a Stir in Belgian Political Circles"]

[Excerpt] A consortium of eight Belgian arms firms (including FN [Herstral National Factory, Inc] and MBLE [Belgian Lamp and Electronic Materiels Manufacturing, Inc]) has signed a contract worth 300 million Belgian francs [BF] to see arms and equipment to Uruguay. This contract, which is combined with the delivery of civilian equipment (overall total BF1.9 billion), has caused a number of controversies within the government, especially during the negotiation of guarantees which the national office of the Guarantees Commission has to grant.

The pragmatists (labor unions, industrialists, Foreign Ministry) are apparently opposed by those who denounce the authoritarian nature of the Uruguayan regime. The military supplies (semi-armored vehicles, grenades, light weapons and so forth) are mainly intended for the security forces to use in measures of repression.

Within the Guarantees Commission, apparently, only representatives of the Economic Affairs Ministry and the Ministry of Cooperation for Development are opposed to the contract.

The people opposed to the supplies point out that, in this respect, the United States suspended its aid in 1976 because of human rights violations.

Consequently, the contract takes on a not insignificant "diplomatic" dimension by running the risk of standing political surety for a regime which is trying to find in Europe what it could not get from its traditional supplier. According to certain sources France, although hardly fussy when it comes to selling arms, is awaiting the Belgian decision.

Opponents of the sale point out that a positive response could equally encourage the Chilean and Argentinian military regimes, also banned by the United States, to negotiate with Belgian arms manufacturers.

The affair is to be settled, apparently, in the next few days in a general policy cabinet. The Guarantee Commission's refusal does not signify an export ban, however. The firms concerned can elect to take all the financial risk themselves. In fact, in that event, the only obstacle could stem from the government's refusal to grant an export license. This "license" is given by the Economic Affairs Ministry after consultation with the Foreign Ministry.

BELGIAN SOCIALIST PARTY CHANGES NAME

LD281429 [Editorial Report LD] Brussels LE SOIR in French 11 March 1980 carries on page 2 a 300-word M.B. report on the decision by a Flemish Belgian Socialist Party congress to change its name and constitution:

"The Belgian Socialist Party (BSP) will henceforth be called simply the Socialist Party (SP). That was one of the decisions taken by the statutary and administrative congress held this weekend at the Maison des Huit Heures in Brussels by the Flemish Socialist Party."

GENSCHER, FRENCH FOREIGN MINISTER, EXCHANGE VIEWS IN BONN

LD311301 Hamburg DPA in German 1210 GMT 31 Mar 80 LD

[Text] Bonn--Andre Francois-Poncet, the French foreign minister, had a 3-hour talk with Hans-Dietrich Genscher, the federal foreign minister, today. Under discussion were the preparations for the EC summit meeting, developments in the Near and Middle East as well as East-West relations. The Foreign Ministry called it a meeting "within the framework of the present German-French exchange of opinion." Italy has suggested 27-28 April for the next EC summit, which is to take place in Luxembourg.

GOVERNMENT SPOKESMAN EXPLAINS SCHMIDT LETTER TO BANI-SADR

[Text] Bonn--In his letter to Iranian President Abolhasan Bani-Sadr, which was disclosed on Sunday, Federal Chancellor Helmut Schmidt made an "urgent plea" for the release of the U.S. Embassy hostages. That was the gist of the chancellor's letter, government spokesman Armin Gruenewald told journalists in Bonn today. He gave no details of the contents of the letter. Gruenewald stated that the letter was the result of concern that UN Secretary General Kurt Waldheim's efforts for the hostages' release had apparently come to a standstill. The chancellor had been motivated mainly by humanitarian considerations.

According to Gruenewald, the letter by the EEC government leaders are not identical in detail. Their contents, however, were coordinated with each other. There was no direct connection between these letters and U.S. President Jimmy Carter's message to Bani-Sadr, although Washington had been informed of the letters. The government spokesman said that he had no knowledge of whether those letters contained any mention of sanctions against Tehran.

DANISH, FRG LEADERS AGREE ON EEC, BILATERAL ISSUES

LD281117 Copenhagen BERLINGSKE TIDENDE 22 Mar 80 Part 1 p 4 LD

[Willy Johannsen report: "Danish-German Agreement"]

[Text] Bonn--The opinion of the Danish and West German governments is that a solution should be sought to the British demand for a reduction in Britain's contribution to the EEC budget at the coming EEC summit in Brussels. But Britain must be prepared for a package deal which will also solve the problems concerning internal fishing and put an end to the lamb war between France and Britain, Prime Minister Anker Jorgensen and Federal Chancellor Helmut Schmidt stated in Bonn on Friday. Both government leaders stated also that the principles contained in the EEC Common Agricultural Policy must not be affected when the budget problems are solved. The West German chancellor added that the best solution would be one which was unsatisfactory for all the nine members of the Community, but which nevertheless would work.

Prime Minister Anker Jorgensen said at a press conference, before he and Helmut Schmidt took a boat trip on the Rhine, that not least among the topics for discussion had been reactions to the Soviet invasion of Afghanistan, discussed at the meetings in Bonn on Thursday and Friday. We are in agreement that the invasion is a serious blow to detente, but, even if it is now more difficult to continue detente in Europe, we must still try to do as much as we can," Anker Jorgensen said.

He added that he and Helmut Schmidt agreed that part of the success of detente might perhaps be the finding of a solution to the conflict in the Middle East between Israel and the Arab countries. On purely Danish-West German relations, Anker Jorgensen said that they continue to develop satisfactorily. The minor episode, as Anker Jorgensen termed West German trawlers' illegal fishing off Greenland, places no strain on relations between the two countries. Both governments are in complete agreement as to what measures are to be adopted in the matter, he stressed. Anker Jorgensen also confirmed that he had also touched on the Danish defense budget problems in his talks with Helmut Schmidt.

GENSCHER INTERVIEWED ON LONDON TALKS, AFGHANISTAN

DW311011 Cologne Westdeutscher Rundfunk Network German 1730 GMT 29 Mar 80 DW

[Reporter Behrens interview with Foreign Minister Hans-Dietrich Genscher, place not given--recorded]

[Text] [Question] Great Britain has been a member of the European Community for 7 years, but the British today do not want to pay the rapidly increasing financial burdens of this membership. Mr Minister, you have just returned from London after the conclusion of German-British consultations. What would a fair compromise be in that European family quarrel?

[Answer] I would like to say first that it is my impression that the British Government is as interested in a fair compromise as we are, and I know that the French Government is also interested in one. We are convinced that finding a compromise would mean trying to settle various problems together, not merely the problem of the British net contribution, but also the fishery problem. Some understanding must also be achieved with regard to energy policy. Problems exist in the agrarian policy field, problems the French have. This means that various elements involving the interests of all partners must be viewed together. I believe that all are aware of the fact that the European Community is facing a test of its ability to unite and act.

[Question] More and more sportsmen seem to reject a boycott of the Olympic summer games in Moscow. In our country the riders are for a boycott, and the rowing teams against it. My question is, Mr Minister, regarding your statement that the Federal Republic of Germany refuses to take part in the Moscow games as long as Soviet troops are stationed in Afghanistan: Is that still valid today?

[Answer] I have nothing to retract from my statement that it is up to the Soviet Union to create the prerequisites for teams from all countries to participate. This means that the Soviet Union must create the prerequisites through its action, the withdrawal of its troops. We have stated in the German Bundestag that these prerequisites do not exist now. I would not use the term boycott for the Western side, because the games that are supposed to bear the name "games of peace" are being boycotted by those who want to be simultaneously the hosts of the games and the occupiers of another country.

[Question] According to your American colleague Vance, there are no signs at all to indicate a Soviet withdrawal from Afghanistan. On the contrary, Vance sees evidence of reinforcement of Soviet troops. That does not mean the end of the Europeans' hopes that one could first use political means to get the Soviet Union to withdraw from the country and second, accept the creation of a nonaligned and neutral Afghanistan.

[Answer] I see with great satisfaction that not only the states of the European Community, but also important Third World countries are trying to create a nonalined status for Afghanistan, and in connection with this to bring about a withdrawal of Soviet troops. May I just recall in this connection the efforts of the Indian Government. In other words: All political opportunities must be used. The more the Third World countries support these efforts, the more opportunities they can have. But also required is insight on the part of the Soviet Union hat in the long run Soviet interests will be certainly better served by a withdrawal of Soviet troops from Afghanistan. An expansionist policy would fundamentally contradict the will of the Third World countries to preserve their independence and sovereignty. It is a question of how long the Soviet Union, with its expansionist policy, wants to contradict this historical movement--the will of the Third World countries to be independent. It is, therefore, necessary here that the firmness of the West and of the Third World countries in maintaining their independence point out to the Soviet Union its erroneous policy.

[Question] The impression prevails in public that the Federal Government does not view Moscow's strategy differently, but that one feels a certain irritation coming from the camp of your coalition partner, the SPD, such as Mr Wehner's continuing statements characterizing the Soviet policy as continuing to be defensive. What is your comment on that as foreign minister and as FDP chairman?

[Answer] I do not want to comment on statements by other politicians. I have no doubts that weapons beyond necessities for one's own defense--that is, striving for superiority--is in no way defensive. In saying this I do not imply that the Soviet leadership wants to attack us, but violation of balance and striving for superiority automatically has psychological effects which are not defensive. Our striving for balance is a contribution to stability in the world and to safeguarding peace, while striving for superiority always must lead to the expectation that others should subordinate themselves, and that these should be destabilization. Neither of these things can serve our interests. This is why we want balance. We want to have that balance on as low an arms level as possible, but in no case will we fail to make the efforts necessary to achieve that balance. If one says that, one must be honest enough to say to the citizens of our country, particularly in an election year, that the establishment of a balance makes it necessary for us to produce additional achievements, and that many things we would like to do now for the development of our country will have to be postponed to a later date. Safeguarding peace is more important than other tasks we would like to carry out.

[Question] That would mean financial sacrifices for the citizen as well?

[Answer] It would mean that achievements which might have been gained at an earlier date, now must be postponed to a later date. I hope therefore, that the forthcoming election campaign will not be a race of promises. On the contrary, in this election campaign the democratic parties should strive to reveal realities to the citizens, show them what is necessary to preserve our freedom and security, and, in so doing make our contribution to world peace.

COSSIGA, PARTIES DISCUSSING GOVERNMENT PROGRAMS

[Text] The prime minister is at Villa Madama [the prime minister's office] with the delegations of the Christian Democratic [DC], Italian Socialist [PSI] and Italian Republican [PRI] parties to discuss the program of the tripartite government which he intends to set up. A report from Innocenzo Cruciani:

The prime minister-designate has been at work since this morning with the delegations of the three parties that will form part of the government, that is to say the DC, PSI and PRI, to draft the program and policy platform which he will present to Parliament next week and which the tripartite government will then have to implement.

Cossiga, Piccoli, Craxi and Spadolini, assisted by their respective delegations and experts, will devote 3 days to the negotiations, at the end of which the prime minister-designate will be able to go to the president of the republic at the Quirinal Palace so as to drop his reservations [as received] and present the list of ministers.

Today was devoted entirely to the problems of public order, paying particular attention to the plague of terrorism. Tomorrow, the object of the talks will be the country's social and economic situation and consequently the urgent interventions which the future government will have to carry out in the various fields of productive activities and the economic issue.

Finally, on Wednesday 2 April, they will discuss foreign policy, considering the international commitments which in the next few months will still see Italy in the forefront as the current president of the EEC.

For the moment, we are not in a position to furnish particulars on the course of the negotiations. In fact, we journalists were admitted into the perimeter of Villa Madama only after 1700, and none of the officials present supplied us with information or leaks.

Today's theme was as we said public order, and it is a theme which should not create problems for the prime minister-designate. In fact, all the political forces, in this case the three parties which will form part of the majority and the government, agree on a line of firmness in defense of the institutions and social order. One of the themes under discussion today, within the framework of the problems of public order, was the reform of the police. We remind you that the most delicate point about the reform of the police--a point on which divergences have already manifested themselves in Parliament--is that of the trade union which the police will be able to form once the reform has been approved.

PCI' MACALUSO HITS DC INSISTENCE ON 'CENTRALITY'

LD291221 Rome L'UNITA in Italian 23 Mar 80 pp 1, 19 LD

[PCI Secretariat member Emanuele Macaluso article: "Contradiction: Country's Needs and Christian Democratic Party's (DC) 'Centrality'"]

[Text] The latest chain of terrorist crimes has the same significance as the Moro assassination on account of its timing, the techniques used and the scale of its challenge. Now, as then, we must ask ourselves what mastermind is pulling the strings, what "sanctuaries" are protecting the killers and, above all, what kind of political and moral situation is making the antiterrorist struggle so difficult.

The DC cannot on the one hand lay claim to all the power, its own centrality and the continuity of its system of government while failing on the other hand to answer to the country on how things are proceeding. This applies not only in the field of directing and technically updating the antiterrorist struggle, but also in the combination of factors which have generated a political and moral climate which prompts increasing concern for the very fate of Italian democracy.

They Kill "With Discernment"

In this climate terrorism is dealing its blows with "discernment," awareness and determination; it is finding links and complacency in political and state circles which the regenerative thrust of recent years has brought to a state of crisis and which are trying to stage a comeback on the ruins of democracy. This is why they are hitting out with "discernment" also (indeed, above all) at those within the DC or the state apparatus who are working to eliminate the old and to regenerate democracy. We have said this before and we say it again now. And did not Moro's son himself say in an interview a few days ago that "throwing light on the Moro case" means "cleaning up political life" and that Moro was killed because "he was trying to extricate the country from the crisis without restricting democracy, but indeed, increasing it." Must he be silenced too?

We have made these observations because we are convinced that now it is not this or that government formula or even the PCI's "insertion" into the government that is at stake, but democracy and the constitutional system. If, as we believe, it is true that the exceptional nature of the situation lies not only in the gravity of the problems to be dealt with but also in the growing crisis in the relationship between the citizen and the institutions, it becomes very difficult to resolve these problems with consensus and democracy unless we prompt a mass mobilization, and the gates of the "palace" are thrown open to the people. This is the essence of the Communist issue--not the interplay of power and alinements. And this is why there is no conflict between our severe criticism of the DC, our tough struggle against its decisions, and the unitary strategy which we are steadfastly proposing again and which transcends the boundaries of the left.

This is the framework surrounding the government crisis, which began not yesterday but in January 1979. Let us cast our minds back: Early elections were held because even then the DC refused a democratic unity government without managing to suggest any alternative numerically feasible in the dissolved Parliament. After the elections we had a government with no majority, backed with conviction only by the Liberals and Social Democrats and part of the DC. And the DC Secretariat tried to keep the government standing--in a manner of speaking--even after the Socialists withdrew their abstention, just for the sake of survival so it could continue somehow. And still it continues to talk about the emergency and about national solidarity! What hyopcricy!

We are now faced with a range of proposed hypotheses for resolving the crisis following the outcome of the DC Congress: a five-party DC-Italian Socialist Party [PSDI]-Italian Liberal Party [PLI] government with a Socialist prime minister; a three-party DC-PSI-PRI government; a two-party DC-PSI government; or a single-aprty DC government backed, however, by the parties favored by the DC of Piccoli, Fanfani and Donat-Cattin. It is strange: Why were these possible governments not formed in spring 1979? Why was Parliament dissolved and new elections held if the intention now is to do what was already possible last year? There would have been some point in holding elections if they had facilitated, through a clear appeal to the people, either the formation of a national unity government or the overthrow of that policy by a center-type government.

More Serious Emergency

The DC did not ask the voters for either of these solutions, thus allowing everything to stagnate with the consequences to the country that we can now all see. If anything has changed in the country's situation since then it is only that the emergency has become more serious. The innovation lies in the victory gained at the DC Congress by a majority which decided to place its own petty power interests above everything else.

But the PSI has also vacillated, promising that it would in any case guarantee governability and demanding a government of solidarity with the entire left. But, as has already been noted, the Socialist secretary's pendulum has swung--ever since the Central Committee meeting which in turn helped Bettino Craxi explain away the impossibility of a unity government.

What kind of government will Italy have? What kind of political leadership will be given to this country, which is experiencing an unprecedented crisis? The DC is prepared to do anything as long as its centrality is guaranteed. And if, as seems likely, Cossiga is given the task of forming the government, he will turn and turn again around this axis. On this basis any solution will obviously be makeshift, in view of the country's needs. The government would be formed without the necessary political and moral standards urgently demanded partly by the latest events. Hence stems our opposition to these solutions, as Comrade Berlinguer confirmed once again following his consultations at the president's palace.

However, the following factor should be stressed: Any attempt purely and simply to reestablish the center-left or to form a government aimed at isolating the PCI splits ["spacca," possibly misprint for "dalla," meaning "from"] the DC and the PSI, would have a fictitious majority in Parliament and above all would have no popular support in the country, unlike what happened in the early sixties, when the center-left did gather a degree of consensus from the socialist and Catholic masses. Are there other solutions which take more account of the reality of the DC itself and of the need not to prompt a split within the left? If there are, we will assess them objectively, without partisanism, though we know that they cannot constitute a valid answer to the challenge facing Italian democracy or to the unresolved problems such as inflation, youth unemployment and state reform.

Therefore we will continue in any case, if negative or inadequate solutions prevail, to fight from opposition for a policy which we believe the country needs. We will fight, that is, not to make the DC accept us--at last!--into its power system, but to smash this system and to defeat the present leadership group's policy, which conflicts even with the interests of major groups in the Catholic world and the DC itself, who are watching with real concern the dramatic and pressing developments in the Italian situation. It is this aim which governs the nature of our opposition, which will be an opposition that will tackle the country's problems and that aims to build the necessary alternative. Anyone who expects us to make the concession of entrenchment should disillusion himself now. We will grant no scope to regressive trends and we will work to build a new unity among the forces of progress and regeneration.

DAYLIGHT SAVINGS TIME--Rome March 29 (ANSA)--Italy goes on daylight savings time on Easter Sunday, April 6. At 2:00 am (1:00GMT) Italians will move their clocks forward one hour. This is a switch from the past when the new regime always started at midnight. Another departure from the past is that this year daylight savings time will last more than a month and a half longer, winding up at 3:00 am (2:00 GMT) on Sunday, September 28. DEMOCRATIC ALLIANCE ISSUES COMMUNIQUE ON ECONOMY

LD311223 Lisbon DIARIO DE NOTICIAS in Portuguese 18 Mar 80 p 2 LD

[Unattributed report: "Results of Government's Policy Are Good"]

[Text] "The good results of the government's economic and financial policy are already becoming apparent," the Democratic Alliance's Standing Council asserts, taking stock of the government's first 2 months in office, according to a communique issued by it yesterday.

"The conditions for increasing investment, revigorating our currency, increasing confidence and, in general, substantially improving our economic and social conditions, have already been created," this document continues. "Measures to reduce the tax burden, contain public expenditure, debureaucratize the economy and promote productivity are also opening up a broader field to enterprise and production, giving all Portuguese people an interest in strengthening the nation's economic power."

Moreover, a consistent anti-inflation policy has been pursued in unison between the government and the majority, within the framework of an overall economic policy and of an objective plan for democratizing and modernizing the institutional framework of the economy. This aforementioned aim has in fact already begun to be realized by limiting the legal monopolies, laying down as generally as possible rules for the functioning of the entire economy and opening up the public sector--a step essential for the latter's own reorganization in such a way as to enable it to become more useful and profitable for the community.

The government "has for its part proved to be directing the implementation of the Democratic Alliance's election program discerningly, calmly and courageously, conducting itself like a state body and the interpreter of the national interest. The prime minister has striven to accomplish rather than merely to promise, by sacrificing political spectacle to consistency, efficiency and the recovery of national peace and progress. In short, the government has proved that the process will be one of transition without being a process of a disruption--a plan in which it has had the unswerving support of the majority, despite the opposition's splittist efforts."

Confronted with "this activity and these aims," the Democratic Alliance then specifies, "the opposition, under the auspices of the Portuguese Communist Party [PCP], has virtually confined itself to attempting to obstruct the implementation of the majority's wishes, becoming the best allies of the forces of inertia and counterreform, as well as of all the interests created in the shadow of the power of the Socialist Party [PS] and the Communist Party. This opposition has used every means from economic sabotage, through complicity with temporary politico-military aristocracies, to social sabotage. The policy of parliamentary and extraparliamentary opposition has above all involved creating and maintaining conflicts, ranging from those of a personal nature, through those of a social nature, to those on the institutional level. It thus attempts operations of diversion, confusion and disruption with respect to the government's policy, whose success and favorable reception it is striving to conceal. The citing of price increases and who reduced Portuguese workers' real earnings most is particularly hypocritical. The struggle against inflation does not appear to be of interest to the opposition, which thus shows itself to be the ally of the hidden economy, the black market, speculation and the political manipulation of the Portuguese people's freedom and economic satisfaction. [paragraph continues]

"The PCP is interested in inflation, because the rise in prices is the principal instrument for proletarianizing Portuguese society, and in this frenzy of opposition it is at last being ascertained as never before that the intersindical is at the service of the PCP, and, as never before, that the PS follows in the PCP's footsteps."

Despite "all obstructions, opposition and contradictions--those inherent in the system and those added to it by the opposition," it asserts in conclusion, "the Democratic Alliance will remain assured and confident about its aims in unison with the government, and above all with the sole aim of serving the Portuguese people. What still remains to be done cannot be accomplished in 2 months or even in 2 years."

NEWLY ORGANIZED POPULAR UNITY FORCE FORMALIZED

[Text] The Popular Unity Force--FUP--was formally established this morning through an agreement signed between Maj Otelo Saraiva de Carvalho and seven organizations. Within 10 days the FUP will present its draft program to be debated 2 months throughout the country and in the various Portuguese emigrant communities abroad. The FUP claims to stand for a revolutionary and autonomous blueprint advocating a "participatory socialism."

On signing the agreement, Otelo announced as an immediate initiative to be undertaken by the FUP the commemoration of the anniversary of the Constitution on 2 April and the 25 April celebrations. He said that he expects them to be popular festivities asserting the struggle for the ideals of the 25 April 1974 revolution.

Further Details

LD291636 Lisbon in Portuguese to Europe 1300 GMT 29 Mar 80 LD

[Excerpts] An agreement was signed yesterday between Maj Otelo Saraiva de Carvalho and certain political groupings, thereby formally launching a Popular Unity Force [FUP].

The FUP is made up of the movement of the socialist left, the workers' unitary organization, the Marxist-Leninist Communist Party of Portugal, and the Communist Party politico-military blocs [o partido communista-blocos politico militaries].

The agreement contains specific references to the elections, namely that the election candidates shall be "unitary and autonomous" and fielded in all electoral districts, and provides for initiatives. With both the Socialist and the Portuguese Communist parties, designed to put up a concerted effort to defeat the Democratic Alliance.

NORWAY

AFTENPOSTEN REPORTS SOVIET INTEREST IN JAN MAYEN DISPUTE

LD281357 Oslo AFTENPOSTEN in Norwegian 21 Mar 80 p 22 LD

[Morten Fyhn report: "Soviet Union Supports Iceland in the Struggle for Jan Mayen"]

[Text] The Soviet Union opposes Norway's right to set up an economic zone round Jan Mayen Island and will give its full support to Iceland if Norway unilaterally sets up a zone without the Iceland's agreement. According to information given to AFTENPOSTEN, Soviet diplomats in both Reykjavik and Oslo have made this known unofficially to prominent officials in both capitals.

For a long time now the Russians have followed closely the talks between Iceland and Norway on the Jan Mayen zone, and they have been most active in acquiring information about what is happening in the contacts between the two countries on the matter. Officially the Soviet Union has not told either the Norwegian or the Icelandic authorities that it will protest against a Jan Mayen zone. There is however reason to believe that it has clearly signaled in its private talks with Icelandic and Norwegian officials that the Soviet Union cannot accept such a zone automatically. The only official Soviet signal so far on their views of a Jan Mayen zone came last summer, during Soviet Fisheries Minister Kamentsev's official visit to Norway. He made it quite obvious that Moscow is not highly enthusiastic over the Norwegian zone plans.

Fears that Iceland might be tempted against expectations into a short-term "alliance" with the Soviet Union against Norway have always been a central argument in international discussions on the Norwegian side against unilaterally setting up a zone. If relations between Norway and Iceland really become poisoned as a result of agitation regarding the Jan Mayen zone, Norway has not forgotten that there are forces in Iceland who will use the future of the Kflavik Base as a trump card in the negotiations or as a means of exerting pressure. If this happens there is no doubt that it will give the Russians a great deal of pleasure.

Soviet opposition to a zone around Jan Mayen is based on principles and goes deep, regardless of whether the zone is set up on the basis of an Icelandic-Norwegian agreement or not. Because of their interests as a superpower and because of their large fleet the Russians do not want a Jan Mayen zone, for they fear it will lead to a reduction in their freedom of maneuver at sea. A Jan Mayen zone would not mean that the Soviet fleet would be excluded from the area, but the Russians expect that such a zone would involve increased Icelandic and Norwegian surveillance by ship and aircraft, and thus increased control over the deployment of their fleet.

In addition the Soviet Union fishes extensively for cod (gadus poutassou) within the planned boundaries of the Jan Mayen zone. At present this fishing is not subject to any controls. A zone would mean quota negotiations, something which the Russians would presumably be pleased to avoid. The importance of possible future herring fishing must also be a consideration here too.

The Soviet view, as judged by competent Norwegian experts, is that if Moscow cannot achieve what would be best for the Russians, which is to frustrate the setting up of a zone, it can always try the next best thing: to create conflict between NATO partners Iceland and Norway. This is presumably why Soviet diplomats tell their Icelandic interlocutors that they share the Icelandic view that Norway does not have any authority under international law to set up a Jan Mayen zone.

On the Norwegian side, according to AFTENPOSTEN's information, there is no intention to refrain from setting up a Jan Mayen zone simply out of fears of Soviet protests, if we succeed in reaching agreement with Iceland in the imminent talks.

But since the Icelandic delegate's announcement at the Law of the Sea conference in New York that Iceland lays claim to half of all resources both on the seabed and in the sea within the Jan Mayen zone, there seems to be little cause for optimism for a swift solution. It was precisely an Icelandic proposal for joint administration in the Jan Mayen zone that led to the breakdown of talks in Reykjavik last summer. From the Norwegian side the proposal was--and still is--seen as unacceptable under international law.

In the Icelandic and occasionally the Norwegian press it has since been asserted that it was the Foreign Office Legal Department chief, Egil Amlie, who torpedoed the talks with his strong opposition to the Icelandic proposal. According to AFTENPOSTEN's information both Foreign Minister Knut Frydenlund and Ambassador Jens Evensen, who was also in Reykjavik, have said that they are in complete agreement that Norway cannot on principle accept any form of joint administration of a Jan Mayen zone.

Talks To Resume

[NORSK TELEGRAMBYRA report: "Jan Mayen Meeting in April"]

[Text] Norway and Iceland have agreed to resume talks on the Jan Mayen zone in Reykjavik on 14 and 15 April, the Foreign Ministry announced yesterday.

On the Norwegian side Foreign Minister Knut Frydenlund and Fisheries Minister Eivind Bolle will take part together with officials from the Foreign and Fisheries ministries, NORSK TELEGRAMBYRA reports.

Foreign Minister Knut Frydenlund will have informal talks on the subject with his Icelandic counterpart Olafur Johannesson in Helsinki next Wednesday.

EVENSEN TO HEAD TEAM AT BARENTS SEA TALKS WITH USSR

LD271501 Oslo AFTENPOSTEN in Norwegian 21 Mar 80 p 22 LD

[Morten Fyhn report: "Evensen Ready for Moscow"]

[Text] At the cabinet meeting today Ambassador Jens Evensen will be appointed leader of the Norwegian delegation which will take part in negotiations in Moscow next month on the drawing of a demarcation line in the Barents Sea, according to information received by AFTENPOSTEN.

There had been a certain amount of doubt both within the government and the Foreign Ministry whether Evensen would be the delegation leader, because in his time as maritime law minister and active defender of the Gray Zone agreement, which he negotiated himself, Evensen was not too well thought of in all parts of his own party and by the nonsocialist opposition in the Storting. The fact that he now is a civil servant and no longer a member of the government has been of great importance to the decision, and there is no doubt about his qualifications as a leader in negotiations with the Russians.

Another consideration in the choice has been the fact that Evensen at present is responsible for the negotiations with the Soviet Union on a fishery protection zone around Spitzbergen, a problem that is closely connected with the question of a boundary in the Barents Sea. It is therefore thought natural that the same man should be responsible for both these questions since Ambassador Helge Vindenes became the new energy adviser in the Foreign Ministry. It was Vindenes who was responsible for contacts with the Russians on the demarcation line question.

Other members of Evensen's Moscow delegation will be Foreign Ministry Legal Department head Egil Amlie, Polar Affairs Adviser Per Tresselt, and representatives of the Fisheries Ministry, the Defense Ministry and the Nowegian Fishermen's Association.

A date for the negotiations has not been decided yet, but it is expected that it will be in the latter half of April, after the planned meeting in Rykjavik on a Norwegian Jan Mayen zone. Neither the government nor the Storting Foreign Affairs Committee has reached any decision regarding Evensen's mandate in the negotiations.

DEFENSE MINISTER'S PLANNED U.S. VISIT OUTLINED

[Unattributed report: "Stoltenberg To Visit the United States This Summer"]

[Text] Norwegian Defense Minister Thorvald Stoltenberg will make a long official visit to the United States in July. The program for the tour has not been finalized in detail, but Stoltenberg will have talks with his American counterpart, Defense Secretary Harold Brown, on general international questions and on factors affecting relations between the two countries.

Political sources in Norway expect--according to what AFTENPOSTEN has heard--that the talks during this routine visit will also deal with the question of advance stockpiling of allied military equipment in Norway.

Defense Minister Thorvald Stoltenberg confirmed for AFTENPOSTEN that the visit will take place in the first half of July. The exact dates of the visit have not yet been decided. Apart from the talks in Washington Stoltenberg will also visit military installations in various parts of the United States. One week of the approximately 3 weeks that the visit will last will be taken up by lecturing at several universities.

The trip has come about after an invitation from Defense Secretary Harold Brown. The invitation is several months old, but the final date for the visit has only now been decided. The visit is part of the series of routine visits that Norwegian and U.S. defense and foreign ministers pay each other from time to time.

It has not yet been decided who is to accompany Defense Minister Stoltenberg, but it is already clear that the Defense Ministry department chief, Caspar Stephansen, and Stoltenberg's personal secretary, Leonard Larsen, will be members of the minister's party.

AFTENPOSTEN SUPPORTS ACTION ON CONTINGENCY STOCKPILING

[Editorial comment: "Plain Speaking From Norway"]

[Text] One would have to be extremely slow-witted not to comprehend the clear answer that has now come from Norway on the Soviet campaign against Norwegian defense policy. [paragraph continues]

Prime Minister Odvar Nordli, Defense Minister Thorvald Stoltenberg and Labor Party Chairman Reiulf Steen all came out over the weekend with a tough repudiation of Soviet press allegations. They paid special attention to the assertion that Norway was in the process of undermining her policies on military bases and nuclear weapons, by agreeing to the contingency stockpiling of allied military equipment on Norwegian territory. The clearest remarks came from the prime minister who said that the Soviet campaign is disappointing and incomprehensible, is marked by distrust and suspicion, is founded on incorrect information, and does not contribute to good relations between neighbors.

It does not happen often that Norwegian officials make statements in unison on such questions, and we hope that it will also happen in the future--should this prove necessary. We ought not, however, think that we have now taken the most important action having made these verbal statements, for what is needed now is that we should move as soon as possible from negotiation to action on the matter of contingency stockpiling. Contacts with our allies have gone on now for several years and the need for new reports should therefore be minimal. What we need is swift, visible and unambiguous measures--taken jointly with Norway's allies--regarding the actual stockpiling of real conventional arms for some of the land forces of selected partners within NATO.

"The difference between the Labor Party and a debating club is that sometimes the discussions must come to an end and decisions must be made," Nordli said in his statement at the weekend. These are wise words and they apply not just to one political party, but also to an alliance like NATO.

The political limitations which will be imposed on contingency stockpiling have already been indicated: The stockpiles will be under full Norwegian control, and there is no intention of storing nuclear weapons in Norway. The stockpiles will be built up with regard to technology and organization so that they can be operated by Norwegian troops. We ought also not to overlook the fact that the allied forces which will come to Norway in a crisis situation have primarily a /political/ [word between slantlines printed in italics] function--to reduce the risk of isolated action against Norwegian territory--at the same time as the purely military aspects of defense will be dealt with by Norwegian troops. So we should also ask ourselves whether we have sufficient contingency stockpiles for Norwegian troops in the north.

Our hope is that we will avoid internal conflict over contingency stockpiling. But we do not feel certain of this, for at the annual general meeting of the Hedmark Labor Party 85 delegates--a little more than a third of those present--voted against such stockpiling. That is no small proportion. And at the same time the party's vice-chairman, Gro Harlem Brundtland, describes the opposition within the party last autumn to NATO's modernization of nuclear arms as "healthy and totally necessary." It is a matter which the party leadership itself admits that it handled unfortunately, and we hope that some of the lessons learned then will be of use now.

SWEDEN

FOREIGN MINISTRY AIDE CITED ON MOSCOW TALKS

LD281433 Oslo AFTENPOSTEN in Norwegian 21 Mar 80 p 8 LD

[Kjell Dragnes report: "Soviet Union Wants a Stable Scandinavia"]

[Text] Moscow, 20 March--Scandinavia is a politically stable part of the world and it is also in the interests of the Soviet Union that it remains so. [paragraph continues]

This was stated during the talks which Lennart Eckersberg, chief of the Swedish Foreign Ministry Political Department, has had in Moscow.

Eckersberg's interlocutors have been the members of the Scandinavian Department of the Soviet Foreign Ministry, led by Georgiy Farafonov, but he has also had the opportunity to meet Deputy Foreign Minister Igor Zemskov.

Eckersberg does not want to reveal details of the talks, but he can confirm that Soviet views on trends in Scandinavia to a large extent follow the same lines as the recent campaign in the Soviet press. But they were by no means alarming talks, he says.

It was also established that Sweden and the Soviet Union have diametrically opposed views of events in Afghanistan. But no clearer signals were forthcoming about what conditions the Soviet Union would make for withdrawing from Afghanistan. The recent speeches by party chief Leonid Brezhnev and Foreign Minister Andrey Gromyko were referred to.

Eckersberg also had the opportunity to present the Swedish Government's proposal for a disarmament conference in Stockholm. The Soviet reaction was one of general satisfaction with Sweden's proposal, but the Russians did not commit themselves. Poland has already invited nations to a similar conference, and it would be unreasonable to expect any reaction to the Swedish proposal in the near future. However, Eckersberg did get the impression that the Soviet Union wants results from the followup conference in Madrid this autumn.

Eckersberg emphasizes that the talks have been a part of the routine exchange of views between Sweden and the Soviet Union and that it is important to keep channels open in the exacerbated international climate.

PAPERS EDITORIALIZE ON IMPORT OF ENERGY REFERENDUM

LD281549 [Editorial Report LD] Stockholm's Swedish-language papers on 25 March 1980 carry editorials on the outcome of the referendum on nuclear energy, which was a resounding victory for the continuation of nuclear power generation in Sweden. All editorials agree that it is time now for the bourgeois coalition government to get on with the job of governing the country and to shelve any further discussion on the matter. Internal disagreements, both within the government and within individual parties, must be put aside and all efforts directed toward the solution of "urgent questions," principally the state of the Swedish economy.

Editorials do, however, take up two questions that have arisen out of the referendum result: the future of Thorbjorn Falldin as prime minister, and the choice of energy minister. Falldin is encouraged to stay on provided that he accepts the referendum result despite his own personal opposition and that of his party to nuclear energy. And it is suggested that Carl Axel Petri, energy minister with no party affiliation, also remain at his post. SVENSKA DAGBLADET concludes its 25 March page 2 editorial with an exhortation to the government: "The referendum has loosened the nuclear knot. It only remains to give the Falldin government one piece of advice: Hold together and hold out."

As far as the exploitation of nuclear energy in the future is concerned, the referendum result is said to show that nuclear power is to be seen only as a temporary source of energy, to be used to tide Sweden over the next 25 years while alternative sources of energy are developed. DAGENS NYHETER suggests in its page 2 editorial that the popular movement that grew up around the antinuclear alternative now mobilize in a new direction. "What we need now is great pressure of public opinion to contribute to the development of types of energy which in the short term do not seem profitable, and for this task nothing can replace the thousands of people who have taken part in the fight against nuclear power."

[Report on Antonio Bronda undated interview in London with Labor Party Executive member Eric Heffer: "Let Us Forge Links Within the European Left"]

[Text] London--The threats of the international crisis, the need to safeguard and re-invigorate detente, the role which Europe can and must play: These were the topics of my conversation with Eric Heffer of the Labor Party Executive. The conversation began with a review of the situation as a whole and in particular post-Afghanistan tensions: Heffer does not conceal the fact that "the danger is of getting trapped in the cold war again," but believes that "we have not yet reached this critical point," thanks above all to the fact that "a sufficient number of voices are urging the Western governments to be cautious and warning them against taking hasty decisions," such as the decisions concerning the Olympic boycott ("We in the Labor Party do not agree with it at all: It would be counterproductive") or economic reprisals. The problem, in other words--while confirming a "very clear-cut" position of "condemning the military intervention in Afghanistan and demanding an immediate withdrawal"--is how to oppose the action of those in our own countries who are acting against detente. It must also be said that Afghanistan is not the only feature on the international map: "There are also some encouraging pointers, some steps forward," as in Rhodesia, where Mugabe's victory in the recent elections constitutes "one of the most fruitful long-term developments for Africa."

This overall picture led to a discussion of detente and the role of Europe--a continent and political group which is not content merely to watch the clash of dialog between the world's two protagonists, but which intends to make its own effective contribution....

This was probably the most important reply: "Europe," the Labor leader said, "has its own role and function with regard to detente and world peace. Nevertheless, there are contradictions and difficulties. In Britain progress is obstructed by the controversy over the EEC, by the dissatisfaction being expressed in all political circles with the British financial contribution to the EEC budget. This does not mean, however, that our outlook, as a Labor Party, should not be in favor of a united Europe--that is, achieving the utmost unity of intent compatible with the circumstances. We must be able to push beyond the present EEC structures. Along this path the European countries can contribute to a stance which will counterbalance instances of, and trends toward concentrations of power within the bureaucratic-military machinery of both the United States and the USSR.

"Initiative can be taken in this direction: for instance, the idea of working to create a nuclear-free area in Europe. Perhaps we could start with the Mediterranean countries, which do not have their own nuclear force, and later extend the concept of a 'nuclear-free area' to other states, such as our own. The democratic and leftwing forces, the socialist and communist parties in Europe, could agree on such a platform. On this basis we could exert our influence on governments for a lull in the nuclear rearmament spiral and for a progressive openness to the proposal of a nuclear-free area. At the same time, we must strive to keep communication channels between East and West open, to prevent the confrontation from escalating and to alleviate tension."

[Question] In view of the Labor Party's continued negative stance with regard to the EEC (based on historical tradition and current considerations), and its critical attitude toward the European Parliament, how do you believe the joint objectives of the European left can be pursued in practice? How can we encourage opportunities for contact and the exchange of ideas among all the forces wanting a policy of social and civic development and progress in our continent's various countries?

[Answer] At the moment in our country there is still considerable coolness toward the Strasbourg assembly because people believe that the possible future increase in its powers will lead to the formation of a federal Europe. And it is this possible development which is inspiring definite hostility in broad sectors of the Labor Party. But we are faced with a dichotomy. I want this to be absolutely clear. Labor has a real international vocation. It believes in internationalism and knows that it wants to work for Europe's evolution in a socialist direction. But it does not want what we still call the "Common Market." This is the problem. My personal opinion is that if we manage to reform the budget and more reasonable terms are reached, much of the anti-EEC opposition is likely to disappear. There would then be a different attitude on Labor's part also with regard to the European Parliament. In that case there would be a friendlier and more understanding approach. The basic problem, however, is still how to combat effectively the excessive power of the multinational economic centers, their strength and decisionmaking cohesion. There is much to be done on the trade union front toward increasing unions' influence, weight and unity in Europe. We must work in this direction. It is a matter of broadening the scope for understanding and cooperation.

The same applies to all leftwing European forces, all those who believe in democracy, who not only accept a pluralistic society but who want to make it effective in its options and participation. This includes all communist, social democratic and socialist parties, whether or not they are members of the European socialist confederation, as long as they share the same attitude to our societies' democratic processes. I am convinced that we must forge links with one another. Indeed, I believe that regular contacts, exchanges of opinion and meetings must be maintained and that we must create a minimum practical understanding which will enable us to say at least what we do agree on and what we differ on. Working meetings on certain general policy guidelines: I believe this is the road we should follow.

DAILY TELEGRAPH ENDORSES 'TOTALLY NEW NATO STRATEGY'

LD281215 London THE DAILY TELEGRAPH in English 28 Mar 80 p 18 LD

[Editorial: "NATO's New Weapons"]

[Text] Hopes have been raised that at last within a few years new weapons, incorporating the lead that the West still retains in the upper reaches of technology, will offset the Warsaw Pact's overwhelming numerical superiority in men and equipment. It is true that similar expectations have been raised before, especially with regard to precision weapons to counter the Pact's three-to-one superiority in tanks. But in this, as in other categories, production and deployment delays, due among other things to inter-NATO rivalries, together with unexpected Russian advances, have caused setbacks. Recently however a more encouraging climate has been created by President Carter's re-armament plans. And this week cautious optimism in what is still a very cold climate has been kindled by a report by the London Institute for the Study of Conflict and news of a revolutionary American anti-tank missile.

As to the latter, when Mr Perry, the Pentagon's research director, says that "by the late eighties" it would make a profound difference in the NATO-Soviet balance, his reputation is such that we should take him very seriously--while wishing for quicker delivery. The Institute's study, "NATO in the Eighties--a War-Winning Strategy" by Air Vice-Marshal Stewart Menaul (Institute for the Study of Conflict, 12 Golden Square, London W.1), is of equal authority in its field. His hopes are likewise based on the new military technology, although they depend very much on other things as well. His timescale is a bit more encouraging--three to five years. All the same, this is a very long time indeed in a confrontation, from weakness, with a ruthless and rampant Russia. Indeed, the very last thing he would suggest is that, even if we get safely through this vale of anxiety, we can then sit back and deter the Russians by threatening to press the various levers, buttons and triggers.

What he wants is nothing less than a totally new NATO strategy, involving the abandonment of the 28-year-old theory of "flexible response," involving controlled escalation from conventional to battlefield-nuclear to theatre-nuclear to American strategic-nuclear. This, he argues--not merely with irrefutable logic but with obvious common sense--has been outdated and incredible ever since Russia achieved nuclear parity with America. She will have achieved superiority in key categories by 1985 at latest. Instead, Russia must expect any major attack to be met from the start not only by conventional resistance, but by battlefield-nuclear and theatre-nuclear forces as well. The new cruise and Pershing-2 missiles, with their unique manoeuvrability and unrivalled accuracy, make such a strategy credible and therefore effective as a deterrent--backed up as it is by the American strategic arsenal, which will have regained clear superiority after a gap of a few years.

Much else, of course, must be done as well. Conventional forces must be strengthened, modernised and made really "ready"--as Russia's divisions are. Nuclear decisions must be possible more quickly than within the present theoretical best of 24 hours--by when the Russian armies would have won. There must be vast improvements in NATO's political unity. It is a tough recipe, but for the first time for many years of increasingly dangerous illusions it is a realistic one. It makes proper use of the new ingredient of the latest technology instead of allowing this to dissipate in futility, thus adding to the danger.

PROSPECTS FAVORABLE FOR END OF STEEL STRIKE

[By Ken Dennis, PA chief industrial correspondent]

[Excerpt] The 13-week steel strike could be over by Wednesday. With a 15.5 percent pay increase in steelworkers' pay packets, union leaders are urging a complete return to work by 6 am on Wednesday. Within minutes of Lord Lever's three-man committee of inquiry into the pay row announging its findings today, leaders of the 13 steel unions indicate they would be making a "back to work" recommendation to their executive committees tomorrow.

The recommendation is for a pay increase of 11 percent on the national basic, plus 4.5 percent through locally agreed bonus schemes, which when compounded is worth nearly 16 percent. Holidays and pension agreements add another 1 percent to the package which is estimated to cost the British Steel Corporation [BSC] 192 million pounds--18 million pounds more than the cost of their "final offer." The new deal will not mean further job losses.

Mr Bob Scholey, BSC's chief executive, said: "We think we can just live with it but it puts that bit more pressure on us to earn it ghrough greater productivity." He said that an estimated 9 or 10 percent loss in the market share as a result of the strike was a greater threat to jobs.

Mr Bill Sirs, leader of the dominant Iron and Steel Trades Confederation, interpretated the offer at about 17 percent and said that although the package did not meet all the union's aspiration, it was a considerable move from BSC's original offer of 2 percent on the national basic. "It is a justification of the struggle which we were forced into by the management and a justification of seeking a committee of inquiry," he said.

Lord Lever, who conducted the inquiry throughout the weekend with Sir Richard Marsh and Mr Bill Keys, said their findings were "the best judgment we could make," for the benefit of both sides and the industry as a whole as a basis for ending the strike.

WALDHEIM PROPOSALS FOR RESUMING TALKS REPORTED

TA311614 Ankara ANATOLIA in English 1452 GMT 31 Mar 80 TA

[Text] Lefkose, 31 Mar (AA)--Following are the proposals made by U.N. Secretary General Kurt Waldheim to help resume intercommunal talks for a settlement in Cyprus, which have just been rejected by the Greek Cypriots. The text of the proposals, originally transmitted to the Turkish Cypriot and Greek Cypriot communities on 23 Ausut, had not been released until now:

A) Statement by secretary-general that both parties accept the validity of the Denktas-Makarios and Denktas-Kiprianou agreements.

B) Both parties have reaffirmed their support for a federal solution of the constitutional aspect, and for a bizonal solution of the territorial aspect of the Cyprus problem.

C) Matters of security can be raised and discussed in the intercommuncal talks. It is understood that this matter will be discussed having regard to certain practical difficulties Which may arise for the Turkish Cypriot community, as well as to the security of Cyprus as a whole.

D) Interlocutors are to negotiate in the following matters:

1. (?Resettlement) of Varosha under the auspices of the United Nations as laid down in point 5 of the 19 May agreement.

2. Practical measures to be taken in accordance with point 6 of the 19 May agreement.

3. Constitutional aspects.

4. Territorial aspects.

It is understood that the matters listed above will be dealt with concurrently and at an appropriate early state. Committees or working groups will be set up by interlocutors. Pending the establishment of committees or working groups the representative of the secretary general will normally call upon the interlocutors to discuss each of the above matters in the above order in consecutive meetings.

DENKTAS REJECTS ROLANDHIS STATEMENT ON TALKS RESUMPTION

TA311709 Ankara Domestic Service in Trukish 1400 GMT 31 Mar 80 TA

[Text] Turkish Federated State of Cyprus President Rauf Denktas made the following statement today in connection with the resumption of the intercommunal talks:

[Begin Denktas recording] Rolandhis has (?illusions). He keeps on forgetting that two national communities are involved in the Cyprus dispute. He thinks that his meeting with the Honorable Mr Waldheim will also be binding on the sovereign Turkish people in Cyprus. This is the reason for his disillusionment. So long as he refuses to see the Cyprus realities he will continue to be disillusioned. I do not know the issues discussed by Rolandhis and the Honorable Mr Waldheim on 4 and 7 February. This concerns Rolandhis himself. Therefore, we have not rejected anything concluded between the Honorable Mr Waldheim and Rolandhis. If the Honorable Mr Waldheim has submitted to us something concluded with Rolandhis we are not aware of it. Therefore, we cannot accept having rejected it.

By claiming that we have prevented the arrival in Cyprus of the Honorable Mr De Cuellar, Rolandhis has proved that he has illusions. Had the Honorable Mr De Cuellar believed that he could have made a beneficial visit to Cyprus, he would have come within the framework of a goodwill visit, and we would have met with him and told him the current realities. The opening speech to be delivered by the Honorable Mr Waldheim took final shape this week. This was submitted to us. We immediately accepted it. We accepted it unconditionally. Therefore, Rolandhis, by claiming that we have accepted what is in our interests and rejected what is not, is clearly lying. We have unconditionally accepted the Honorable Mr Waldheim's opening speech.

The Greek Cypriots have a precondition, which they want to include in the opening statement and which changes its meaning. We called on them to renounce this precondition. We called on them to unconditionally accept the statement, just as we have done. Our call is still valid. Rolandhis claims that we have rejected the two proposals he submitted yesterday. This is shameful. He is deceiving the Greek Cypriot people. The two proposals that he claims to have submitted are nothing but two worthless proposals, using Byzantine tactics, which reduce the meaning and value of Waldheim's statement to nothing. I believe that even the UN representatives, who brought the proposals to us, were ashamed. Our last word is again a call for them to unconditionally accept the recent Waldheim proposals and to return to the negotiating table. [end recording]

Rolandhis Replies

NC312131 Nicosia Domestic Television Service in Greek 1830 GMT 31 Mar 80 NC

[Text] The foreign Minister of the republic, Mr Rolandhis, in a statement tonight documents with proof and events the latest developments concerning the resumption of the inter-Cypriot talks, and simultaneously refutes a new statement made today by the Turkish Cypriot leader, Mr Denktas.

In his statement Mr Rolandhis discloses that on 4 and 7 February he and UN Secretary General Waldheim discussed a plan on the basis of which significant economic support would be granted to the Turkish Cypriots, works of mutual benefit would begin in all Cyprus based on the UN development program and the issue of Nicosia airport would be discussed. In exchange the inhabitants of Varosha would return and the Larnaca road would be opened while the talks would begin simultaneously.

In his statement Mr Rolandhis adds that Mr Waldheim described the plan as outstanding and said that it was the first time he had seen light and that we are on the right path. According to the foreign minister, foreign governments also reacted positively to this idea. Mr Rolandhis continues: On 20 February the Cyprus envoy at the United Nations informed the Cyprus Government that he was informed by the Secretariat General that the Turkish side had rejected this plan.

Regarding Mr Perez de Cuellar's visit to Cyprus, Greece and Turkey, Mr Rolandhis says that on 7 February he and Mr Waldheim agreed that it would be advisable for the visit to take place in the second half of February. The visit was canceled because the UN secretary general thought that it would not serve any purpose, considering the stand of the Turkish side. The Turkish Government, Mr Rolandhis adds, supported Denktas' position that there was no reason for Mr Perez de Cuellar to visit the region.

In his statement the foreign minister also says that Mr Denktas avoids referring to the secretary general's opening statement as it was first given to the two sides on 22 February by Mr Galindo-Pohl.

Mr Rolandhis adds: Mr Denktas rejected this opening statement by submitting extensive amendments, of which we were informed on 3 March by Mr Galindo-Pohl. The amendments that Mr Denktas suggested, the foreign minister stresses, completely altered the secretary general's opening statement. The Cyprus Government and the Greek Cypriot side, he adds, have reacted positively to the secretary general's opening statement. The foreign minister adds: On 13 March the Cyprus UN ambassador informed me that Mr Waldheim was planning to send Mr Perez de Cuellar to Cyprus to promote the dialog and he wanted our opinion. The same day I replied to our ambassador that Mr Perez de Cuellar would be welcome. On 20 March I was informed that the mission would not take place because Turkey did not approve it. Mr Waldheim said the same thing to Cyprus' permanent UN representative on 22 March.

In light of the completely negative stand of the Turkish side, Mr Rolandhis continues, the Secretariat General, having no other way out, suggested a fresh opening statement by the secretary general on 28 March. This statement contained the Turkish positions of bizonality and security. The Secretariat General proposed that this statement contain our reservations, objections, and interpretation. In other words, because the Secretariat General knew that the text of the secretary general's statement contained basic positions of the Turkish Cypriot side, at the same time it proposed that we had the right to insert reservations because, as Mr Perez de Cuellar clearly said, there has never been a case in which the Secretariat General has adopted such a text without our having the opportunity to reserve and explain our position. Mr Denktas, Mr Rolandhis remarks, has found the opportunity of his life. He accepted the text of the statement that suited only him, and eliminated our right to reservation. He began to broadcast that he is conciliatory and to call on us to forget our reservations. The foreign minister says: I cannot imagine greater impudence.

In his statement Mr Rolandhis says that in the effort to find a solution we made two suggestions at the last moment: that either the secretary general's statement be amended adequately and the reservation that constituted an integral part of it be removed, or that we go to talks on the basis of the 19 May agreement without any agenda. These two proposals, which were made after the unacceptable behavior of Mr Denktas for 2 months, are described now as useless and as a Byzantine tactic. Mr Rolandhis concludes: Mr Denktas says somewhere in this statement that I must be ashamed of myself because I mislead the Greek Cypriots. I do not know what constitutes shame in his circle. Usually the invaders and thieves are the ones who are ashamed, not the victims of invasion whose rights were so crudely trampled upon.

I KATHIMERINI QUESTIONS WESTERN AID TO TURKEY

[Editorial: "Financing Conquests?"]

[Text] Continuing his world tour as the collector of donations, amounts and credits from East and West for economic aid to Turkey, Federal Republic of Germany Minister of Finance Matthoefer stopped in the Greek capital where he had talks with Prime Minister K. Karamanlis and Foreign Minister G. Rallis. Naturally, the object of these talks was the linkage between the granting of massive economic aid to Turkey and the problem of Greek-Turkish differences and the balance of power between the two countries.

Before we deal with the contents of the talks between Greek officials and Matthoefer we shall note the fact that, we at least, are not aware in the annals of international life of a precedent similar to the tour of the German finance minister. We do not think it has ever happened that the minister of finance of a great and powerful country toured the countries of the world to collect funds destined for another country which is inactive, does not exert any efforts and awaits for the results of the efforts and fundraising of others acting on its behalf. Let us put aside sentimentalities and theoretical viewpoints--which have no place in the politics of our era which is characterized by the blunt comparison of interests--and let us pore over this phenomenon in order to study it. It is good to learn lessons from our adversary because it is true that although international conditions and its geographic position have made Turkey "a state to be supplicated" and in the eyes of the well-known strong factors of the international arena have elevated its significance, Ankara's dealings and diplomacy are not alien to the phenomenon. If we ponder the problem cooly, without prejudice and rid of psychoses and other "distorting lenses" of the past, we shall draw conclusions which are most useful and of great significance regarding the motives and the "dynamics" of the positions of all "interested parties" and the repercussions--well known--which they have had on the Greek-Turkish dispute and, more specifically, on Turkey's stance toward the Greek area. These conclusions will naturally extend to cover the issue of our country's stance, tactics and methodology.

Now let us come to the issue of our leaders' talks with Matthoefer. The German minister--according to the relevant statement--explained the economic situation in Turkey to Karamanlis and the reasons why an effort is being made to strengthen this country economically. The Greek prime minister drew Matthoefer's attention to the need, on the one hand of not disturbing the proportion in the military aid that is given by the FRG to Greece and Turkey and, on the other, of not permitting Turkey to use the economic aid in such a way that will upset the current correlation of power between the two countries. Matthoefer assured the prime minister that the German Government takes Greek interests into consideration when formulating its policy in this area.

We have stressed in the past that it is the prerogative of the West--and of anyone else--to conclude that the support and economic restoration of Turkey serve the interests of the Western world both in this specific area and more broadly. After all, Greece does not desire the economic misery of the Turkish people--or any other people. However, what Greece is entitled to demand from Turkey's sponsors is that the aid which will be provided for Turkey's economic restoration not be channeled into arms (which in fact will be aimed against Greece and not against the proven adversaries of the Atlantic alliance) with a resultant disturbance in the balance of power with Greece. It is being declared that the product of this unprecedented international fundraising for Turkey will be given to it exclusively for its economic support and restoration. [paragraph continues]

Nevertheless, state budgets are unitary and nobody, without specific and effective controls, can avert the at least partial funneling of the amounts that are being given as economic aid to the military expenses account. For this reason there should be specific guarantees amenable to control.

The "touchstone" will be the Turkish military presence in Cyprus. This will judge the sincerity and the true content, not only of Turkey's but of its financiers' intentions, because it is contradictory, incongruous and unacceptable for a country to ask for help because it is sinking economically and at the same time to maintain an expensive military occupation and presence of conquest--in fact, illegal and internationally condemned--in another country. If the West is truly interested in economically restoring Turkey and closing the rift in the Atlantic alliance's southeastern wing, the first thing it must do is ask Ankara to withdraw the Turkish military presence on Cyprus and put an end to the expensive military preparations aimed at Greece and not, we repeat, at the proven and "defined" adversaries of the alliance. In any case, a primary and indispensable condition should be the immediate beginning of a true and substantive procedure to achieve a reasonable and generally acceptable solution of the Cyprus problem; otherwise economic aid to Turkey will be tantamount to financing its conquest in Cyprus and its expansionist designs against Greece.

The issue of the economic aid to Turkey affords the West a unique opportunity and possibility to solve the entire crisis in the area, the only cause of which has been Ankara's chauvinistic predatoriness. The sincerity of the assurances about the maintenance of the balance of power and so forth between Greece and Turkey will be judged from deeds in this direction. We are sure the Greek Government will not remain inactive in view of the conditions, possibilities and opportunities which this economic aid to Turkey is creating...

EUROPEAN INVESTMENT BANK GRANTS LOAN

[Text] The timely absorption of the $350 million that has been given to Greece by the EEC has been completed in accordance with the second financial protocol. The agreement for the final part of this sum, that is, $26 million was signed today in Luxembourg by the European Investment Bank and ETA [Hellenic Industrial Development Bank]. As Minister for EEC Affairs Kondoyioryis announced, the agreement was signed by Vice Chairman of the European Investment Bank (Ross) and Managing Director of ETA Ghondikas.

This loan is the fourth that has been concluded between the European Investment Bank and ETA, which has absorbed $70 million so far. Of the $350 million provided by the second financial protocol between Greece and the EEC, $60 million was given as free aid for the payment of interest on loans that were used for infrastructure projects and for studies of development projects.

After our accession to the EEC, Kondoyioryis said, every year our country will be able to draw from the European bank much larger sums in the form of loans for the financing of new productive investments in industry and in infrastructure projects.

Meanwhile, the EEC ministers of agriculture have been conferring since yesterday in Brussels but have yet to fix the new prices for the Community's agricultural produce for the period 1980-1981, which is also of interest to Greece. These prices will come into force for our country on 1 January 1981, that is, immediately after Greece's accession.

OFFICIALS REACT TO USSR 'MISINTERPRETATION' OF DEFENSE PACT

[Text] It has been announced that misinterpretations are being made about the installations cited in the defense and economic cooperation agreement signed between Turkey and the United States, and it has been recalled that the installations in question were established for Turkey's defense needs and that they are under the direction of Turkish commanders. In an article on this issue published 2 days ago, the official Soviet news agency TASS alleged that the United States was trying to drag Turkey into its military preparations in the Middle East.

The Foreign Ministry information director general, Ambassador Savlet Aktug, told ANATOLIA agency that it would be useful to recall the statement by Foreign Minister Hayrettin Erkmen a while ago about the misinterpretations and suspicion-arousing reports about the installations. Commenting on an article published in PRAVDA, the official organ of the CPSU, on 27 February, Foreign Minister Erkmen recalled that Turkey was a member of a collective defense system. He said that the installations had been established as part of Turkey's defense requirements and that they were under the direction of Turkish commanders. Erkmen also stressed that Turkey was no one's police station.

GUNAYDIN CALLS FOR PARLIAMENTARY REVIEW OF PACT

NC010831 Istanbul GUNAYDIN in Turkish 30 Mar 80 p 5 NC

["The Situation in Ankara" column by Tedman Erel: "The Peace Angel of the West"]

[Excerpts] We do not wish to venture any advance comment on the advantages and disadvantages of this [U.S.-Turkish defense] agreement, which we know very little about apart from the official statements, which do not seem to be highly satisfactory. Looking at it generally, we might say that allowing another country to establish military bases on one's own territory is hazardous, and particularly so if these bases afford a giant on the other side of the ocean the possibility of watching and threatening another giant who happens to be our nextdoor neighbor. Small allies like us stand to suffer harm from the clashes of giants. And yet, Turkey appears to have linked its defense in this spirit. But are the rules of the game properly observed? What is Turkey, which has chosen to be involved in such a bargain, getting and what is it giving? Is control of the bases adequate? Have adequate guarantees been obtained so that the bases will not be used outside NATO objectives and against Middle East countries? Answering a question from a journalist after the signing of the agreement, our foreign minister said that "the military aid to Turkey is not adequate." If this agreement will not fully resolve the problems of our armed forces, how will the deficiencies be met?

We have a right to know the answers to all these questions. However, we must darw attention to a positive point at this juncture: Foreign Minister Hayrettin Erkmen has abandoned his earlier hesitancy and has announced that this agreement will be submitted to parliament for ratification. It is not clear, however, whether only the basic agreement signed by Erkmen will be submitted to parliament or whether the entire agreement, including the supplementary parts signed by a competent officer of the general staff, will be submitted. In fact, the proper thing to do is to submit the entire agreement in all its details. If parliament examines all the details of the agreement and is satisfied, it then ratifies it on behalf of our nation. If certain points have to be kept secret, then parliament meets in camera. This aspect of the matter will be discussed by parliament and also by public opinion. The decision in principle of the government to submit the agreement to parliament for ratification leaves the door open for control on the nation's behalf.

In reality, the government showed reluctance over this matter. At the TV press conference in which we also participated, Foreign Minister Erkmen stated that the agreement would be brought to the knowledge of parliament. When asked whether the agreement would also be submitted for ratification, the foreign minister gave a vague answer. This meant that the agreement might or might not be submitted for ratification.

Now we have reached a point where the ball is being passed to parliament, which should try to make a proper evaluation of this pass. The matter is very important and must be handled prudently.

The two countries will also cooperate between themselves and with relevant international organizations against trafficking in narcotics.

LEGISLATORS FAIL TO ELECT PRESIDENT IN FURTHER VOTES

TA311700 Ankara Domestic Service in Turkish 1600 GMT 31 Mar 80 TA

[Text] The ninth and tenth rounds of voting for a president by the joint session of the Senate and National Assembly today produced no results. RPP Senator from Ankara Ibrahim Ozturk was the only candidate in the voting. Ozturk received 45 votes in the ninth round, in which only 385 legislators participated. Presidentially appointed Senator Muhsin Batur, who is a member of the RRP Senate group, received 48 votes, although he was not a candidate. Justice Party Ankara Deputy Ismail Hakki Koyluoglu received 34 votes. There were 211 blank ballots; 36 votes were distributed among legislators who were not candidates; and 11 ballots were declared void. The votes were not counted in the tenth round because there was no quorum. The assembly will continue to vote for a president tomorrow.

ERBAKAN SPEAKS ON ELECTIONS, TERRORISM

[Text] National Salvation Party leader Necmettin Erbakan has said the country will solve its problems and achieve tranquility after the election of a president. Erbakan was speaking at the rally organized by his party in Izmir. He said: I do not seek to slander any particular party. It is a matter of 638 parliamentarians electing a president. There are two conflicting mentalities in the parliament. Our people want a president with a national view. Our people are in favor of terminating the Western mentality. Pointing out that a large majority in the parliament favors the national view, Erbakan continued: Do not support false mentalities as if you are supporting football teams. For the past 50 years our nation has been running from one party to another. The people tried Ecevit. However, he could not do anything. Demirel promised a full shopping bag and a full cooking pot, and everything was exposed after 100 days.

In the last part of his speech Erbakan referred to the continuing terrorism in the country and said: Are we at war? Even a battle does not involve as many bombs. It is impossible to walk through the streets of Istanbul after dark. There are quarters in Istanbul, Izmir and Ankara which are impossible to enter. There are provinces in eastern Anatolia which are impossible to enter.

TCP DENIES TIES WITH ALLEGED NEW 'MAOIST' PARTY

[Unattributed commentary: "A New Means of Escalating Terrorism"]

[Excerpts] A new Maoist terrorist party has been launched into the market: the so-called Turkish Revolutionary Communist Party [Turkiye Devrimci Komunist Partisi]. In the pamphlets it distributes this so-called party claims to be a continuation of the Turkish Communist Party [TCP] founded by Mustafa Suphi and his friends. It also claims that by existing it fulfills the wishes of the leaders of the THKO [Turkish Peoples' Liberation Army]. It is already obvious that this small party which, it is alleged, was founded by the partisans of the Maoist Terrorist People's Liberation Group [Halkin Kurtulusu Grubu] will be used by the ruling classes to escalate terrorism by making the TCP--whose respectability is increasingly growing in the country and which is beginning to be accepted as the real alternative in the hearts of the masses because of its continuous and determined struggle--seem the center of terrorism.

Our assessment was confirmed by a report published in the 25 March issue of the fascist newspaper HERGUN. First, this newspaper announced that this Maoist terrorist party was established. Secondly by publishing the provocative report that this small party will begin its attacks throughout the country on 30 March on the orders of the TCP, the newspaper tried to slander the TCP with the terrorism organized by the ruling classes and directed by MIT [National Intelligence Organization] and the CIA.

This terrorist organization does not and cannot have anything to do with the principles and ideals set forward by the TCP's founder Mustafa Suphi and his friends who struggled and died for them, nor with Leninist party norms and principles. As for the allegation that the establishment of this Maoist terrorist organization fulfilled the wishes of the leaders of the THKO, let us immediately point out that even though they resorted to the wrong struggle methods, Deniz Gezmis, Husyin Inan, Yusuf Aslan and the others struggled for the country's independence against imperialism, NATO, the bilateral agreements and the bases. They never fell into the quagmire of anticommunism and anti-Sovietis. Those who swim in this quagmire, those who attack the TCP, the Soviet Union--which is the fortress of peace in the world and the foundation of the world communist movement and of the national liberation wars--and the other socialist countries cannot be their [THKO leaders'] heirs.

Those who emerge with the name of Turkish Revolutionary Communist Party can only play one role: that of being a means of aggression in the hands of the reactionary ruling classes against the working class, the progressive and democratic forces and against the TCP. The working class, the progressive and democratic forces and our people are already aware of the true character of this nest of provocateurs.

BRIEFS

AGRICULTURAL PROTOCOL WITH ROMANIA--Turkey and Romania signed today in Ankara a protocol on agricultural cooperation and exchange of technological knowhow. The protocol envisages the exchange of seeds, planting materials, publications, scientific documents and experts between the research and production departments of the two countries' agricultural ministries. The protocol also stipulates that the two countries will cooperate in various fields of agriculture such as the food and fodder industry and chicken, grain, corn, sunflower, flower and fish production as well as pesticides. CARDINAL KOENIG WRITES TO BREZHNEV ON FREEDOM OF RELIGION

["PEW," KATHPRESS report: "Cardinal Koenig to Brezhnev: 'Grant Freedom of Religion'"]

[Text] Vienna/Salzburg (PEW, KATHPRESS)--"In his capacity as chairman of the Austrian bishops conference, but also as an Austrian citizen" Cardinal Koenig has appealed to Soviet state and party chief Brezhnev to "review and to newly formulate the interpretation of the term freedom of religion" in the spirit of the Helsinki documents.

In his letter written in Russian, which was handed over to the Soviet Embassy in Italy, the cardinal states: "I know your Constituion which in article 52 guarantees the citizens freedom of conscience and grants them the right to belong to any religion and to perform acts of worship. However, I also know the attitude of your party, which regards religion as a harmful element in public and social life. Hence you interpret freedom of religion merely as freedom to perform acts of worship." However, freedom of religion, as understood by other countries, means that adults and young people can publicly profess their religious faith without fear, Cardinal Koenig adds. He also appeals to Brezhnev to release three imprisoned Orthodox priests.

In Salzburg [no date given] about 1,000 Catholics, headed by Archbishop Berg and Bishops Mayr and Wagner, staged a silent protest march against the persecution of priests and other believers in the USSR and for the granting of freedom of religion in accordance with human rights.

AIR FORCE TO RECEIVE MODIFIED MIRAGE FIGHTERS

LD311315 [Editorial Report LD] Paris LE MONDE in French on 27 March 1980 carries on page 8 an 800-word Jacques Isnard report on modifications to the design of the French Mirage-2000 aircraft and the delay in producing the aircraft's radar systems. Isnard reports that "the French Air Force will receive its first Mirage-2000 fighters in mid-1983 with an intermediate-generation radar system, not to be the definitive radar, which will be supplied only after May 1985." Isnard mentions that the aerodynamic qualities of the Mirage-2000 have had to be improved, that the engine's tuning at high altitude and low speed has had to be modified and that the thrust of the engine has has had to be increased. Isnard then describes the three different radar systems which will be produced in stages--the multifunction Doppler radar becoming operational in 1983, the Pulse Doppler radar in 1985 and the Antilope-5 radar in 1986. The French Air Force is expected to receive 400 Mirage-2000 planes with the three different radar systems.

E. TURKESTAN DELEGATE SUBMITS PROPOSAL TO WORLD MUSLIM CONGRESS

NC010658 Nicosia Turkish Cypriot News Bulletin in English 28 Mar 80 p 6 NC

["Full text" of "proposal" by Ismail Cengiz, "representative of East Turkestan," presented on 27 March to the eighth session of World Muslim Congress in Famagusta]

[Text] In this 8th world session of the World Muslim Congress, for the sake of the future of the whole Muslim world we see that it is the primary duty of the delegates and the spokesmen of the congress to make a deep investigation on the subject of "World Muslim Minorities."

From this point of view the World Muslim Congress, who evaluated the problems of Cyprus, Palestine, Kashmir, Eritrea, Philippines and South African states as a "basic problem," must also take into consideration the problems of the nations and communities whose countries in which 160 million Muslims are living were captured and ruined by communist China, Russia, Greece and Bulgaria.

The Muslims of the east Turkestan who are in misery under the tyranny of communist China have to put in front of the congress the following humble requests just for obtaining the "ridha" of Allah:

1. The name of "East-Turkestan," with a population of 20 million under the oppressive rule of communist China, is being changed as "Xinjiang" and left to be forgotten. The name of east Turkestan is not Xinjiang but is east Turkestan. For this reason the Muslim countries are kindly requested not to accept the name Xinjiang and to be decisive on this matter.

2. Any kind of visit, whether touristic or not, is not allowed to and from east Turkestan. The Muslim countries are requested to take steps for obtaining free visits and movements of the Turkestani refugees in order to visit their relatives in their homelands.

3. The Muslim faith and prayers in east Turkestan have been abolished. The freedom of religion must be given to the 20 million Muslims in Turkestan in order to perform their prayers freely. The Muslims of east Turkestan, who are in a great need of our holy book, Koran, must have it sent to them.

4. For the purpose of learning the affairs of the Muslims of the east Turkestan a delegation of the World Muslim Congress must be sent to east Turkestan.

We hope and pray to Allah the Almighty that the above demands and wishes of the 20 million east Turkestan Muslims will be met with the sympathy of the World Muslim Congress in its 8th world session and a decision will be taken. We pray to Allah that this congress be useful and successful for the whole Muslim world.

COLUMNIST CRITICIZES CARTER'S LACK OF LEADERSHIP

DW281135 Bonn DIE WELT in German 28 Mar 80 p 6 DW

[Thomas Kielinger article: "More Trouble Than Loyalty"]

[Text] What are the anxieties that might have driven the shah out of Panama--did he have the feeling that he is no longer adequately protected in the American hemisphere?

How come the voters in New York and Connecticut have so thoroughly overcome their dislike for Kennedy, which they had shared with the rest of the nation for weeks? Have they suddenly discovered reliability, clarity and force of leadership in him--or were they not seized by doubts about the reliability of the leadership of the incumbent in the White House?

If it is true that Secretary of State Cyrus Vance is toying with the idea of resigning shortly, is it really just his longing for his law practice or has he given up over the foreign policy zigzags of his president?

The United States finds itself in a serious leadership crisis which reduces confidence throughout the world and promotes a worldwide movement away from the United States. The picture which we see in Washington today is fragmented, without any force to inspire. We are face to face with a presidency which elicits more trouble than loyalty, more frustration than calm, more protest than acclamation.

The Israelis refuse to comply with a White House request to postpone all plans pertaining to settlements in occupied Arab territories until 26 May. They are doing this in observance of the old poker player's rule that you try to stake out your own position as far as possible prior to another round of negotiations at a summit level. But they are doing this also because they have lost confidence in the U.S. Middle East policy owing to Washington's erratic tactics in the United Nations, which tactics are still as incomprehensible as they were before.

The alliance partners, foremost of all France, have been flirting with a political role independent from the Americans to an increasing extent for quite some time now. Granted, this development began prior to the era of the Carter administration. Yet we cannot overlook the fact that Carter's foreign policy is enhancing the inclination toward a process of deserting Washington. The President has neglected the most elementary rules of coordination with the alliance. Now the Europeans have prepared their own Middle East initiative in the event, deemed nearly certain, that the autonomy negotiations between Israel and Egypt fail. And there is no such thing as the solidarity of Europe on post-Afghanistan policy.

The lack of backing in the alliance is now beginning to trigger repercussions in the United States. The U.S. sports organizations, and even top Republican candidate Ronald Reagan, are voicing doubts about the prudence of the Olympic boycott. If we are the only nation that ultimately stays away from the games, they say, then the moral claim of having boycotted Moscow because of Afghanistan will be neutralized by our isolation. They say that there must be something about our position that is not convincing, that is untenable, which explains why it has been followed so little on a worldwide basis.

There is no reason to applaud the Europeans for their inability to produce solidarity with the United States. France's egotism deserves no laurel wreath, nor does Bonn's balancing act. France, at least since the time of Charles de Gaulle, is aptly described by the New York TIMES in its editorial on Wednesday: These days it would be easier to push the Elysee Palace through the eye of a needle than for any French president to be caught alining himself with the United States.

The question must be asked, however: How much did the U.S. President contribute to undermining the respect for the leading American power in Paris, Bonn or elsewhere? Even De Gaulle, despite all the anti-American resentment, maintained a bit of respect for John F. Kennedy.

Eventually there are the Americans themselves: Many of them are losing patience with regard to Jimmy Carter's attempts to govern. They continue to be upset by the ayatollah's frenzy in Tehran. They find it shameful to leave the shah, an ally for 37 long years, to the care of an endangered ally such as Egypt's As-Sadat. They do not have a patent recipe either for solving the hostage affair, but many are no longer favorably impressed with the President, giving the crisis as an excuse, virtually holing up in the White House "bunker." And eventually the grumbling will increase over an inflation that cannot be tamed and which is beginning to lower the living standard of the man in the street--and Washington's worldwide ability to maneuver.

These are times of permanent crises, times of erosion of the American claim for leadership. The election campaign does not inspire anybody--it does not seem to produce candidates with an electrifying strength to convince. For the time being the American ship of state is drifting along.

Many things give the impression of being very transitory--tomorrow many things, such as the results of the primaries, may be different. It still seems unimaginable for a president not to be able to gain renomination and reelection. But if he is able to manage, it will probably be because of the advantage of his being in office, and because nobody better seems to be available. Carter has experienced heights, but they have come about due to events--he has not managed, as did Churchill, to create inspiration in a crisis. The people have rallied around their President, and now they are still standing and waiting. Once the events fade, the president will also fade, but the people feel that the events were not supposed to fade, and that makes many of them impatient and irritated. Carter, the man without exceptional qualities, the man who reverses himself over and over again, does not merely not look like a leader, he really is not leading yet.

FRG EFFORTS IN TEHRAN HOSTAGE AFFAIR WEIGHED

OW011102 Cologne Deutschlandfunk Network in German 0605 GMT 1 Apr 80 DW

[Press review on European efforts to help in U.S. hostage problem]

[Excerpt] Discussing the Iranian conflict, STUTTGARTER NACHRICHTEN says in part: The dance which is currently being performed on the various international stages over the liberation of the U.S. hostages in Tehran is a masterpiece of diplomatic coordination. This remains so even if the smart alecks and agitators in the U.S. election campaign are doing their best to expose U.S. President Carter to ridicule. It is a fact, meanwhile, that not a single critic can show a different way out of the dilemma. By the force of circumstances Carter, after long inner struggles, made up his mind to give a restrained admission to guilt for actual or alleged sins for which he is the least culpable. The United States thinks that the actual or alleged admission of U.S. misdeeds will be sufficient to help Tehran save face. In the United States, too, the anticipated release of the hostages will divert attention from the fact that an admission of guilt has been given as a price for it. There is no doubt in Washington that in the event Carter's efforts fail, other voices will be heard. Carter will then find it very difficult to refrain from using the extensive sanctions that have been mentioned.

L'UNITA: PCI WILL NOT ATTEND CONFERENCE OF EUROPEAN CP'S

AU02C828 Rome ANSA in English 0810 GMT 2 Apr 80 AU

[Text] Rome, April 2 (ANSA)--The Italian Communist Party (PCI) announced today in the party daily L'UNITA that it has no intention to attend the proposed conference of European communist parties to discuss installation of new missile systems in Western Europe. The conference was proposed by the French and Polish Communist parties. The Spanish Communist Party has already announced that it will not attend.

L'UNITA said that the conference "risks not only being hardly useful but actually damaging to the very objectives of detente and disarmament in whose name it is being proposed.

"The question is whether a conference of only communists is the most suitable forum to discuss the problems of peace and disarmament. Wide debate on these issues is underway in Europe, with the participation of communist parties as well as socialist and social democrat parties, Catholic movements and organizations as well as other groups. The debate concerns not only a joint action for peace but also the methods to make such an action possible and effective.

"A conference of communist parties would give the impression of isolating communist parties from this wide grouping. Moreover, the various communist parties have different positions toward the issues at hand. Some of them are in the lead of nations that have large quantities of armaments and constitute one of the two military blocs present on the continent. Other parties, such as ours, are in a completely different situation. Therefore, our responsibility and duties towards disarmament are different," L'UNITA concluded.

PCI LEADERS ON PCF ATTACKS, RESUMPTION OF CHINESE CONTACTS

AU011955 Rome ANSA in English 1945 GMT 1 Apr 80 AU

[Text] Rome, April 1 (ANSA)--Two leading members of the Italian Communist Party (PCI) today rejected recent attacks from the French Communists with one of them admitting that the PCI's policy of "unitary intentions" could be taken to refer additionally to the imminent resumption of summit contacts between the Italian and the Chinese communists.

The PCI recently came under heavy fire from the pro-Moscow secretary of the French Communist Party, Georges Marchais, for a meeting between PCI Secretary Enrico Berlinguer and French Socialist Party Secretary Francois Mitterrand. The meeting sparked Marchais' ire because Mitterrand is his closet rival for the allegiance of the French leftwing vote and because, unlike himself, Berlinguer has consistently dissented from Moscow on problems such as the Afghan crisis.

Interviewed for this morning's issue of the Rome daily, LA REPUBBLICA, the head of the PCI's foreign bureau, Gian Carlo Pajetta made it clear that there was no question of his party "supporting Mitterrand against Marchais".

"But at the same time", he said, "we would not understand, and it would be impossible to conceive, a veto from Marchais. If we say to all the communist parties that unity with the socialists is something of extreme importance, we are clearly not going to go to any socialist party to talk badly about the communist, or vice versa. We also go with unitary intentions".

Elsewhere in the interview, Pajetta admitted that this concept of "unitary intentions" could also be taken as referring to the spirit with which Berlinguer will visit China in the near future, marking the official resumption of inter-party relations broken off under the pressures of the Soviet-Chinese split many years ago.

"I hope we shall also find understanding among those who may not be enthusiastic, or may have more than a little doubt, over this initiative of ours," Pajetta said on Berlinguer's trip to Beijing.

As for the PCI's relations with Moscow and the Soviet Party, Pajetta said they could be described as consisting of "full autonomy of judgement and movement". Other factors which Pajetta saw as reflecting the PCI's policy of "unitary intentions" and the need for "usefully working together" included Eurocommunism, the attempt to give the West European communist parties their own, independent line.

"We have always considered the foundation of Eurocommunism as being a unitary policy towards the socialist parties in Europe", he said, "and, as far as Italy is concerned, towards the democratic popular movement that refers back to Catholicism". We have never considered it (Eurocommunism) as a banner for the entrenchment and isolation of the communists. On the contrary, we have seen it as overcoming the residues of conceptions and methods that could isolate us".

Knowledgeable observers of the PCI said it was no coincidence that concepts similar to those of "unitary intentions" and "usefully working together" should also mark an editorial published in this morning's edition of the party daily, L'UNITA.

The article signed by a member of the PCI's steering committee, Giorgio Napolitano, carried the title, "A More United Left Serves Europe and Peace".

Like Pajetta's more informal remarks to LA REPUBLICA, Napolitano laid the stress on the need for overcoming the historical divergencies between socialist and communists, especially before pressures from conservatives for a return to the cold war in Europe. He also cited not only the PCI's contact with Mitterrand, but also with West German Social Democrat Willy Brandt and various other socialist and social democrat parties, including the British Laborites, indignantly rejecting charges that these were merely "cunning maneuvers" to open the doors of the Rome government to Communist participation.

According to the observers, Napolitano's editorial [words indistinct] a more formal statement than Pajetta's interview, of the PCI's reply to Marchais, possibly a smoke-signal for Moscow too.

PCI DELEGATION'S VISIT TO INDIA REPORTED

LD310911 Rome L'UNITA in Italian 22 Mar 80 p 18 LD

[Unattributed report: "PCI Delegation Visits Indira Gandhi"]

[Text] Rome--The PCI delegation, composed of Central Committee member Comrade Giuliano Pajetta and Comrade Carlo Guelfi of the Economic Policy Studies Center Steering Committee, which has spent 2 weeks in India, returned to Rome yesterday.

In New Delhi the PCI delegation had meetings with the Communist Party of India [CPI] Secretariat, with the CPI-Marxist Politburo and with the Congress Party secretary in charge of international affairs, Buta Singh.

Comrades Giuliano Pajetta and Guelfi were received by Prime Minister Indira Gandhi, to whom they conveyed a personal message from Enrico Berlinguer. There followed a lenghty and cordial conversation on the problems of the international situation and of both countries.

The PCI delegation, which had several meetings with figures from the political, academic and journalistic worlds, travelled next to Calcutta, Madras, Bombay and Trivandrum, the capital of Kerala: In these cities it met with representatives of leftwing Indian parties and had broad talks with the prime ministers of the western Bengal and Kerala governments.

The Indian newspapers gave prominent coverage to the PCI delegation's visit, stressing the delegation's foreign policy stances and the significance of official contacts between the PCI and the CPI-Marxists and between the PCI and the Congress Party.

RED BRIGADES COMMANDO ATTACKS DC MEETING IN MILAN

AU020845 Rome ANSA in English 0830 GMT 2 Apr 80 AU

[Text] Milan, April 2 (ANSA)--A "Red Brigades" commando raided a Christian Democrat (DC) local party headquarters in Milan last night, kneecapping four persons. The commando was made up of three or four persons, including a woman. They had guns equipped with silencers. Before leaving the "DC" office they took the documents of the thirty-odd persons who were attending a meeting.

The kneecapped victims are former Deputy Nadir Tedeschi, 52, a member of the national party leadership; Eros Robbiani, 50, secretary of the local party office and two other members.

The commando sprayed slogans on the walls such as "Honor to our members who have been killed," in reference to four members of the "Red Brigades" urban guerrillas organization killed in a shoot-out with police in Genoa a few days ago.

INDUSTRIAL TURNOVER UP 24.2 PERCENT IN 1979

AU290910 Rome ANSA in English 0840 GMT 29 Mar 80 AU

[Text] Rome, March 29 (ANSA)--Italy's industrial turnover for 1979 rose 24.2 percent compared to the previous year.

The large increase was chalked up in the chemical industries (up 42.5 percent), followed by textiles (32.4 percent), the working on non-metallic minerals (25.7 percent), metallurgy (up 20.4 percent), the mechanical industry (up 20 percent), food (17.8) and the construction of means of transport (13.3 percent).

The central statistics board also noted that December 1979 showed an increase in the general index of industrial turnover (calculated in terms of sales expressed in current prices) of 27.8 percent compared to the like month in 1978.

BELGIAN PREMIER SUPPORTS CSCE FOLLOWUP CONFERENCE

LD020709 Barcelona LA VANGUARDIA in Spanish 26 Mar 80 pp 3-4 LD

[Unattributed report on Belgian Prime Minister Wilfried Martens 25 March press conference in Madrid: "CSCE Must Be Held"]

[Excerpt] Madrid, 25 March--Belgian Prime Minister Wilfried Martens held a press conference this afternoon in the Madrid hotel where he is staying, at which he explained the scope of his contacts with Spanish Prime Minister Adolfo Suarez. "The talks," he said, "took place in a cordial and relaxed atmosphere and were characterized by a climate of trust and friendly frankness." He explained that the main topics at the talks were the Mideast situation, the international implications of the Soviet intervention in Afghanistan, the CSCE in Madrid, current EEC problems and Latin America and its relations with Europe.

"It is a fact that the Spanish Government maintains special and traditional relations with the Arab world," Prime Minister Martens said; "Prime Minister Suarez explained to me that his government's desire is to continue reasserting these relations and to use them to improve relations between Europe and the Arab countries and between the United States and the Arab countries. They will also aid the peace process which must become established in the area."

With regard to the Soviet invasion of Afghanistan and its consequences, Martens said that both he and his Foreign Minister Simonet "explained to Prime Minister Suarez and Minister Oreja the idea of the neutral status suggested by the Nine--that is, the USSR's withdrawal, the establishment of a government which will declare its neutrality and the noninterference of the superpowers and the other countries of the area."

On the subject of the CSCE, Mr Martens said that "the USSR's intervention in Afghanistan modifies the prospects for the Madrid conference, but it is desirable that it take place, and this stance is shared by the Nine and the other Western countries. Furthermore, we believe that the conference must be at ministerial level, that a balance must be maintained among the various baskets--human rights, the economy, detente--and last, that it is desirable that the military aspect of defense be the subject of a subsequent conference."

Spain's EEC Entry

The Belgian prime minister described the present situation within the EEC as follows: "The most important problems at present are Britain's participation in the EEC budget and the 1980 agricultural prices and budget." With regard to Spain's membership, he said: "Spain is determined to multiply its contacts of political cooperation with the nine member countries and Belgium is in favor of such consultations. Spain does not want to act as a bridge or an intermediary between Europe and Latin America, but to draw Europe and Latin America closer together. It views the situation in Central America with concern and believes that Europe must have a presence in Nicaragua to prevent the Soviets and Cubans from being the only ones active there."

In answer to questions from several journalists, Prime Minister Martens explained that Spain's possible NATO membership is a subject which exclusively concerns the Spanish Government and that it was not discussed in his talks with Prime Minister Suarez. He also said that Spain has an important role to play in resolving the Mideast crisis and that they did not discuss with Suarez the need for Spain to open diplomatic relations with Israel if it wants to join the EEC.

PA012246 Madrid EFE in Spanish 2141 GMT 1 Apr 80 PA

[Text] Palma de Mallorca, 1 Apr (EFE)--Omar Torrijos, commander of the National Guard and former president of Panama, said here today that the former shah of Iran left Panama of his own free will and that he had not been pressured to leave. Torrijos arrived here today to spend Easter with one of his daughters. In a brief statement to newsmen at his hotel, Torrijos said the shah's stay on Contadora Island had cost him "the same as any other first-class tourist."

He said the Panama Canal now nets the nation $250 million a year instead of the $2 million it was formerly producing. He said this triumph was due not only to himself; it should be [words indistinct] to this and previous generations who had all worked toward this goal.

He was asked if he thought civil war in El Salvador is inevitable. He replied that he thinks if the three armed groups get together and agree to a 1-week truce, they could start constructive talks.

He said King Juan Carlos, Adolfo Suarez, and Felipe Gonzalez, whom he labeled as pilot, copilot and navigator, "have guaranteed a happy landing," and that "Spain needs the three of them."

EL PAIS VIEWS SPANISH, U.S. ATTITUDES ON AMITY TREATY

LD020719 Madrid EL PAIS in Spanish 23 Mar 80 p 15 LD

[Pablo Sebastian article: "Madrid Prepares To Negotiate New Treaty With Washington Outside NATO Issue"]

[Text] Spain's relations with the United States are undergoing a period of uncertainty, as a result of the new Spanish democratic situation, the ongoing crisis in international relations and the ambiguous diplomatic stances of the Washington and Madrid governments in their respective foreign policies. It is in this unstable and changing situation that the first exploratory Spanish-U.S. talks on the renegotiation of the treaty of friendship and cooperation between the two sides, which expires in September 1981, will begin 18 April.

These negotiations are beginning from conflicting starting positions. Washington believes that the treaty should be signed and that, in addition, Spain should join NATO, in parallel or simultaneously, whereas Madrid currently regards the bilateral negotiations as having priority and as being unconnected with the NATO issue. These stances are implied, at least by the opinions of senior officials of the U.S. State and Defense departments and of the Santa Cruz Palace [Spanish Foreign Ministry], where the first preliminary reports on the future of Spanish-U.S. contractual relations have now been drawn up.

It has been noted in Washington and Madrid that this time the negotiations will be tough, real, and (taking into account the significance for defense of the future treaty or agreement), will require Spain's early formulation of a national defense or security plan (the so-called joint defense objective is being studied).

In the new dialog the Spanish Government will for the first time seek to secure a worthy and balanced agreement which will cause to be forgotten the unpleasantness of the agreements imposed by Washington on the Spanish people in the past, taking advantage of the political weakness abroad of Franco's regime, to which it gave its unconditional support.

In Washington competent interlocutors at the State Department and Pentagon emphasize that a new U.S.-Spanish treaty should never be regarded as a substitute for Spain's entry into NATO. The Carter administration asserts that the two things are complementary and compatible, and, if possible, should be almost simultaneous. They can see no possibility of Spain's joining the Atlantic alliance and not its integrated defense system (NATO), after the French model, and add that if the prospect of joining NATO forms part of a real plan on the part of the Madrid government, this should be taken into account during the negotiations.

They say at the Pentagon: "Spain's membership in the alliance's defense planning committee could appreciably alter the military content of the treaty." Both at the State Department and at the Pentagon we were cited the position of Portugal and Greece--both of which are in NATO and have bilateral treaties with the United States--as being comparable with that of Spain.

At the Santa Cruz Palace the stance is firmer and more cautious this time. In the circles close to Minister Oreja, the night in Washington when Fernando Maria Castiella said "no" to a one-sided agreement presented to him by the Americans--a stance which then cost him his sudden dismissal by Franco--has not been forgotten. There is also awareness that the Spanish democratic situation will make possible "another" kind of negotiations, very different from previous negotiations, and although it is acknowledged that the Iran and Afghanistan crises could be used by Washington to bring moral pressure to bear on Spain, it is added that these situations also enhance Spain's strategic position and strengthen it for a dialog which is expected to be lengthy and tough.

Spanish Stance

At the Foreign Ministry in Madrid the process is viewed as follows:

1--The Spanish Government deems it necessary to negotiate a new agreement with the United States, and under no circumstances to renew or extend the existing agreement, which is claimed to be imbalanced in favor of the United States.

2--Apparently, the normal thing would be for the new agreement to have the status of a treaty, although the possibility that it could now resume its former description as an agreement is not ruled out. It is known that the U.S. Senate does not seem prepared to extend the so-called grants or financial aid as compensation in bilateral treaties with other states, and less so for Spain, which is a democratic and developed country. Nor does Spain wish to receive these donations, which are difficult to justify in our case. For this reason, the description of the agreement remains unresolved.

3--It is stated at the Santa Cruz Palace that the negotiation of the treaty should remain completely separate from and outside the NATO issue, despite the fact that the United States will attempt repeatedly to raise and pursue both issues simultaneously. The elimination of any mention of NATO in the text will also be sought.

4--In the new agreement, Spain will attempt to secure greater control over the presence of foreign troops and military forces on our territory. There is talk of the possibility of reducing this presence, and the possibility that the closure of the Torrejon Base, which is very close to the Spanish capital, will be requested, because of the military risks of confrontation or an accident occasioned by this base, is not ruled out. [paragraph continues]

Greater control over the use of the joint bases by the Americans, to confine their range of action to the eastern sphere (U.S. interest in the bilateral treaty envisages an airlift) will also be achieved, and, of course, the possibility of a clause concerning automatic joint defense of both states is ruled out. However, consultations in the event of a crisis will be envisaged.

5--As compensation for the military facilities offered by Spain, the Foreign Ministry hopes to develop the areas of technological, financial, commercial and cultural cooperation, and, of course, cooperation with respect to the contribution of U.S. military equipment and academic cooperation, such as course, training and joint operations.

Lack of National Security Plan

This last topic--U.S. military cooperation--is a key point which is bound to influence the content and philosophy of the new agreement.

So far Spain has exchanged certain facilities for the U.S. Army for financial aid and already secondhand or thirdhand arms, often in very bad condition. Now the philosophy is very different: The government intends to draw up a national defense plan (joint defense objective), and once the real defense requirements have been defined, the Americans will be asked for a proportional contribution of military equipment in good condition and effective for this plan.

The lack of a national security plan--which should include not only defense aspects but also those concerning health, public order, supplies of energy and raw materials, and so forth--means that the exploratory talks with Washington, which will begin next month (and which will proceed more formally in the fall, especially when the new U.S. administration after the presidential elections is known), will encounter a gap and some disorder in the matter of compensation when it comes to defining Spain's wishes.

However, this is a topic which could be given some impetus over the next few months, if the administrative reform announced by Suarez, with a concentration of duties in several superministries, is confirmed. In this connection, rumors do not rule out the creation of a post of security advisers, similar to that held by Brzezinski in Washington.

COMMUNISTS DECIDE TO BOYCOTT PARIS MEETING

LD311940 Madrid Domestic Service in Spanish 1900 GMT 31 Mar 80 LD

[Text] The Central Committee of the Spanish Communist Party [PCE] today decided not to attend a meeting of East and West European communist parties for peace and disarmament, which will be held in Paris in April.

The reasons for not going are contained in a long document handed to the press this evening. The PCE does not feel that this meeting is appropriate to the peace objective being pursued, since it would imply some sort of alinement with the positions espoused by the countries which belong to or are related to the Warsaw Pact.

The Italian Communists, in addition to the Spaniards, have also refused to attend this meeting, which is sponsored by the French Communist Party and the Polish Communist Party.

In its document, the Spanish Communist Party restated its condemnation of the Soviet invasion of Afghanistan and U.S. policy, which is equally imperialist.

AFTENPOSTEN REPORTS PROGRESS IN JAN MAYEN ZONE TALKS

LD011529 Oslo AFTENPOSTEN in Norwegian 27 Mar 80 p 9 LD

[Morten Fyhn report: "Positive Contacts Between Norway and Iceland Over Jan Mayen"]

[Text] Helsinki, 26 March--Iceland and Norway seem to have made great progress toward agreement on a peaceful solution over the Jan Mayen zone after Foreign Minister Knut Frydenlund and his Icelandic counterpart Oladfur Johannesson discussed the question Wednesday. To begin with Iceland will probably have to give up its vigorous demand for joint administration of the Jan Mayen zone because of strong Norwegian opposition and accept instead a Norwegian fishing zone as an interim solution.

Foreign Minister Oladfur Johannesson emphasized to AFTENPOSTEN that Iceland is primarily interested in an overall solution which embraces both fishery resources and the continental shelf, but because Norway rejected such a solution last summer, Johannesson realizes that it would be pointless to stick to this proposal during the coming negotiations in Reykjavik on 14-15 April.

A partial solution on fishing rights would seem therefore to be the most probable, the Icelandic foreign minister said. He points out that he is an optimist with regard to the possibility of reaching agreement with Norway and says that Iceland will be able to approve Norway's right to set up a fishing zone on certain conditions.

According to what AFTENPOSTEN has heard, Johannesson is here referring to Norwegian acceptance of the condition that the Icelandic 200-mile limit will not be encroached upon, so that there is no question of the approval of a demarcation line between Iceland's zone and the planned Jan Mayen zone being drawn on the median line principle. The abandonment of the disputed area of 25,000 square kilometers is probably the greatest price Norway will have to pay to gain Icelandic recognition of a Norwegian fishing zone. There is reason to believe that Foreign Minister Knut Frydenlund has made it clear to his Icelandic counterpart that Norway may be willing to agree to this. Norway will also go to considerable lengths in fishing quota negotiations.

Frydenlund told AFTENPOSTEN that in order to win Iceland's agreement on a fishing zone around Jan Mayen, Norway would be able to give Iceland special rights in the form of agreements. Frydenlund too would have preferred to have had the whole problem solved at one strike. But because of the short time left before this summer's cod fishing it would be natural to find a solution to fishing questions, so that conflict on the spot can be avoided.

Like his Icelandic counterpart Frydenlund describes himself as an optimist, but he stresses that a number of important unanswered questions remain.

According to information that AFTENPOSTEN has received there is now a genuine desire on both sides to work out a solution which will avoid another long hot summer for Jan Mayen. The greatest problem in the coming round of talks will be to find precise formulations which Iceland thinks give sufficient guarantees that it has not given away the right to later claim a division of the resources on the continental shelf.

During the talks in Reykjavik, Iceland will formally take up her proposal for joint administration of the Jan Mayen zone. This will primarily be necessitated by domestic political considerations. The Icelandic delegation to the talks will be composed of representatives of several parties. [paragraph continues]

Against the background of previous experiences with Iceland, Norwegian optimism is guarded, despite Oladfur Johannesson's unexpected willingness to accept a fishing zone. The two foreign ministers are at the moment in Helsinki for the meeting of Scandinavian foreign ministers which begins Thursday.

The Icelandic Government has proposed an action program which will among other things insure fishing rights in the waters around Jan Mayen and guarantee Iceland's right to parts of the continental shelf around the island, NORSK TELEGRAMBYRA reports from Reykjavik.

NORWAY

STOLTENBERG REBUFFS USSR ATTACKS ON NATO STOCKPILING

LD281427 Oslo AFTENPOSTEN in Norwegian 24 Mar 80 p 11 LD

[NORSK TELEGRAMBYRA report: "Stoltenberg: Soviet Press Misinforms"]

[Text] "It is not in the interests of goodneighborliness for the Soviet press to print incorrect information about our country," Defense Minister Thorvald Stoltenberg said in an address to Ostfold Labor Party's annual meeting in Halden on Saturday. Stoltenberg pointed to reports in the Soviet press on the NATO "Anorak Express" exercises and the plan for contingency stockpiling of military equipment in Norway.

He repeated that there is no question of stockpiling nuclear weapons in Norway and emphasized that the stockpiles will be under full Norwegian control.

"It will be Norwegians who will be in charge of the stockpiles and who will see to the necessary maintenance of the equipment being stored," he said.

Stoltenberg pointed out that it will not be a new feature of Norwegian defense policy to stockpile materials in advance.

"As early as 1961 we began to set up contingency stockpiles of ammunition and fuel for aircraft. Later aircraft parts also came into the picture. But contingency stockpiling of conventional materials for land forces is both time consuming and difficult to initiate," he said.

He emphasized that allied exercises have taken place in Norway over a number of years and that the distance between the exercise areas and the Soviet border has been around 500 km.

With regard to the earmarking of NATO forces for deployment in Norwary, the defense minister said that a Canadian force of between 4,000 and 5,000 men has Norway as its area of deployment.

"Our emergency defense plans are built first and foremost on our own troops. The allied land force reinforcements and the facilities for the contingency stockpiling of some of their equipment on Norwegian territory amount to only a fraction of what we ourselves can provide in a given situation. Our most important task is to work out support arrangements which will discourage war at the same time as maintaining the low tension in our national security policies with regard to our neighbors," he said.

GOVERNMENT ISSUES 1980 WHITE PAPER ON DEFENSE

LD020929 London PRESS ASSOCIATION in English 0430 GMT 2 Apr 80 LD

[Text] Britain's battle against inflation and any improved health care and education rests "on sand" without the national security provided by defence, the government says today. The 1980 defence White Paper--the first issued by Mrs Thatcher's government--is a clarion call for improving Britain's military machine "in the face of the threat posed to us by the build-up of the Warsaw Pact." It firmly reasserts defence as one of the government's top priorities, with a 3.5 percent boost in real terms in military spending, bringing it to a total of 8,001 million pounds at last year's prices, and 10,784 million pounds at 1980/81 estimated prices. The government pledges to continue 3 percent "real growth" in defence expenditure in 1981/82, and the two years after, producing budgets of between 8,243 million pounds and 8,745 million pounds at 1979 survey prices.

"We live in a country which...cannot expect to opt out of the harsher realities of today. We cannot expect peace and security free of charge," says the White Paper. "We would all much rather spend the scarce resources upon more direct benefits like housing, education, health, improving our environment and personal expenditure. But the hard fact is that defence spending is not an alternative to policies of this kind. It is an essential pre-condition for them, or at least for our having any assurance of enjoying their fruits. Without the national security which defence capability provides, plans to contain inflation, restore incentives, secure economic growth, improve our health care and our children's education rest on sand, for the national life in which these objectives can be pursued in peace and freedom may disappear beyond recall. To insure against that danger means effort, sacrifice and expense."

The White Paper stresses that Britain "must make it clear to any potential adversaries that they cannot--save at the gravest risk to themselves--resort to the use of threat of armed force to further their interests at the expense of our own. "The fate of Afghanistan has reminded us forcibly of these lessons. It shows our opponents have both the power to make new territorial and strategic gains and the nerve to use that power."

"If we are not to witness further such adventures in even more sensitive areas for the West, we must respond with firmness and resolve and in solidarity with all the free nations of the world."

The document emphasises that it is a basic Marxist-Leninist tenet that "communism will ultimately be extended to every nation and that its spread should be promoted, if necessary, by military means when the circumstances are right." After Afghanistan, "the Soviet Union will, we believe, continue to watch for opportunities to build up its influence in further countries, and will be ready again to use force. The objective of this drive for influence is to limit and reduce the influence and then the security of the West."

As expected, there was no decision in the White Paper on the siting of the 160 American-owned and operated ground-launched cruise missiles in Britain--part of a NATO answer to new Soviet armoury. The choice would be announced as soon as possible after full account had been taken of "environmental considerations but the final decisions will have to be governed mainly by military factors," it says. The White Paper also promises a decision "soon" on the replacement for the Polaris strategic nuclear force. It stresses that Warsaw Pact reinforcements would only have to travel about 450 miles from the Soviet Union to the Central European front, against the 3,000 miles which most of NATO's reinforcements would have to come.

This fact about the Central European balance "points up the limited relevance of the much-publicised Soviet decision to withdraw 20,000 men and 1,000 tanks from East Germany," it declares. "A reduction of Soviet forces on this scale, although welcome, will have hardly any effect on the existing imbalance."

The current balance in Central Europe continues to show a growing gap between NATO and Warsaw Pact forces. Soldiers in fighting units (a 1.0 to 1.2 ratio in favour of communist forces), artillery (1.0 to 2.8) and fixed wing aircraft (1.0 to 2.3) all show increasing strengths of the Warsaw Pact military machine, although the NATO forces include French forces in Germany despite France pulling out of NATO's military structure.

The White Paper points out problems to be overcome if the 55,000-strong British Rhine Army and RAF Germany "are to be fully effective."

"The units of the British Army of the Rhine (BOAR) are under strength, which has necessitated the undermanning of some Chieftain tanks, and the reduction of one company to cadre strength in many infantry battalions." Manpower shortages and duty in Northern Ireland have "imposed a degree of overstretch on some units and the RAF helicopters which support them, with adverse effects on training and readiness. We need to improve BOAR's anti-armour and air defence capabilities, and to speed up the arrangements for the reinforcement of BOAR in an emergency."

"For the RAF, we need to provide aircraft, weapons and training needed to make up for the Warsaw Pact's advantage in numbers and steady improvement in quality. It will take time and scarce resources to solve all these problems."

On the RAF's accident rate, the White Paper stresses that of the 25 flying accidents last year, only three will probably be shown to have been caused by low flying. "To put matters into persepctive, in...1969-78, 10 civilian deaths are attributable to RAF aircraft accidents; in the same period, 26,769 pedestrians were killed in road accidents."

The government, believing that British forces should be able to operate effectively outside the NATO area, is considering a number of plans to improve the services' worldwide capability. These include extra transport aircraft, more supply ships, stockpiles of military equipment and improvements to the army's home defence formation, which would also be capable of undertaking global tasks. From this month, a parachute battalion will be available to provide a parachute capability at one week's notice.

On service pay, the White Paper stresses the government belief that the men and women of the armed forces "have been under-valued in recent years" and reaffirms its commitment to maintaining the comparability of service pay with civilian life.

Among plans for equipment, it promises an order for a Trafalgar-class nuclear submarine this year, further orders for the Broadsword class super-frigates and the plastic-hulled Brecon minehunters/sweepers, at 25 million pounds each.

The navy has abandoned plans to convert the Royal Fleet auxiliary tarbatness [as received] for amphibious warfare tasks as not cost-effective. But an order will be placed later this year for the first batch of new landing craft.

CARRINGTON INTERVIEWED EUROPEAN, ON EUROPEAN, INTERNATIONAL ISSUES

LD021021 Rotterdam NRC HANDELSBLAD in Dutch 29 Mar 80 p 4 LD

[Steven de Winter and W. Woltz interview with British Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs Carrington in London: "Compromise Does Not Lie Halfway Between Fair and Unjust"--date of interview not specified]

[Text] "Did I say something to Chris van der Klaauw that could create difficulties? No, I do not think so. He is such a nice man. The last thing I would want to do is cause difficulties for him." Lord Carrington looked at us expectantly. "No, I do not think I did," he confirmed and the British secretary of state for foreign and Commonwealth affairs was able to go to his next appointment with an easy mind.

Lord Carrington had set aside just 30 minutes for an interview with these Dutch journalists. However, "if he is not bored he may give you longer," his secretary told us encouragingly when the appointment was made. Therefore 55 minutes does not seem to be a bad score.

"When I became secretary of state for foreign and Commonwealth affairs I said that Europe was our priority. That is true and remains true. However the problem was that we had had a millstone round our neck for 15 years. That was Rhodesia. The situation was so serious that I did not think it was possible to have any British foreign policy because our policy was overshadowed by Rhodesia. We have now solved that problem and can concentrate on other things."

Lord Carrington's world picture is as follows: "Postwar Britain is totally different from prewar Britain. Perhaps it took us too long to realize that the end of World War II was the end of an era. You could see the start of the process of changing the British Empire into the Commonwealth. We are no longer a superpower. However we were still a European medium power, just like France and Germany. And give or take a few million inhabitants the same can be said of the Netherlands, Belgium, Italy and the rest. The only way in which you can exert influence as a medium power is to work together with like-minded people. The very fact that Europe has one opinion on the Middle East or Afghanistan has much more effect than the voice of just one country. It may have taken us too long to realize that we belong to Europe as regards foreign policy.

"However, we are dependent on the United States for our security and strategic nuclear deterrent. Therefore any sensible European policy must inevitably be based on the Atlantic alliance and on friendship with the United States.

"As regards the Commonwealth and the Third World, we still have ties throughout the world through our colonial past. We adhere firmly to these links and want to do all we can to promote the development of the countries for which we were once responsible.

"Therefore I think that the three areas of foreign policy in which British interests lie fit together well and are in no way a source of conflict."

Afghanistan

[Question] How did that work in the case of Afghanistan? You proposed that Afghanistan be made a neutral country. However, the Russians refuse to discuss the matter and your European partners have not yet definitely rejected your plan, out of politeness. Your plan seems to be finished. You wanted to punish the Russians by boycotting the Olympic games. However the British Olympic committee decided this week to go to Moscow. What will you do now?

Lord Carrington: I agree with virtually nothing of what you have said. When you spend a lot of time, as the European foreign ministers do, in meetings about political cooperation in order to try to establish a common European policy, it seems a little strange if you do not have a meeting with your colleagues when a question like Afghanistan arises. This was a big mistake which the nine foreign ministers made. I take my share of responsibility for it. However, you are greatly exaggerating this matter since all the European countries have exactly the same analysis on Afghanistan. The difference of opinion lies in the way in which we should react to the Soviet Union's actions. I think that these different views arise from history and geographical position. For instance, Germany has a very different view of the Soviet Union than does France or Britain. They have to worry about East Germany, they have Berlin and the ostpolitik to consider and they are also due to have elections. We do not have to worry about any of those things. Our relationship with the Soviet Union is entirely different from Germany's.

You say that my proposal for a neutral Afghanistan is dead.... Of course it is not dead! The European Community was certainly not lukewarm about it. It regarded it as a good idea. The problem is that if you start something like this you do not expect any immediate encouragement from the Soviet Union. However that does not mean that you should not continue trying to obtain something from them and you must consider that nobody else has had a constructive idea about how to get the Soviet Union out of Afghanistan.

To turn to the Olympic games. The British Olympic committee has taken a decision which I consider to be wrong. However, I do not think that this decision is irrevocable. If the Americans decide not to go, and the Germans, and you and the French, I do not think they will go. But why are you so negative?

Reaction

[Question] You did not expect any immediate reaction to your proposal for a neutral Afghanistan. When do you expect a reaction?

Lord Carrington: First we must arouse interest from the Third World, the nonalined countries and the Islamic countries. The greater the support is the more pressure can be exerted on the Soviet Union to negotiate. That will certainly take a few months.

[Question] You were disappointed about the break in mutual discussions among the Nine over Afghanistan.

Lord Carrington: It was around 27 December that it started. You and I were at home full of turkey and plum pudding. The chairmanship of the European Council had just passed from the Irish to the Italians and in saying that I do not imply any criticism. However, it happened at a bad time. I do not think that there is any adequate automatic procedure to warn us that we should meet. I think that we must agree on a method whereby two or three people pick up the telephone and call the chairman with the result that a meeting is called.

[Question] That seems fairly simple....

Lord Carrington: Very simple. But surely all ideas are? Or do you want something complicated?

[Question] Were you pleased with the postponement of the European summit?

Lord Carrington: No. I understand the internal problems in Italy but we want the question settled as quickly as possible.

[Question] After his visit to you last Monday, Dutch [Foreign] Minister van der Klaauw suggested that you would be satisfied with a compromise--an amount halfway toward the requested 600 million pounds. [sentence as published]

Lord Carrington: With all due respect to the help the Netherlands has given, that is absolutely unacceptable. A compromise does not lie halfway between what is fair and what is unjust. We cannot go on with the completely unreasonable situation in which Britain, given its per capita income, pays much more than any other country. Every other country makes a profit from the Community, aside from the Germans who are twice as rich as us and our country. I cannot conceive that the rest of Europe will reject our wishes, which are clearly just and reasonable. I just cannot imagine that they will say: Go to hell with your problems. Just pay up.

Do not forget that we have asked for a "just return" (total balance between benefits and payments). We are prepared to go on contributing a few hundred million net. That is generous, in view of the fact that ours is the poorest country in the Community after Italy and Ireland.

Own Fault

[Question] It has been argued that the difficulties are largely the fault of your country: Britain has not made full use of the EC's economic possibilities.

Lord Carrington: That is true, we are partly responsible. When we joined we were assured that the agricultural policy's share of spending would be reduced from 60 percent to 40 percent. The reverse has happened. Agriculture is now absorbing 75 percent. At that time the Commission also promised that if this development caused unreasonable damage to a member state the matter could be renegotiated. We are now suffering an unreasonable amount of damage and therefore we want a solution. You might say that British industry has lagged behind. I agree but we now have a British Government which wants to remedy this situation and we have the extra burden of 1.2 billion pounds. Why do you think that we introduced such a tough budget this week? Do you think it is making us popular and winning us votes?

[Question] Why is Prime Minister Thatcher threatening to withhold contributions and why are you refusing to discuss an overall compromise package?

Lord Carrington: Mrs Thatcher has simply said that if we do not achieve anything and have to consider further steps, withholding contributions is one of the possibilities. Therefore it was a statement of fact not a threat. We think that every question should be judged on its own merits. We want discussion above all, we defend our case and the others give their views. Call it linkage if you like, I say that it is commonsense.

Monetary System

[Question] When will your country join the European monetary system?

Lord Carrington: The answer is: As soon as we would not upset the system. I want to join it, we all do--but just look at what would have happened if we had joined 1 year ago. The British pound rose sharply because the value is based on oil and bears little relation to our real economic position. This is very damaging to our exports: The pound sterling is usually valued too high.

[Question] Do you think the exchange rate should be reduced and will your government take steps in that direction?

Lord Carrington: I do indeed think that the exchange rate must come down. Do not ask me how because the international money market has always been a closed book to me.

[Question] You said that Rhodesia took up a great deal of energy. What can we expect when the Foreign Office's full creative power is used to make the EC work better?

Lord Carrington: When these financial questions are once solved (he repeated arguments about fair play, justice and so forth--interviewers' note), we will make a full and constructive contribution to further development. The agricultural policy, for instance, is not just a British problem. I can see how the system developed but when you examine the system from a distance and see that 40 percent of the budget is used to finance excess dairy produce which is then sold to the Soviet Union at a loss, it does not seem so logical. We will soon reach financial limits in the agriculture sphere, therefore the situation must be reviewed. We also want to contribute to building political cooperation. I have spent 25 years of my life trying to obtain British membership in the EC. I believe that we will be good Europeans and can make a contribution, but the rest of Europe must give us the chance.

Middle East

[Question] You say that Europe holds the same opinion on the Middle East. However, it seems more as if President Giscard d'Estaing is stealing the show. What will Western Europe do on 26 May if Israel and Egypt fail to reach agreement on Palestinian autonomy? Will there be an addition to Security Council Resolution 242, which only mentions the refugee problem in the Middle East and not the Palestinians' right to self-determination? Who is going to propose what?

Lord Carrington: Do you not think it is a pity to talk about somebody stealing the show? I thought that this was much too serious a metter to discuss in such a way. There comes a time when the U.S. Government is naturally in less of a position to take initiatives due to the presidential elections. The Palestinians and other Arabs probably feel more strongly that something must be done. You cannot just leave them with the feeling that the Camp David agreements and the autonomy talks have failed to take sufficient account of their problems. If Europe can agree among itself on an initiative or on an addition to Resolution 242 or something similar, the Middle East dialog can be kept going. For the Israelis that means Palestinian recognition of the State of Israel and recognition of their right to live within secure borders. For the Palestinians it means that their right to self-determination would be recognized within the framework of a settlement.

[Question] Do you believe that Europe can exert pressure on Israel?

Lord Carrington: No.

[Question] Do you need U.S. support in the Security Council for an addition to Resolution 242?

Lord Carrington: In any case at least no U.S. opposition.

[Question] However, in the New York primaries President Carter....

Lord Carrington: I know about that. It is a tricky question which will raise many more problems.

[Question] Do you expect unilateral steps by a European country, for instance diplomatic status for a PLO representative?

Lord Carrington: That might happen. However, as far as we are concerned there is no question of such a step. We do not recognize any organization and hence there is no question of recognizing anything. What other countries do is up to them. However, what we have said is that we believe it is impossible not to take account of the PLO since the PLO represents an important section of the Palestinians.

Southern Africa

[Question] To turn to southern Africa. What are you going to do in that area now, after Rhodesia?

Lord Carrington: Have we not done enough?

[Question] Is it not Namibia's turn now?

Lord Carrington: Namibia is not a British problem. It is a UN problem.

[Question] There has already been talk of a boycott to push South Africa into a different direction. Did Minister van der Klaauw ask you whether Britain would join an oil boycott of South Africa?

Lord Carrington: Mr van der Klaauw told me that a proposal had been made to Parliament about an oil boycott. He asked me for my personal reaction. Well, we do not believe that anything can be achieved by this sort of action. On the contrary, the more you act in this way the more the country against which your taking action is united. With regard to the sanctions against Rhodesia it is absolutely certain that these sanctions held the country together for 12 years. They revived the economy and made it possible for the Rhodesians to survive. The sanctions were a challenge to them. I do not think that that is the right way of persuading a people to change their minds.

[Question] Prime Minister Thatcher said that the solution of the Rhodesian question could end South Africa's isolation. How?

Lord Carrington: That depends on what happens in Rhodesia but events there will nautrally have a great influence on the South Africans.

[Question] Can you imagine that multiracial coexistence will work in Zimbabwe....

Lord Carrington: That would certainly influence South Africa. The reverse is also true: If it does not work the influence will be negative.

Discrimination

[Question] Could events in Zimbabwe lead the South Africans to abolish apartheid?

Lord Carrington: They have already begun to do so. I think that people are either accidentally or deliberately overlooking what Premier P.W. Botha has done in South Africa. It might be incomplete in relation to the whole problem but it is very noticeable. And he is encountering political difficulties in his own country through liberalization.

[Question] However, it is not possible to discriminate just a little. Either y u discriminate or you do not. A women is never just a little bit pregnant?

Lord Carrington: I thought that that was quite easy.

[Question] Oh yes?

Lord Carrington: I have known people who are extremely tiresome, a little tiresome or usually tiresome. There are many different degrees of discrimination. I mean there can be complete isolation or only partial isolation. I think that the best thing we can do is to welcome any development which helps to reduce or remove this discrimination. Instead of saying that it is not a good thing you should welcome such steps and encourage people to do more toward this.

[Question] Should you not organize a Lancaster House conference on South Africa too?

Lord Carrington: I envisage no further Lancaster House conference at which I will take the chair. Very definitely not.

NOW! CITES REACTIONS TO REPORT ON NOVOSIBIRSK DISASTER

LD311519 London NOW! in English 28 Mar-2 Apr 80 p 5 LD

[Editorial: "A Letter to Our Readers"]

[Excerpt] The telephone rang last week in the office of our Washington correspondent Simon Barber. He was told ABC Television were photographing the front cover of the October 26 issue of NOW! complete with its bold headline--Exclusive: Russia's Secret German War Disaster.

Throughout the week similar interest had been shown by such papers as the New York TIMES and the Baltimore SUN. Five months after David Floyd's report that hundreds of people were said to have died following a mysterious accident in the Siberian city of Novosibirsk, the story was again creating world reaction.

The sudden revival of interest was explained by the fact that the U.S. State Department had provided copies of the NOW! disclosure to correspondents as background material to another, and quite separate, incident in Sverdlovsk.

Both cases, it was suggested, were evidence of Russia's continuing experiments in biological warfare production, contrary to international agreements.

The Novosibirsk incident--denied by Moscow--is said to have taken place in June last year. That at Sverdlovsk appears to have been in April. This week Western scientists were still studying, somewhat sceptically, Soviet explanations that what had happened in Sverdlovsk was an illness caused by poor food handling.

And what are the facts behind Novosibirsk? When NOW! broke the story, our Moscow correspondent Denis Blewitt was immediately informed by the Soviet authorities that nothing whatever had happened in Novosibirsk. Furthermore a trip to Novosibirsk would be arranged so that he could see that nothing had happened. Blewitt accepted the invitation.

There was, however, a hitch. Blewitt checked in at Moscow Airport and was shown to the lounge reserved for foreigners. There he waited for the flight call, only to be told some time later that because of an administrative oversight, the plane had gone without him.

Subsequently the authorities informed Blewitt that two scientists from Novosibirsk would be available in Moscow to refute the story. That invitation was declined in the firm, but perhaps optimistic, belief that the promised visit to the city itself would still be arranged.

KLIRIDHIS COMMENTS ON HIS MEETING WITH CAGATAY

NC291906 Nicosia Domestic Service in Greek 1730 GMT 29 Mar 80 NC

[From the radio newsreel: Statement by Democratic Rally leader Kliridhis to Nicosia Radio--recorded]

[Text] I met today with the leader of the National Unity Party of the Turkish Cypriot side, Mr Cagatay. This meeting was the outcome of a statement that I made a long time ago to Cyprus television when I said that in order to create a climate of good will between the two communities, contacts should be instituted between the political leaders of the two communities.

A correspondent of the Turkish newspaper GUNAYDIN then visited my office and asked me whether this statement still held. I replied that it did and today's meeting with Mr Catagay was arranged by GUNAYDIN. I must confess that the meeting was very friendly and held in a spirit of good will. It was constructive and very useful.

The main aim of this meeting was to create the opportunity for personal contact between ourselves and I hope that similar opportunities will be given to the other political party leaders.

As has been announced, we had no agenda. We discussed the situation in general, with special emphasis on the Cyprus problem and the need to resume the intercommunal talks aimed at finding a just, viable solution to the Cyprus problem.

We both expressed the view that it is imperative to find ways to begin new talks, that is to resume the talks. We believe that our effort will be helpful in this direction. I have also ascertained that there is on both sides a climate that could be improved if the talks between the party leaders were to continue. For this reason I have invited Mr Cagatay to visit my office at Democratic Rally headquarters and we have decided to continue our contacts. Our next meeting will be held in the next 10 days. I believe that continuing and expanding these meetings and holding meetings between other party leaders will strengthen the negotiators' role.

Cagatay Meets With Denktas

TA011249 (Clandestine) Bayrak Radio in Turkish to Cyprus 1030 GMT 1 Apr 80 TA

[Text] Prime Minister Mustafa Cagatay met with President Rauf Denktas prior to his departure for London for talks. In a statement after the meeting Cagatay said he had exchanged views with the president on probable developments that might take place while Denktas is abroad. Cagatay said he also briefed the president on measures to be taken by the government.

Replying to a question by a reporter on whether the Greek Cypriot refusal of the latest Waldheim proposals and the allegations by Greek Cypriot Foreign Minister Rolandhis would affect his meeting with Kliridhis, Cagatay said: Undoubtedly, these two facts you mention could affect developments in the long run. However, at the present stage, I believe that we shall have the opportunity to meet with Kliridhis after 10 days as agreed.

GOVERNMENT SUBMITS NEW PROPOSAL FOR DIALOG

NC011204 Nicosia Domestic Service in Greek 1130 GMT 1 Apr 80 NC

[Text] An official statement issued today says that, within the framework of the government's firm policy to find a peaceful solution of the Cyprus problem through negotiations, the Council of Ministers met last night to be briefed on developments in the Cyprus issue and it decided to submit a new proposal to the UN secretary general that efforts be exerted to clarify various points that have been raised and thus make the resumption of the dialog easier.

Last night, Foreign Minister Rolandhis and Greek Cypriot interlocutor Ioannidhis had a meeting with UN secretary general's special representative in Cyprus, Galindo-Pohl, and his deputy, Gorge, at which the relevant proposal was submitted.

Galindo-Pohl and Gorge had a meeting today with Turkish Cypriot Atakol. Turkish Cypriot leader Denktas left for London today via Istanbul.

Further Report on Meeting

TA011656 (Clandestine) Bayrak Radio in Turkish to Cyprus 1030 GMT 1 Apr 80 TA

[Text] Foreign Minister, Defense and Tourism Minister Kenan Atakol said that he would bring before his government the Greek Cypriot proposal concerning the resumption of the intercommunal talks through the offices of the UN secretary general's special representative in Cyprus, Galindo-Pohl. This morning Atakol received Galindo-Pohl as well as his assistant, Remy Gorge.

In a statement following the hour-long meeting Atakol said that Galindo-Pohl had explained to him the Greek Cypriot proposal, which consisted of efforts by the UN secretary general's special representative to resume the intercommunal talks through shuttle diplomacy between the negotiators of the two communities, and that he would duly submit the proposal to the government with good will. Atakol added that a reply to the Greek Cypriot proposal would be given after the government discussed the proposal.

Recalling that the UN secretary general's proposals--which represent the basis for the talks--are still valid, Atakol said that these proposals were adopted by the Turkish Cypriot side, while the Greek Cypriot side rejected them.

Noting that the Greek Cypriot proposal concerned approaches that would bring the two communities to the negotiating table, Atakol said that Galindo Pohl would try to make Waldheim's recent proposals more tangible through shuttle diplomacy, and would work for their adoption in order to achieve the resumption of the intercommunal talks. Atakol reiterated that the Turkish Cypriot side would refuse to negotiate under the UN resolution.

Atakol added that he and Galindo-Pohl discussed the Rolandhis statements claiming that the Turkish Cypriot side was intransigent and that this Turkish stand had prevented Perez de Cuellar's arrival in Cyprus. He said that he told Galindo-Pohl that he did not believe that such an allegation was ever made by the UN secretary general or his office. Atakol added that he asked Galindo-Pohl for a denial of Rolandhis' allegations by the UN secretary general or his office. Foreign Ministry Under Secretary Ozer Koray was also present at today's talks.

ANDREOTTI ARRIVES FOR INTERPARLIAMENTARY CONFERENCE

AT012004 Athens Domestic Service in Greek 1930 GMT 1 Apr 80 AT

[Text] Former Italian Prime Minister Andreotti arrived in Athens this evening at the head of the Italian delegation to the preliminary conference of the Interparliamentary Union. Tomorrow Andreotti will be received by the President of the Republic Konstandinos Tsatos and will also visit Prime Minister Karamanlis and Foreign Minister Rallis.

PAPANDREOU RETURNS FROM EUROPE WITH NEW 'POSITIONS'

[Text] A. Papandreou yesterday appeared to support new positions toward the German Social Democrats. Authoritative observers of our political affairs interpreted this change as one more step in the turn being attempted toward "Europeanism"--a gradual approach toward the EEC.

The chairman of PASOK returned yesterday, having prolonged his stay--after his official visit--from West Germany. In his statements he said, among other things:

--We have (now) established, perhaps for the first time since PASOK's creation, a firm relation with the German Social Democratic Party, not based either upon misunderstandings on what the aims and aspirations of the Germans are or on what we in PASOK desire, pursue and dream about.

--I believe that because discussions were absolutely sincere and without any deviations, these relations could progress and play an important part in the development of closer relations with the progressive, democratic parties of West Europe which, within their own countries, represent existing progressive forces. One must draw these conclusions because political structures in each given country have their own character and one must seek out the forces which perhaps, although not absolutely on one side, at least have some common points on a number of problems which humanity is facing.

He then referred to PASOK's participation in the European Parliament and explained his movement's position on the issue of economic aid being granted to Turkey.

The Germans' arguments supporting this aid are not strong enough, he said. And they have admitted that this economic aid in itself helps in the redistribution of resources and in improving military armaments. It appears, however, that planning-wise Europe is under the complex of the grave danger inherent in 'Iranian developments'. For West Europe Iran is not a positive development. The intervention in Afghanistan also created many fears. Thus, unfortunately, the importance of Turkey is considered decisive. We have concluded that we disagree on this matter.

Speaking on the policy pursued by Chancellor Schmidt he concluded:

There is a change in his policy which has a vast political significance.

Schmidt has extended an invitation to the president of East Germany. In other words, there is an attempt to return to detente despite the harsh measures which Carter adopted and will continue to adopt as the election date is drawing close.

After enthusiastically describing the gathering of Greeks at Mannheim (where he delivered a speech) he stressed that PASOK is fully satisfied with his contacts both with the representatives of the Socialist Party as well as with the Greeks living there.

PAPANDREOU'S 'FEAR' OF IMMEDIATE ELECTIONS VIEWED

AT011518 Athens I KATHIMERINI in Greek 1 Apr 80 pp 1, 3 AT

[Text] A. Papandreou now fears immediate elections under the slogan: "Karamanlis for President." This conclusion was drawn by observers close to the government who commented on yesterday's meeting between political editors and the chairman of PASOK. Papandreou said that by submitting his candidacy for the presidency Karamanlis wants to guarantee a "New Democracy" government for four more years. According to Papandreou's forecasts--and he personally described this as a "scenario"--in the "probable" eventuality that Karamanlis does not receive the necessary majority of 180 votes then the elections provided for under the Constitution will be combined by "New Democracy" with the issue of the presidency so that the election confrontation will take on the character of a plebiscite in support of Karamanlis' election to the presidency. "If Karamanlis is playing such a game," PASOK's chairman added, "then the institution of the presidency will be undermined and there will be an opening of prospects for irregular developments of different forms and nature." Yesterday's statements by Papandreou raised many questions within the broader political area on the expediency of this line of thinking and about "untimely forecasts."

Answering Papandreou the government spokesman made the following statement:

"Once again the PASOK chairman contradicts himself. On the one hand he declares that the Chamber of Deputies must not elect a president of the republic and that the country must be led to elections. On the other hand, he accuses 'New Democracy' of proceeding toward elections for the purpose of connecting them with the election of a president of the republic. On the basis of developments themselves, however, even if elections were to be proclaimed today, they would be connected with the election of a president. It is impossible to follow Papandreou's line of thought. This line of thought incorporates within it much imagination, much inconsistency and even many more contradictions."

Other political personalities expressed the opinion that Papandreou's observations could in all probability be directed toward the smaller opposition parties which, naturally, face more problems because of the prospect of an early and polarizing election confrontation over the election of Karamanlis as president of the republic. Under this light the "warnings" of PASOK's chairman could also be interpreted as a direct admonition toward these parties asking them to vote for Karamanlis so that early elections may be avoided.

Naturally in the same line of thought there is also the question of why PASOK fails to support the election of the current prime minister as president in order to avoid "undermining the institution of the presidency and the possibility of "irregular developments."

Yesterday Papandreou supplied an answer to this question: One--PASOK has already taken the position that there is a lack of harmony between the Chamber of Deputies and the people and that PASOK is determined not to "cooperate" in the election of a president by the current Chamber of Deputies. Two--PASOK believes that "New Democracy" will be "crushed" in the next elections whether they are held ahead of time due to the Chamber's inability to elect a president or whether they are held later.

Specifically, Papandreou's references to a "scenario" are, in general lines, the following:

The setting for the presidential election appears to be changing. Until recently the question was whether Karamanlis would or would not proceed to the presidency. [paragraph continues]

Now we not only have the question of Karamanlis but also--and perhaps this is of primary importance--the question of salvaging "New Democracy," either now or after a few months, from an election crash. The probable scenario is developing as follows: The current Chamber of Deputies is unable to elect a president of the republic. "New Democracy," either with Karamanlis as the leader or with Karamanlis out of the running, proceeds to elections under the slogan, "Karamanlis for President," because it believes that Karamanlis will concentrate a greater majority as president than as prime minister.

At this point Papandreou also referred to a public opinion poll which was published in TAKHIDHROMOS. This poll, with which the PASOK chairman had disagreed describing it as "peculiar," included the question: "If Karamanlis ran for president of the republic and if you have a right to vote on it would you support him?"

The answer to the question was: 51 percent yes; 35 percent no; with 14 percent taking no position.

The answer within the various parties to the same poll was as follows:

--Within New Democracy: 90 percent yes; 6 percent no; 4 percent no reply.

--Within PASOK: 34 percent yes; 60 percent no; 6 percent no reply.

--Within other parties: 40 percent yes; 35 percent no; 25 percent no reply.

According to Papandreou, PASOK's estimates are different particularly if the Greek people are asked whether they prefer Karamanlis in the presidency and New Democracy in authority.

Papandreou added that it is unacceptable to the Greek people to differentiate between the achievements of Karamanlis and those of "New Democracy" at a time when the prime minister is exclusively responsible for the selection of his ministers and the failure of his government.

In conclusion Papandreou observed that PASOK's position coincides with the positions of other parties on the necessity of electing a president who will enjoy wide support. We simply, he added, do not see the prospect of the practical existence of a joint candidate since the opposition as a whole is unable to elect a president and the "New Democracy" candidate will be a party candidate.

When PASOK's chairman was asked what Karamanlis could do to avoid an interconnection of possible elections and the presidency--since he is not supported by the opposition--Papandreou gave the following reply:

"One solution could be to hold elections before the election of a president. The other solution is that Karamanlis should completely withdraw from politics and return to private life."

68 ADDITIONAL KKE MEMBERS LEAVE PARTY

LD011041 London THE DAILY TELEGRAPH in English 1 Apr 80 p 4 LD

[Athens correspondent dispatch: "More Greeks Quit Pro-Soviet Communists"]

[Text] A further 68 members of the staunchly pro-Moscow Greek Communist Party (KKE) yesterday joined about 400 others who had quit the party earlier this month in protest against its "total dependence on the Soviet Union." The crisis by the party [as published] is seen as a reflection of the ideological turmoil created within the party following the Soviet invasion of Afghanistan.

PLO REPRESENTATIVE URGES ARAB COUNTRIES TO AID TURKEY

TA011701 Ankara ANATOLIA in English 1600 GMT 1 Apr 80 TA

[Text] Ankara, 1 Apr (AA)--Representative of the Palestine Liberation Organization to Turkey Abu Firas said the Palestinians and the Arab world must support Turkey and help her overcome current economic difficulties. In a statement in Ankara, Abu Firas noted the United States kept promising aid to Turkey, but transferred the aid out of Arab pockets. He announced the PLO had taken the initiative to suggest to several Arab countries that they aid Turkey. It was a duty of Islamic countries in general and of Arabs in particular, he said, to support Turkey, for Turkey was a solid supporter of the Palestinian cause. The United States and the enemies of Turkey did not want to see Turkey strong, he charged.

The PLO representative claimed Israel supported secessionist movement, Kurdish seditionists and terrorists in Turkey, as it did in Iran, Iraq, Syria and Lebanon.

Denying allegations that certain terrorists in Turkey were trained in Palestinian camps, Abu Firas said PLO did not train terrorists, and had never supported terrorism of any kind. "We are fighting for our independence," he commented. He explained they only accepted "volunteers" who wanted to fight for the Palestinian cause, but "not to train and send them back to their own countries."

LIRA DEVALUED AGAINST U.S. DOLLAR, OTHER CURRENCIES

TA012102 Ankara Domestic Service in Turkish 2000 GMT 1 Apr 80 TA

[Text] The value of the Turkish lira has been readjusted against the U.S. dollar and other foreign currencies in accordance with changes in the international money markets. According to the statement issued by the Turkish Central Bank administrative center, the exchange rate of the Turkish lira against the U.S. dollar has changed from 70 Turkish lira to 73.70 Turkish lira to the U.S. dollar.

The Turkish lira was devalued against the U.S. dollar, the Saudi riyal, the Australian dollar, the Kuwaiti dinar, the Canadian dollar, the Swedish and Norwegian kroner and the British pound sterling and maintained its value against the Belgian and French francs and the Italian lira.

According to the statement, the following exchange rates will be valid as of tomorrow morning: The deutsche mark will be exchanged for 37.60 Turkish lira instead of 37.67 Turkish lira; the Dutch florin for 34.34 instead of 34.44; the Austrian schilling for 5.26 instead of 5.28. The Turkish lira has been revalued by .02 percent to .04 percent against these currencies.

The purchase prices for some of the other foreign currencies are as follows: the British sterling for 157.24 Turkish lira; the Australian dollar for 79.09; the Saudi riyal 21.97; the Canadian dollar for 61.06 and Kuwaiti dinar 267.44. The rate of devaluation of the Turkish lira against these currencies varies between [number indistinct] and 5.4 percent. The Turkish lira was devalued by 5.2 percent against the U.S. dollar.

ISLAMIC LEAGUE DELEGATION MEETS WITH OFFICIALS

TA311841 Ankara Domestic Service in Turkish 1600 GMT 31 Mar 80 TA

[Text] A delegation headed by the World Islamic League secretary general, (Sheikh Muhammad Ali al-Harekan), has called on Religious Affairs Director Tayyar Altikulac.

In a statement during the meeting, Altikulac said that the World Islamic League was extending a grant of 5 million lira to the victims of the Adana flood and a 20 million lira grant for the mosque to be built at the Grand National Assembly.

The deputy secretary general of the World Islamic League, Shaykh Muhammad Safwat as-Saqqa al-Amini, said that the Turkish Armed Froces had brought peace to the Muslims in Cyprus. Recalling that there were over 70 million Muslims in the Soviet Union, (Al-Emini) said: These Muslim brothers are protesting, together with us, the Soviet intervention in Afghanistan. The Afghan problem is one of humanity. It is a problem of justice and fairness. He also requested that a World Islamic League representation be opened in Turkey.

After the meeting, Al-Amini addressed a meeting at the Religious Affairs Directorate. He briefed the meeting on the activities of the World Islamic League. The delegation then attended a luncheon hosted by Prime Minister Suleyman Demirel at the foreign guests mansion.

VOTCP CALLS FOR ACTION AGAINST AGREEMENT WITH U.S.

TA011104 (Clandestine) Voice of Turkish Communist Party in Turkish to Europe and Turkey 0600 GMT 1 Apr 80 TA

[Unattributed commentary: "Turkey Is a Tool of U.S. Foreign Policy"]

[Text] A new slavery agreement has been signed between Turkey and the United States under the guise of a defense and cooperation agreement. The main agreement, which is valid for a 5-year period, is accompanied by three complimentary agreements on U.S. bases, the modernization of the Turkish Armed Forces and mutual defense cooperation. Each of these agreements commit Turkey to heavy undertakings, binding it more strongly to imperialist economic, political and military policies.

The complementary agreement concerning the modernization of the Turkish Armed Forces has been prepared within the framework of the Carter doctrine, which envisages a return to the cold war and a stepping up of the arms race. The aim of the Pentagon is to intensify Turkey's arming in a bid to transform Turkey into a reliable tool of U.S. Middle East policies. To this end, Turkey--the only Asian member of NATO--will be equipped with missiles of a new type as well as with military planes and armature. Within this framework, Turkish officers will be speciàlly trained in the United States. Particular importance will be given to the training of experts for torture organizations like MIT [National Intelligence Agency]. It is a known fact that during the period between 1961-1978 Washington spent $5.2 million on the Turkish secret services to train special torture experts, agents provocateurs and counterrevolutionaries in Turkey--a country 13,000 kilometers away from the United States--within the framework of a program to bolster its sovereignty. The new agreement envisages a broadening of work on this field.

The agreement also recognizes the right of the United States to use Turkish soil for the transfer of U.S. troops and equipment in case of a military action by the Washington administration in the Persian Gulf and the Indian Ocean region, which it considers a region of vital U.S. interests.

The other complementary agreement of the slavery accords signed between Turkey and the United States concerns the U.S. bases. According to this agreement, the U.S. bases on our soil are given a permanent status and (?their use) is being extended by 1 year. [sentence as heard] Moreover, it is especially being stressed that the bases Incirlik, Pirinclik, Sinop, Karamursel, Kargaburun, Belbasi, Elmadag, Mahurdag, Kulecik, Sahintepe and Yamanlar are to be completely under U.S. control. This proves once more that all cries by both the Demirel and Ecevit governments to the effect that Turkey has taken over U.S. bases on its soil and has hoisted its flag in response to the U.S. embargo imposed on Turkey over the Cyprus operation were nothing but demagogy and political speculation.

The agreement concerning the U.S. bases says that these bases will be developed, that new bases equipped with nuclear weapons will be established, and that the Sinop, Belbase and Incirlik U.S. monitoring stations will be equipped with the newest electronic equipment. It is a known fact that there are nuclear arsenals at these bases as well. Commenting on this issue at various times, both the world and the Turkish press have pointed to the terrible danger these bases pose for our country. In fact, 51 deputies from the RPP and the Soviet newspaper PRAVDA have recently stressed that, in a war that might erupt, the (?presence) of aggressive bases on our soil are a threat that might turn Turkey into a nuclear cemetery. The newly signed agreement has made this threat more tangible because the agreement grants the United States the right to intervene in Turkey.

In brief, dear listeners, the bilateral slavery agreement seriously endangers our national independence, sovereignty and the integrity of our country. It poses a threat to regional peace and security while the imperialists incite an arms race and create an atmosphere of cold war. Abroad, this agreement involves our country with imperialism's anti-peace policies abroad; at home, it reinforces the positions of the collaborationist and monopolist forces opening the road to fascism. This agreement, aimed at dragging our country into the U.S. armament policy and imperialism's adventures, will intensify domestic crises and will exacerbate the unbearable life of the toilers.

That is why the working class and the toilers have already taken a definite stand against this slavery agreement. Workers, toilers and the progressive democratic forces are preparing to cry out for the tearing up of the bilateral slavery agreement and for the dismantling of the bases at "No to NATO" rallies and demonstrations to be held throughout the country on 4 and 5 April. At these rallies the masses will demonstrate against the intensifying pressures of imperialism and NATO, and against the attacks of the collaborationist and monopolist forces as well as of the militarist clique on the democratic gains and positions, on the living conditions of the toilers and on peace and security. These rallies and demonstrations will demonstrate the potential of the working class and toilers to put up resistance, and they will contribute to the unity of action of the largest democratic forces.

The Turkish Communist Party--which defends national independence against the intensifying pressures of imperialism and NATO, which supports global and regional peace and security against the arms race and the war threat, which protects the toilers living conditions against the profiteering of the monopolies, which opposes the workers' shouldering of the burden of the economic crisis, and which defends the democratic rights and liberties against the paramilitary and brutal administration--calls on all communists, on its brothers in the TIP [Turkish Labor Party] and the TSIP [Turkish Socialist Workers Party], the Kurdish democrats, the RPP patriots, as well as all the democratic and progressive forces to actively participate in rallies to cry out: No to NATO! The bilateral slavery agreement must be torn up! The bases must be dismantled! Unfurl the flag of unity!

VOTCP URGES WORKERS TO JOIN ANTI-NATO DEMONSTRATIONS

[Unattributed commentary]

[Text] Mass protest activities will be held in our country on 4 and 5 April, the anniversary of the foundation of NATO, imperialism's counterrevolutionary organization. The Communists, who tirelessly conduct an uninterrupted struggle against NATO, will be in the first ranks of these protest activities.

The Turkish Communist Party, the Communists call on all their brothers of the Turkish Labor Party and the Turkish Socialist Workers' Party, the RPP patriots, the Kurdish democrats and all the workers to actively participate in the "No to NATO" demonstrations. [first 2-3 minute segment of Communist protest song]

NATO is imperialism's military aggression organization. It is the archenemy of peace and security in the world and in our region. The struggle against NATO cannot be separated from the struggle for peace, democracy, independence and social progress. [second 2-3 minute segment of Communist protest song]

In its multidirectional policy of aggression against the working class and the workers, the collaborationist monopolist bourgeoisie depends on NATO, on the bilateral slavery agreements and on the aggressive bases on our lands. Struggle to withdraw from NATO, to tear up the slavery agreements and to remove the bases from our lands! [2-3 minute conclusion of Communist protest song]

TCP SENDS MESSAGE TO COMMUNIST PARTY OF EL SALVADOR

TA300857 (Clandestine) Voice of the Turkish Communist Party in Turkish to Europe and Turkey 0600 GMT 30 Mar 80 TA

[Turkish Communist Party [TCP] Central Committee Secretary General Bilen's message to the Salvadoran Communist Party's Central Committee]

[Text] To the Communist Party of El Salvador [PCES] Central Committee: Dear comrades, on behalf of all Turkish Communists and Turkish Communist Party [TCP] Central Committee congratulates the PCES on the 50th anniversary of its foundation and extends its struggle greetings. Since its foundation, the PCES has been waging an arduous struggle under illegal conditions and the bloody oppression and terror of reactionaryism.

It has struggled and is continuing to do so in unity with other democratic and patriotic forces against U.S. imperialism and the local collaborationist oligarchy for democracy, socialism and the interests of the working class and the toilers. The revolutionary struggle of the Salvadoran people is gaining strength.

The PCES is in the frontline of this struggle. The TCP and the PCES maintain brotherly ties based on the principles of Marxism-Leninism and proletarian internationalism. The TCP, the Turkish working class and the people are in full solidarity with the PCES, the Salvadoran people and their just cause. Dear comrades, we wish you great success in the arduous struggle you have been waging and congratulate the 50th anniversary of your party's foundation. With communist greetings.

[Signed] TCP Central Committee Secretary General Bilen, 28 March 1980.

NATIONAL ASSEMBLY CANNOT AGREE ON NEW PRESIDENT

TA011514 Ankara Domestic Service in Turkish 1500 GMT 1 Apr 80 TA

[Text] The 11th and 12th rounds of voting by the joint session of the Senate and the National Assembly to elect a president failed to yield any results today. RPP Ankara Senator Ibrahim Ozturk was the only candidate during both rounds. During the 11th round, in which 436 legislators participated, Ozturk received 65 votes and the non-candidate RPP senator from the president's wuote, Muhsin Batur, received 56 votes. Various legislators received 97 votes, 209 ballots were blank and 9 others were declared void. During the 12th round of voting, only 189 members participated, and the votes were not counted for lack of a quorum. The Senate and National Assembly will meet jointly again tomorrow to continue voting for a president.

OUR RADIO BLAMES GOVERNMENT FOR NEGLECT OF EAST, KURDS

TA011226 (Clandestine) Our Radio in Turkish to Turkey 0700 GMT 1 Apr 80 TA

[Unattributed commentary]

[Excerpts] Dear listeners, the grave results of natural disasters reveal to the public the socially exploitative and oppressive face of the order reigning in our country. As a result of floods and landslides, many villages--especially Ayvataci village in Kayseri--suffered heavy material damage and many lives were lost. In Adana, 70 villages were flooded. Hundreds of thousands of our citizens were left without homes in the villages of Kahramanmaras and Cankiri, and they lost their livestock. Natural disasters like landslides, floods and earthquakes are causing the deaths--hundreds of thousands--of citizens, while those who are saved are bound to become the wage slaves of brutal capitalism--an order of exploitation. Both branches of the ruling bourgeoisie as well as all the bourgeois governments have not solved and will not solve the urgent problems of tens of thousands of villagers who live in the earthquake regions and face the threat of floods and landslides as long as the capitalist system of social oppression, of exploitation of the minorities and of racist and chauvinistic policies reigns in the country.

The Turkish working class as well as its affiliated organizations and its natural supporters are on the one hand fiercely struggling to eliminate the economic, political and social disasters as well as exploitation, injustices, unemployment, inequalities, poverty, economic disparities and the lack of housing, and on the other they are fighting with scientific methods against the severe results of natural disasters.

The bourgeois governments have made it their permanent policy to send regiments of commandos and gendarmes to the east and southeast of the country--which are mainly inhabited by Kurds--to lay minefields there and to construct additional prisons and dungeons. Pressure by the present and past Demirel governments--which are the governments of the big landlords, sheikhs and beys--in the east has reached a new height. The percentage of investment in the eastern and southeastern regions has not been over 1 percent for many years. This is undeniable proof of the ruling bourgeois governments' policies of oppressing the Kurdish people and other minorities, and of their efforts to squeeze them in a vise of poverty and unemployment.

From the day it was established, the Turkish Communist Party [TCP] has been waging a fierce struggle against this racist and chauvinistic policy, supporting the right of the Kurdish people to free self-determination, to existence and to liberties. The pro-American, NATO'ite Demirel government [words indistinct] is allocating the lion's share of the investment program's funds to NATO spending and to benefit the domestic and foreign monopolist and capitalist circles. The total expenditure envisaged in the investment program of this antipeople government in the spheres of education, health and (?science) does not exceed 30 billion lira. In a country in which such a hostile policy is followed against minorities--mainly Kurds--it is imperative--now more than ever--for toilers from all countries to broaden and strengthen unity of action. The TCP is exerting efforts to achieve such unity in a bid to bring happiness and liberty to our people, including the Kurds and all other minorities.

EEC CONCLUDES TRADE AGREEMENT WITH ROMANIA

["Ph. L." Report: "EEC and Romania Conclude Trade Agreement"]

[Text] Brussels (European Communities)--Agreement between the Community and Romania relating to trade in industrial products was initialed Friday. It follows an agreement by which it was decided a few weeks ago to create a Community-Romania joint commission. This double agreement, which was concluded after a year of intensive negotiations, will probably be signed before summer.

It is the first time that the Community as such has concluded a nonsectorial trade agreement with any Eastern country. The Bucharest government has thus abandoned the thesis now prevailing in the socialist camp that, before any bilateral contractual relations are established, priority should be given to the conclusion of an agreement between the Community and CEMA (which is the Eastern countries' economic organization). CEMA leaders believe that the agreement with the EEC which they would like to sign should include trade provisions. The Community objects to this because it does not want to strengthen in this way the power of an integrated organization which, it believes, is too closely controlled by the Soviets. It wants to see any trade relations governed by agreements concluded by it with every Eastern country separately. This is exactly what is happening as far as Romania is concerned.

Now EEC-CEMA negotiations have been marking time. Last fall it was agreed in principle to hold a high-level meeting in April between CEMA Secretary General Fadeyev and Mr Hamferkampf, deputy chairman of the European Affairs Commission. Mr Hamferkampf has recently written a letter to Fadeyev in which he stated that he does not believe that it would be advisable to hold such a meeting until there is an "indication" of a substantial change in CEMA's attitude. However, Mr Hamferkampf added that he is not opposed to a resumption of discussions between experts.

It appears that the Romanians have considerably improved their opportunities for access to EEC markets. The agreement includes a list of products exported by Romania with respect to which any existing quantitative restrictions will be either abolished or suspended. Whenever any quantitative restrictions are maintained, quotas for Romanian goods will be increased. The agreement includes a reciprocity clause--Romania has promised to develop and diversify its imports from the Community. It has been stated that the rate of increase in imports from the EEC must not be lower than that of any increase in imports from other GATT countries. In other words, in principle, the EEC exporters' share of the Romanian market is bound to increase.

INTERPARLIAMENTARY CONFERENCE BEGINS IN ATHENS

[Text] The preliminary conference of the Interparliamentary Union, which will discuss the detailed issues which will occupy the union's conference in Oslo on 7 April, began this morning in the Senate Hall with the participation of delegates from 23 countries. The issues include arms limitation, the protection of human rights and colonialism. The opening of the preliminary conference was declared by Mr Kallias, who is the chairman of the Interparliamentary Committee of the Greek Parliament and also chairs the preliminary conference.

Among the delegates are former Italian Prime Minister Andreotti and the president of the Luxembourg parliament, (Bolendorf). The Greek committee is composed of Deputies Andonopoulos, Ghalelianos, Kritikos and Fotilas.

GENSCHER RECEIVES HEAD OF GDR MISSION IN BONN

LD011648 Hamburg DPA in German 1520 GMT 1 Apr 80 LD

[Text] Bonn--Hans-Dietrich Genscher, federal chairman of the FDP, today received the head of the GDR permanent mission in Bonn, Eberhard Moldt, for an exchange of views. FDP Spokesman Josef Gerwald gave no details about the meeting, which took place in the Thomas-Dehler House.

U.S. REITERATES STAND ON CITIZENSHIP OF BERLINERS

[Text] Berlin--U.S. policy unswervingly adheres to the view that all Berliners hold German citizenship. This was reaffirmed by the U.S. mission in Berlin today following a request. This American statement is meant to counter speculation concerning an alteration in the American standpoint on this question, which arose as a result of an interview given by Kenneth Rush, former ambassador and American delegate to the quadripartite negotiations, to Radio Free Berlin. During the interview the question of a possible West Berlin citizenship arose.

Ernest Latham, the American press spokesman said verbatim: "The American stand on the question of German citizenship is well known and remains unchanged. There is and never was any question of a Berlin citizenship. Berliners are Germans." This position coincides with the latest statement of Peter Soetje, head of the Berlin Senate chancellory.

GENSCHER, BRANDT, KREISKY DISCUSS PALESTINIAN ISSUE

LD011530 Hamburg DPA in German 1252 GMT 1 Apr 80 LD

[Text] Bonn--Federal Foreign Minister Hans-Dietrich Genscher considers the reestablishment of the unity of the Arab camp to be an important condition for a peaceful Middle East settlement. In a Deutschlandfunk program Genscher described the solution of the Middle East question as one of "the most important world political problems," the solution of which equally requires recognition of Israel's right to exist and the implementation of the Palestinians' right to self-determination. He said he hopes that the EC countries will be able to make their contribution to a peaceful settlement.

In the same program, SPD Chairman Willy Brandt said that the dialog with the PLO and its chairman, Yasir 'Arafat, must not be neglected. 'Arafat and a "considerable part" of the PLO leadership are aiming for a settlement that serves the interests of both peoples--the Israelis and the Palestinians. The Europeans thus have to take the Palestinians' ideas into account in forming their opinion.

Austrian Chancellor Bruno Kreisky said that 'Arafat is a man who "deep down" wants a peaceful settlement and who represents a moderate line in the PLO. If this lines does not bring success, there is danger of a more radical turn with bloody, revolutionary conflicts. Kreisky said that it is "grotesque" to question Israel's security in view of the fact that, at present, Israel has one of the largest, best-trained and best-equipped armies outside the communist countries.

The chairman of the Bundestag Foreign Affairs Committee and former Bonn foreign minister, Gerhard Schroeder, said he doubts that there could be any progress in the Palestinian question without the PLO.

PALESTINE NATIONAL COUNCIL DELEGATION TO VISIT BONN

LD241026 Hamburg DPA in German 1005 GMT 24 Mar 80 LD

[Text] Bonn--A delegation of the Palestinian National Council--the decision-making body of the PLO, will visit Bonn during the first half of April for talks on Near East problems. Among other things the delegation will meet with representatives from all the parties in the Bundestag and will again present its case for Bonn's recognition of the PLO. No further details of this visit, which was announced today, are available.

The PLO delegation will be led by Khalid al-Hasan, chairman of the Foreign Policy Committee of the National Council and member of the PLO Executive Committee. The delegation will visit other EEC capitals in April, including Brussels, Paris and London. A meeting with European MP's is planned for 16-17 April in Strasbourg.

PAPER HITS U.S. 'SECRET DIPLOMACY' IN IRAN SITUATION

DW011208 Frankfurt FRANKFURTER RUNDSCHAU in German 1 Apr 80 p 3 DW

[Karl Grobe editorial: "Hostages and Secret Diplomacy"]

[Excerpts] We can assume that two presidents have meant well concerning what they have done over the past few days: Anwar as-Sadat when he granted asylum to the former shah of Iran, and Jimmy Carter when he addressed a secret message to the Iranian State and its leadership. However, neither has particularly simplified the situation. If it was humaneness that induced them to act, then all they have achieved is that the victims remain in a situation undignified for man.

In continuing the Islamic hospitality which has always characterized Egypt, As-Sadat granted Mohammad Reza Pahlavi, who has been chased around the world, the right to spend his last days there. This is a man who has gone through many ups and downs: the puppet of foreign masters; absolute ruler over 30 million people; one of the rulers over the most important energy raw material on earth; marked by the hubris of power; a man outlawed by his own people. As-Sadat granted him the loyalty of a friend. This sounds noble. Nevertheless, the effect is disastrous for the roughly 50 U.S. diplomats who have been isolated from the surrounding world in Tehran as hostages since last November 4th.

At this point a policy of interests enters into the game, regardless of human gestures. The U.S. leadership can no longer take harsh action; Iran would have to look for allies against any threat; Europe, China, the nonalined could not come to the aid of Iran; pressure from Washington would force it to approach the Soviet Union. Yet, especially after Afghanistan, the U.S. President, regardless of the election year and primaries, has seen a chance to at least keep Iran neutral, if not "win it back," through patient negotiation.

It may well have been this mixture that was behind the Carter letter: achieving the release of the hostages while at the same time politically defending the interests of his own energy economy. But just like his advisers, Carter failed to keep in mind that it is no longer possible to conduct secret diplomacy with Iran. Particularly President Abolhasan Bani-Sadr cannot afford vis-a-vis the occupiers of the embassy to make secret agreements with the United States at present. He would expose himself to a reputation that would bring him politically dangerously close to the former shah--selling out Iranian interests to the United States is the main accusation made against the refugee Pahlavi.

The secretiveness about the exchange of letters, the bad game with the denials which could only last for a few hours anyway, the quietness vis-a-vis the Iranian political demands have again severely damaged the credibility of U.S. diplomacy in the Middle East. Even worse, the planners of this letter-writing action stand there like amateurs who, in addition, do not even show insight.

This seems to be the greatest deficiency. The leading power of the Western alliance has still not understood that a new quality has come about in Iran, whether the White House likes it or not. It fails to realize that young national pride and the awareness of regained dignity are political realities. It is unable to cope with Iranian peculiarities; it insists on secret diplomacy, which was still possible with the shah, to the disadvantage of Iran, as is commonly stated by the new forces ranging from the extreme left to the political center.

But the leading classes of Iran also fail to understand how the U.S. political apparatus functions. It may be possible that some of the detained diplomatic hostages worked for the CIA. But America does not function like a monolithic entity, and its public opinion is a power of its own kind--and that public opinion does not at all always support the government's method of patience.

That may be of secondary importance for Iran in view of its still unsolved class dispute and its own revolution. It may suffice for the occupiers of the embassy that they are holding "imperialist agents." But they fail to realize that their own permanent refusal due to their firmly sticking to revolutionary principles can force the United States to take dangerous steps.

The well-meant actions--which also includes the publication of Carter's letter in Tehran--have complicated access to compromises that could be tolerated by all. The situation will continue--unless insight miraculously takes place on all sides involved--to be more confused than ever. The burden falls back onto the hostages, the burden which political forces are using to pursue an inhuman conflict in the name of humanity. From such situations world crises can emerge which nobody wants.

INTERIOR MINISTER REPORTS TURKS SEEKING ASYLUM

TA291216 Ankara Domestic Service in Turkish 1000 GMT 29 Mar 80 TA

[Text] The FRG interior minister, Gerhart Baum, has said that requests for asylum in his country have increased during the recent months and that his government will take measures to prevent the exploitation of this right. Baum pointed out that the Turks were in the lead among the foreigners asking for asylum. He added that 6,000 Turks had asked for asylum in January alone. Baum noted that only 10 percent of those asking asylum from the FRG were political refugees.

BRIEFS

SENTENCE FOR GDR SPY--Duesseldorf--The fifth criminal division of the Duesseldorf Higher Regional Court has sentenced Karl-Heinz Glocke (45), a qualified sociologist, to 2 years and 9 months imprisonment for working as a secret service agent. DIRECT INVOLVEMENT IN CHAD FIGHTING 'RULED OUT'

AB030830 Paris AFP in English 0646 GMT 3 Apr 80 AB

[Text] Paris, 3 Apr (AFP)--Pessimistic about a rapid solution to the civil war in Chad, the French authorities feel obliged to maintain a presence there to provide at least humanitarian aid, according to informed sources here. They ruled out any danger of direct French commitment in the fighting. None of the groups intends complicating the situation, and France is supplying no arms to anyone whatsoever, the sources stressed.

The Co-operation Ministry has allocated 250,000 dollars for Chad refugees who have fled to Cameroon. There are estimated to be 60,000 to 80,000 of them. The money is for buying cereals and providing medicines. A consignment of 2.8 metric tons of medicines is to be flown today to Ndjamena, where 25 French aid doctors have remained. The Foreign Ministry here said 970 people, mainly non-Chadians, had found refuge at the French military base in Ndjamena since fighting erupted 12 days ago in the capital, of whom 462 had subsequently been evacuated by road and 399 by military aid transport. Wounded treated at the base, mostly Chadians, numbered 678, including about 100 civilians.

LE FIGARO ON ISSUES RAISED BY NEUTRON BOMB PRODUCTION

LD010843 Paris LE FIGARO in French 24 Mar 80 p 5 LD

[Pierre Darcourt article: "The Neutron Bomb, Essential Against Armored Vehicles"]

[Text] For several weeks the French neutron bomb has been the subject of a number of press commentaries which are clearly less hostile than the enormous wave of anti-U.S. propaganda unleashed by Moscow, which lasted several months, until President Carter postponed the manufacture of a neutron weapon.

The neutron bomb is primarily a battlefield weapon, specifically for antitank uses. This bomb may briefly be described as a thermonuclear weapon with a reduced charge, designed to produce neither blast nor heat but, on the contrary, a great stream of neutrons. These ultra-high-speed particles can penetrate any known tank armor, thereby killing the crews without damaging the vehicles. At the same time, they would not destroy heavy concrete shelters.

French forces covered by the dropping of these N-bombs could remain completely safe at a distance of 1,500 meters, ready to act a few hours after the explosion.

France has the technology to produce this type of bomb which, if produced in thousands--and not a dozen as has been written--would enable it to stop enemy tanks in their starting positions or when they are underway: a paramount advantage when you consider that the Soviets could launch more than 30,000 tanks against Western positions in a few hours.

When people mention the manufacture of a French N-bomb, certain military experts cry that France is changing its strategy and doctrine, since nuclear deterrence rests on two pillars: that of an all-out countercity strike, capable of inflicting overwhelming damage on the enemy's economy, technical infrastructures and population. [sentence as published] This all-or-nothing strategy never took account of the threat of mass destruction incurred in return by the population. For their part, the Americans no longer believe in the "countercity" nuclear strategy alone, since their overwhelming nuclear superiority of the previous decade no longer exists. They now know that they are very vulnerable on their own territory, since they are convinced that the enormous Soviet retaliatory capability could destroy an intolerable number of major U.S. urban centers, with a total loss of life running into tens of millions.

NATO's European forces possess a tactical nuclear arsenal which, in the event of mass attack, could deal the Soviet forces a savage knockout blow. But the use of these weapons would result in terrible destruction and countless deaths. The "specific, pinpoint" neutron bomb would be equally effective without involving such dire consequences, since it would only hit combatants. However, French "mass production" of this very sophisticated weapon would be very costly.

L'HUMANITE: SIMILARITY OF PCI, PS VIEWS 'ALARMING'

LD030701 Paris L'HUMANITE in French 27 Mar 80 p 1 LD

[Rene Andrieu editorial: "Union Strategy"]

[Text] F. Mitterrand granted an interview to LA CROIX yesterday in which he indulged in a violent attack against the PCF, accusing it of "giving Giscard another chance of holding out." Albeit rash, this thesis is not new but, in view of the existing situation, it is worthwhile recalling some fundamental truths concerning the subject.

If anyone gave Giscard any chance of holding out, it was in fact the Socialist Party [PS] in 1977 when it decided to break up the Union of the Left by turning its back on the commitments mentioned in the joint program and by agreeing, as far as the main points were concerned, with the government's stance whether with respect to austerity or with respect to foreign policy. Even now, although F. Mitterrand criticizes Mr Giscard d'Estaing verbally--only yesterday he mentioned "belly dancing before the golden calf" with reference to him--he in fact shares his main political views, especially in the international sphere.

Is a revival of the arms race on the agenda? F. Mitterrand immediately agrees with the decision to deploy 600 new nuclear missiles in Europe. "If the Americans take the view," he stated, "that Pershing missiles are needed to insure a balance between East and West, we are in favor of their deployment." Is Kampuchea being discussed? A Socialist takes the initiative of suspending shipments of grain by the EEC and the Socialist Party supports the government's maneuvers aimed at getting a coalition consisting of Sihanouk and Pol Pot's friends back in the saddle. Is it a question of Iran and Afghanistan? The only criticism which Mitterrand directs at Mr Giscard d'Estaing is that he did not speak up earlier and "louder." In fact, the only more or less serious criticism which Mitterrand voiced with respect to Giscard was--albeit for obvious election reasons--that Giscard mentioned the Palestinians' right to self-determination.

In other words, there is no important international problem with respect to which Francois Mitterrand has failed to support the views of the European right and Washington.

Therefore, it is hard to understand how it could be stated, among other things, in the communique published at the end of the talks between the French Socialist Party first secretary and Enrico Berlinguer in Strasbourg, that "they agreed about the need for initiatives which could contribute toward disarmament, detente and cooperation in Europe and the world...."

Be that as it may, what is clear is that, as shown in the LA CROIX interview, F. Mitterrand is already using the Strasbourg meeting as a prop for intensifying his attack against the PCF. Even though Enrico Berlinguer asserts that this is not what he wanted--and we do not doubt his word--the objective has obviously been achieved. And even though he has expressed surprise that this meeting could have been "interpreted and presented as an initiative which could harm the PCF," this is how all commentators have interpreted and presented it.

Yesterday's L'UNITA, which described Georges Marchais' statements on the Mitterrand-Berlinguer meeting as "disconcerting," developed two main criticisms. These statements, it claims, are tantamount to "a gross misrepresentation of the strategy of the historic compromise, which has been represented as an alliance with the reactionary right" and have distorted the meaning of a meeting which was aimed at strengthening the European left against the conservative bloc.

Both criticisms seem to us equally groundless. We have never said that the historic compromise with the Christian Democratic Party was an alliance of the right. It was Francois Mitterrand who said this. In fact, before the 1978 elections, he strongly criticized us for seeking "a historic compromise," thus following our Italian comrades' example. And it was Mitterrand who stated with obvious disapproval when referring to the subject: "It is not a union of the left, it is a union of the right." Therefore, we have not been guilty of the "gross misrepresentation" to which L'UNITA referred. He has.

What is also true is that the Socialist Party first secretary, who recently denounced the historic compromise as an alliance of the right, is now trying to use the specific situation prevailing in Italy to justify the alliance which his party is preparing with Mr Giscard d'Estaing's friends in France. Despite some variations, one constant factor prevails in both cases: attack against the PCF.

According to L'UNITA, the Berlinguer-Mitterrand meeting will strengthen the European left against the conservative bloc, but under present circumstances it could well have a contrary effect since, as I have just recalled, the French Socialist Party's attitude toward all the most important problems of foreign policy is similar to that of the conservative bloc which has been so clearly illustrated by the association between Mr Giscard d'Estaing's "advanced liberalism" and Mr Schmidt's social democracy.

Obviously, all this does not mean that the PCF would be hostile to any joint action--both at the national and international level--by left forces in support of a policy of freedom, social progress, disarmament and peace. On the contrary, since such action would be consistent with its own strategy--which has in fact been confirmed by its congresses--and since we showed as long ago as the thirties that we were not going to fall into the error for which, as L'UNITA recalls, "the workers movement has had to pay so high a price." However, it is necessary to know on what basis such a union would be formed. If, for instance, Mr Schmidt and Mr Mitterrand were prepared to demonstrate with us tomorrow their opposition to the installation of new missiles in Europe, we would be ready to join forces with them.

However, we will not form an alliance with them in order to implement a policy of austerity in France, nor to enlarge the Community to include Greece, Portugal and Spain, nor to grant the Community supranational prerogatives. And we are bound to feel alarmed by the fact that as G. Marchais stated, the PCI's and the French Socialist Party's views on these points very largely coincide.

UKRAINIAN NATIONALISTS CLAIM ATTACK ON SOVIET CARS

PARTY TALKS 'NEARING CONCLUSION'; FOREIGN POLICY DISCUSSED

LD022130 Rome Domestic Service in Italian 1800 GMT 2 Apr 80 LD

[Text] The negotiations on the program of the new government, conducted by prime minister-designate Cossiga with the delegations of the Christian Democratic Party [DC], the Socialist Party [PSI] and the Republican Party [PRI] are now nearing conclusion. The conclusion, according to the participants, will be positive. Innocenzo Cruciani reports from the Prime Minister's Office:

We are in the final phase of the negotiations on policy and program in which the three parties which will form a government have taken part. Cossiga and the secretaries of the DC, PSI and PRI, assisted by their respective delegations and experts, have devoted this third day of meetings here at the Prime Minister's Office to the problems of foreign policy. As PRI Secretary Spadolini said, all aspects of the international situation have been examined, starting with the threat to world balance, represented by the recent Soviet aggression against Afghanistan. Special attention was paid by the prime minister-designate and the party leaders to the situation in Iran and the whole Middle East area. With reference to these two aspects of international politics Italy's efforts were confirmed regarding promoting detente while observing its Atlantic and Western commitments which represent in Spadolini's words, the unbreakable framework of Italian foreign policy.

However, the analysis carried out by the prime minister-designate and the three party leaders dealt also, naturally, with European problems, the crisis affecting the EEC institutions, in view of the current 6-month period of the Italian presidency of the EEC. An important occasion for examining these topics will be the Council of Europe which will meet on 12 and 13 June in Venice. In the same month the summit meeting of the most highly industrialized countries of the world will take place also in Venice with U.S. President Jimmy Carter present.

Now some points of the economic program will have to be clarified here at the Prime Minister's Office; the government will present this program to Parliament next week. The still debated points concern the southern development fund, nuclear energy and industrial policy. As regards the legnth of the government crisis, Cossiga may go to the President's Office with a list of ministers on Friday, and starting Wednesday the parliamentary debate may take place. It is also said that the first meeting of the Council of Ministers may take place on Saturday for the appointment of under secretaries.

Mideast Position Defined

[Text] Rome, April 2 (ANSA)--The position the Italian Government in the making intends to have on the Middle East was summed up for newsmen today by Republican Party (PRI) Secretary Giovanni Spadolini who said that Israel's inalienable right to exist must be coupled with the Palestinian people's right to gradual self-determination. During a break in the fourth day of talks to forge a platform between premier-designate Francesco Cossiga and the three parties that agreed to form a coalition--Christian Democrats (DC), Socialists (PSI) and "PRI"--Spadolini told journalists "according to our point of view, Israel's right to exist, which is an absolutely unrenounceable right, must adapt itself to the Palestinian people's right to gradual self-determination".

This morning's session of the talks focused on foreign policy issues. Still speaking about the Middle East, Spadolini underscored the necessity that Italy act in harmony with the United States to implement the Camp David framework agreements, which are "the fundamental premise for a peaceful settlement of the Middle Eastern region."

The "PRI" secretary reported that the situations in Iran and in Afghanistan were also discussed in today's meeting. [passage indistinct. Spadolini concluded, saying that there are signs of a possible change in the situation created by the Soviet intervention in Afghanistan, thanks to European moves.

MOROCCO'S KING HASSAN ARRIVES, MEETS WITH POPE

LD022016 Rome Domestic Service in Italian 2000 GMT 2 Apr 80 LD

[Text] King Hassan II of Morocco arrived in Rome this afternoon from Paris. The sovereign met Pope John Paul II to discuss the problem of Jerusalem. Hassan II called on the pope in his capacity as representative of the Islamic Council. At 2010 Hassan II and his entourage left the Vatican and went to Fiumicino Airport.

Status of Jerusalem Discussed

[Text] Vatican City, April 3 (ANSA)--King Hassan II made a lightning visit to the Vatican City Wednesday for talks with Pope John Paul II on the status of the eastern sector of Jerusalem, officially annexed by Israel from Jordanian rule in the wake of the six-day war in 1967. The private audience lasted about an hour. Hassan visited the pope not only as king of Morocco, but also as president of the "Jerusalem Committee" of the Islamic Conference.

The conference's 42 member-states have been asking for some time, even if with slight differences of stress, that the Holy City's eastern sector should return to the status it had before the Israeli occupation. The Vatican's position is that Jerusalem as a whole should be given an internationally guaranteed status as the birthplace of the Jewish, Christian, and Muslim religions. This line was followed by the present pope's predecessors and has frequently been underscored in papal speeches.

After his private meeting with King Hassan, the pope spoke in French to the monarch's retinue, describing the problem of Jerusalem as a "very delicate question".

"I think that the Holy City represents a truly sacred heritage for all the faithful of the three great monotheistic religions and for the whole world, above all, for the people who live on its territory", the Polish-born pontiff added. "A new thrust must be found", he added. "We need a new rapprochement which, far from accentuating divisions, will make it possible to translate a much more fundamental fraternity into facts. With the help of God, this must also make it possible to achieve a solution which may be original, but may also be close, definitive, guaranteed, and respectful of the rights of all. Would that we may see this hope finally realized. For this reason, I dare hope that the believers of the three religions will be capable of simultaneously raising up their prayers to the one God, for the future of a land so dear to their hearts".

The pope also stressed Morocco's deep religious traditions and praised King Hassan for his tolerance towards his non-Muslim subjects.

King Hassan was at his first papal audience. He flew in from Paris for this one appointment and left again for the French capital in the evening. In a departure statement, Hassan said he was "very satisfied with his audience. I found great understanding in the pope for the problems I described as president of the Jerusalem Committee and member of the Islamic Conference", he said. "In his holiness, I found a spiritual leader who understands perfectly that the time has come in which the sons of Abraham, who are Muslims, Christians and Jews, must in fact meet in Jerusalem, not to fight, but to try and put their spiritual heritage in common, thus contributing to peace in the world".

BERLINGUER QUERIES PCF CRITICISM OF MITTERRAND CONTACTS

LD030709 [Editorial Report LD] Rome L'UNITA in Italian on 26 March 1980 carries on page 18 a 1,300-word Augusto Pancaldi report on French press coverage of and comments by politicians on the 24 March meeting in Strasbourg between French Socialist Party First Secretary Francois Mitterrand and PCI Secretary General Enrico Berlinguer, citing LE MONDE, LE MATIN, LE FIGARO, Mitterrand and PCF Secretary General Georges Marchais. Pancaldi also reports the following remarks made by Berlinguer at the end of his visit to Strasbourg: "I had a cordial conversation with French Socialist Party First Secretary Francois Mitterrand in Strasbourg yesterday. This meeting, planned some time ago, comes a fortnight after my Strasbourg meeting with Willy Brandt and after several other conversations which I and other PCI leaders have had in recent months with communist and socialist representatives from various West European countries such as Spain, Portugal and the Scandinavian countries. In fact, Comrade Napolitano is in London at present to meet with leaders of the British Labor Party, Communist Party and trade union movement.

"We are determined to continue and step up our initiative and contacts, in the belief that understanding and the quest for all possible convergences among leftwing and democratic forces of all leanings must be tenaciously purused, by surmounting old and new mistrusts, so that the European workers movement can perform its essential role for the sake of detente and against the right's antipeople policy, so as to open new roads to democratic development and the regeneration of society.

"I do not understand how my meeting with Mitterrand--which took place within the context of this policy, which is not a new one and is well known to comrades in the communist parties including the PCF--can be interpreted and portrayed as an initiative which could damage the PCF. I would like to point out, among other things, that both our party leadership--in a telegram from myself--and the communist parliamentary group in Strasbourg have sternly condemned the slanderous campaign against Georges Marchais and have expressed their solidarity to him and to the PCF."

The report is followed by the following unattributed commentary: "These latest remarks by Marchais seem quite disconcerting, so divorced are they from the facts. First, they contain a gross mystification of the 'historic compromise' strategy, which is portrayed as an alliance with the reactionary right. Second, they distort the significance of the meeting between Berlinguer and Mitterrand, which quite obviously lies within the framework of the attempt to strengthen the weight and initiative of the entire European left against the moderate and conservative alinement. For that matter, judging from PCF statements and joint documents signed with our party and other communist parties, this objective should also be part of the French Communists' strategy.

"In view of such an obvious propagandist distortion, one wonders what political gain and what advantages to the cause of peace and democracy lie behind the attempt to confuse everything and everyone and to lump the socialists together with the right. This is an error for which the workers movement has paid dearly."

PCI'S NAPOLITANO TALKS WITH UK LABOR PARTY, CP

LD020717 Milan L'UNITA in Italian 28 Mar 80 p 19 LD

[Antonio Bronda dispatch: "Napolitano Visits Labor Party and Communist Party of Great Britain (CPGB) Secretaries"]

[Text] London--PCI Directorate member Comrade Giorgio Napolitano's visit to London continues. On Wednesday afternoon Napolitano was received by Labor Party Secretary Ron Hayward. [paragraph continues]

The lengthy and cordial conversation took place at the new Labor headquarters on Walworth Road, which has just been opened as part of the effort to reorganize the party, which over the past 2 years has seen a new thrust to, and the strengthening of the initiative and involvement of activists, party members and affiliated trade union organizations. The campaign for participation and democracy within the party is closely linked to the recovery in Labor's influence on public opinion, the updating of the plan for Britain's economic and social development as an alternative to the Conservative government's current political line, and a closer interest in the shared problems of the European left parties.

Earlier, Comrade Napolitano met at CPGB headquarters with CPGB Secretary General Gordon McLennan and Jack Woddis, head of the international department. During the conversation, there was a very broad and cordial exchange of ideas on the international situation and the present political situation in the respective countries, and also on the problems of cooperation among the various European leftwing forces. The conversation made it possible to confirm the broad and substantial convergence of views between the parties.

On Tuesday evening, following the meeting at the House of Commons, the Labor Party International Department, presided over by Member of Parliament Joan Lestor, organized a working dinner attended by, among others, Members of Parliament Ian Mikardo and Jo Richardson.

All the meetings and contacts this week have emphasized how relations between the Labor Party and the PCI have become frequent and normal and now make possible a considerable circulation of information and experiences. Among other things, Comrade Napolitano was presented with the text of a recent Labor Party paper on Eurocommunism, which is undoubtedly a specific demonstration of the interest in, and new thirst for knowledge of PCI policy which the Eurocommunist phenomenon has prompted in the British Labor Party.

AFGHAN INVASION SEEN AS CATALYST FOR BERLINGUER PRC TRIP

LD030737 Brussels LE SOIR in French 1 Apr 80 p 3 LD

[Pol Mathil article: "Eurocommunism Died in Kabul"]

[Text] The trip to China which PCI Secretary General Enrico Berlinguer is preparing to make in a few days' time really began on 22 March 1978. It was on that day, when speaking to an Italian minister visiting Beijing, that Chinese Vice Premier Deng Xiaoping indicated that there was to be a major softening in the attitude of Mao's successors to the "Eurocommunist phenomenon." Mr Deng admitted in particular that Beijing's attitude, which had hitherto always been unconditionally negative toward Western communist parties considered to owe "allegiance to Moscow," deserved serious reexamination. "However, we must wait until a sufficiently important crisis arises," the Chinese leader said, "before we can judge whether the European parties' independent stance with regard to Moscow is confirmed or not...."

The crisis arose on 26 December 1979. The PCI's attitude toward the Soviet invasion of Afghanistan was clearly considered by Beijing to be sufficiently convincing. The gates of the Heavenly City have opened to a PCI leader for the first time.

It was only after Mao's death in September 1976 that Beijing's anathema against the Italian Communists began to be lifted. In November 1978 the CCP and PCI leaders shook hands for the first time in 30 years. However, that took place on neutral territory: during an official reception given by the Rome government in Chairman Hua Guofeng's honor.

The "Great Leap Forward" in this reconciliation was only really launched, however, by the invasion of Afghanistan. Indeed the Kabul coup dealt a fatal blow to the Eurocommunist myth and a severe blow to relations among Western communist parties and to contacts between some of these parties and Moscow. The occupation of Afghanistan speeded up the long process of division which had already become clear on such crucial issues as expansion of the EEC, Euromissiles, the Euroleft and the attitude toward socialist parties.... Kabul set the seal on the PCF's almost total isolation in the West due to its complete loyalty to Moscow.

The "Kabul coup," however, has less directly brought about a much broader communist split than the one which can be seen in Europe. The announcement, coming in the wake of the Kabul expedition, of a political reconciliation between the Italian and Chinese communists bears witness to the general spread of the Afghan syndrome in the workers movement. However sincere the Italian Communists might be in swearing that Berlinguer's trip to Beijing "is not directed against anybody or against any party," its significance is no less clear. It is anti-Soviet, and if any proof is needed, you just have to compare the influence and impact which will be produced by the two Western communist leaders' trips to the two poles of the Marxist world--namely Georges Marchais' trip to Moscow and Enrico Berlinguer's trip to Beijing....

The "antihegemonist" front--in other words the front of communist parties opposed to Soviet expansionism--has just entered a phase of extension which, however poorly understood by the West, is nonetheless extremely important. Such natural "post-Afghan" axes as Belgrade-Bucharest and PCI-PCE have just been followed by reactions from the Koreans and Japanese.

PCI leadership member Pietro Ingrao spent a week in Pyongyang, the capital of North Korea, in February. For obvious reasons of caution, the joint communique did not make any direct reference to the Afghan invasion but stressed the need to respect "the independence of all peoples." The results of the visit must have been interesting, however, since Italian Communist sources did not hesitate in privately describing North Korea as the "Asian Yugoslavia" after the visit....

In addition, relations between the CPSU and Japanese Communist Party have once again undergone a sudden change. After being divided for decades on the question of the Kurile Islands, seized by Moscow at the end of the war, the two party chairmen, Brezhnev and Miyamoto, issued a communique on 25 December 1979 which seemed to put an end to the split. Indeed the two parties gave the impression of having found an area of agreement--the same distrust of China--as well as a common language--"respect for sovereignty and the right to self-determination"--to quote the official communique.

However, 3 days after that document was signed Mr Brezhnev gave the order to invade Afghanistan. Mr Miyamoto, communist but Japanese, was bound to take it as a personal insult. "It is regrettable," Mr Miyamoto remarked laconically.

Commenting on the Italian leader's forthcoming Chinese tribulations the Italian leftist review IL MANIFESTO described Mr Deng and Mr Berlinguer as men who are "less and less red and more and more expert...."

The Kremlin will probably merely retort that "it is regrettable" since its members are also more expert than red. Mr Berlinguer's pilgrimage to the Heavenly City was included in the bill of Afghan expenses: For the USSR, Kabul is even worth an Italian-Eurocommunist mass and a Korean-Japanese mass. [presumably in the sense of "heterodox practices"]

NICARAGUAN JUNTA LEADERS EXPOUND POLICY AT MADRID TALKS

LD021019 Madrid EL PAIS in Spanish 21 Mar 80 p 7 LD

[Rafael Fraguas report on Spanish Socialist Workers Party (PSOE) Secretary Felipe Gonzalez' Madrid meeting with Nicaraguan junta members: "Sergio Ramirez: 'Our Revolution Has Nothing To Do With the Cuban One'"]

[Text] Sergio Ramirez Mercado and Violeta de Chamorro, members of the Nicaraguan junta of reconstruction with the status of heads of state, met yesterday in Madrid with PSOE Secretary Felipe Gonzalez and Minister of the Presidency Jose Pedro Perez Llorca, during a visit to our country to secure Spanish cooperation with their country. [Prime Minister] Adolfo Suarez, with whom they hoped to meet yesterday afternoon, did not receive them. An EFE dispatch reports that the prime minister had to visit his father at a Madrid hospital, following a deterioration in his condition.

The specific topics which the Sandinist leaders were to have discussed with Adolfo Suarez included the $60 million debt which the overthrown Anastasio Somoza regime built up with Spain. The Nicaraguan junta of reconstruction wishes to reprogram this debt and to secure health, technological and cultural aid.

"Our revolution has nothing to do with the Cuban revolution, which does not mean that we in Nicaragua will not carry out a real revolution, as they have done in Cuba," EL PAIS was told by 42-year-old economist Sergio Ramirez, who has headed the Nicaraguan delegation which visited the FRG, the Netherlands, Belgium and Austria this week.

Ramirez Mercado, who ruled out any possible risks of the militarization of power in Nicaragua, spoke of the existence of powerful circles opposing a revolution in his country and of insidious press campaigns aimed in this direction. He gave assurances that "Nicaragua is experiencing a pluralistic and revolutionary political process, in which hitherto there have been no clashes between differing viewpoints within the political bodies."

In the opinion of Bayardo Arce, one of the Sandinist army's nine top leaders, Nicaragua accepted the offer of a $75 million U.S. loan--a loan subsequently frozen by the U.S. Congress--regarding it as a reflection of a favorable change in U.S. policy with respect to Nicaragua. "We were willing to overlook the history of relations between our countries if this change began, but the loan has been blocked. Nevertheless, it was not the Washington administration which caused this."

With regard to the recent agreements signed in Moscow by a Nicaraguan Government and military delegation, Sergio Ramirez stressed that such agreements are similar to those signed with other countries such as Austria, Romania or the FRG. "The Soviet Union has no possibility of influencing Nicaraguan policy," he said.

As for the situation concerning Somozist prisoners in her country, Violeta de Chamorro of the junta of reconstruction emphasized that the regime abolished the death sentence following Somoza's overthrow, thus "preventing rivers of blood from flowing in Nicaragua." She also emphasized that many former Somozists have been released. "Even some of the leaders of the Sandinist defense committees are former Somozists," they said. These bodies perform social and economic roles, organizing the citizens and monitoring prices, they explained.

According to Felipe Gonzalez, who attended the meeting, "the only intelligent policy with regard to Nicaragua is unconditional solidarity." He also said that "if any mistake has been made in Nicaragua, it is in the lack of generosity toward the defeated." [paragraph continues]

According to the Socialist leader, Europe has failed to understand the Nicaraguan situation and "the localization of the international crisis in the Middle East and Southeast [mescriental] Asia makes the Sandinist revolution more viable than might be supposed."

PCE ORGAN SCORES SOVIETS ON AFGHANISTAN POLICY

WA021700 Madrid NUESTRA BANDERA in Spanish No 102 Jan-Feb 80 pp 1-4 WA

[Editorial: "Worsening of the International Situation"--capitalized passages printed in boldface]

[Text] The process of deterioration of the international situation has reached an alarming level.

The return to the cold war is not total, primarily because there is resistance in very broad sectors toward adopting the two superpowers' method of doing things. However, there is no doubt that the cold war climate is already affecting relations between many countries.

More and more there is talk of a third world war as a possible happening. The expression in itself is deceiving. If a world war were to take place today, its characteristics would be nothing like those of the two previous wars however terrible they may have been. There would be no winners or losers. It would mean the almost total destruction of humanity. This fact undoubtedly is a curb which makes it difficult to resort to war. But it is not a guarantee; the beginning of a military confrontation could lead to the unleashing of an irrational, demented process in a matter of minutes, with frightful consequences.

That is why the problem of war and peace is posed to the worker and progressive forces in a new way today. It is an old problem which is at the very root of the emergence of socialist and revolutionary movements. The question of the moment is whether we, the worker and democratic forces in Spain, in Europe, can do something, and what we can do, to halt this spiral of tensions, cold war and rearmament in which we find ourselves involved.

1. What are the main causes of this worsening of the international situation? A calendar is all that is needed to confirm the falsity of the way in which U.S. spokesmen, more specifically the Carter administration since other North American sectors, including candidate Edward Kennedy, do not use the same language, seek to present events. The "reason" for everything, the "blame" for everything is NOT in the military intervention by the USSR in Afghanistan.

Actually, the worsening of the economic crisis of the capitalist system (together with other factors) was causing, during a period of detente, a serious decline in U.S. imperialism's ability to exercise political and ideological hegemony. The Soviet Union was also losing influence. The crisis of the bipolar system was an increasingly obvious reality.

Following an already traditional procedure, imperialism tended to confront the crisis through an intensification of tensions; provoking animosity in relations, including in the military area, and accentuating the dialectic of blocs.

In past months there were significant incidents: the campaign against Cuba (who no one remembers anymore); threats of military intervention in the Persian Gulf and Iran and the creation of special military units for this purpose. A particularly serious aspect was the prolonged nonratification of SALT II on strategic nuclear weapons. More serious still was the NATO decision, imposed by the United States despite strong European resistance, to install cruise and Pershing missiles in Western Europe. [paragraph continues]

It is obvious that these measures were hindering detente and tended to strengthen the United States' hegemony with respect to its allies and to maintain and intensify the division into military blocs.

2. The faults of imperialism, which we just mentioned in the foregoing paragraph, neither justify nor diminish the seriousness of the act of military intervention committed by the Soviet Union when it sent its troops to Afghanistan, replacing and executing Amin, the former head of the government and the "democratic party," and installing Karmal as the new chief of government and the party.

This action is a brazen violation of the principles of nonintervention and respect for the independence of people, principles which not only are necessary for peaceful relations in the world but are the same as those of the ideals of socialism and communism.

The argument that imperialism has committed many military interventions is not valid because one of the reasons for our rejection of imperialism derives precisely from the fact that it is based on the rule of violence of the large over the small, the law of tanks and gunboats. Moreover, in recent times, specifically after the U.S. defeat in Vietnam, the struggle of the people has forced imperialism to retreat from its methods of open military intervention. It has lost important positions in Africa, Nicaragua and Iran without any intervention by its troops.

The imposition of respect for the principle of noninterference is a great gain by the peoples in struggle for their freedom. In the case of Afghanistan, the USSR has been the one to violate that principle.

The argument that it was a matter of trying to "save" a socialist or almost socialist regime has no real foundation. The so-called "popular revolution" of April 1978 in Afghanistan was actually a palace coup by which some partly military groups with ties with the Soviet Union seized power. Some Soviet intervention, including military advisers, had existed for a long time.

There was no genuine popular movement in the country. That is why the 1978 coup was followed by internal clashes among members of the group in power on the one hand, and on the other by the appearance of guerrillas in the mountainous zones, who were against the new government, an almost permanent phenomenon in that country which lives in large part with a tribal and nomadic system.

Under those circumstances, why did the USSR send its troops to occupy Afghanistan? It is said that they were "requested" by the People's Government of Afghanistan. But which one? By Amin who was executed by a firing squad when the Soviets arrived and who was SUBSEQUENTLY accused of being a "CIA agent," or by Karmal, who arrived WITH the Soviet troops? The latter is the real answer. But in itself it destroys the pretext used to provide formal justification for that military intervention. Actually, if one looks at a map and other aspects of the world situation are considered, the explanation which emerges is the following: The USSR as a great power has carried out a military operation in Afghanistan in order to occupy advantageous positions in a key strategic zone of the world near the Indian Ocean and the main oil fields.

3. It is for this precise reason that the military intervention in Afghanistan has opened a breach greater than ever before (greater than that of the case of Czechoslovakia) between the international policy of the USSR and the policy of a large part of the revolutionary forces in Europe and the world, specifically most of the Western European communist parties (with the exception of France and Portugal), as well as those of Japan, Mexico, Australia and so forth.

The basic problem is that a military intervention DOES NOT SERVE, it cannot serve, for strengthening the cause of socialism, for creating new socialist regimes.

If military confrontation spreads, if nuclear war results, it would be, as we have already said, the destruction of humanity.

If there is a nonnuclear military confrontation for the control of strategic zones, it would be the clash of the two military blocs, of the two superpowers, but in no case would it be OUR WAR. It would not be a war for the sake of revolution or the liberation of still subjugated people. Because of the palpable effects IT HAS ALREADY HAD, the Soviet intervention has been very negative for the worker and progressive classes. It has provided arguments to North American imperialism for it to try to recover its leadership. It is providing arguments for the forces of the right in Europe, which expect to take advantage of this period to increase the gains they achieved in recent times. Within the United States itself it is helping the most reactionary elements and in all probability facilitating Carter's reelection, who has traded his "pacifism" of yesterday for a furious militarism.

The accentuation of the policy of blocs is in direct and radical contradiction with the interests of the working class and all the progressive forces of the world.

Detente, the reduction of military factors and respect for the principle of noninterference help the national and social liberation of peoples. Of course it is obvious that in the recent period of a relative lessening of tensions, certain advances have been made in Europe, specifically the disappearance of fascist dictatorships. Other important advances have been made in various zones of the world.

The Soviet Union policy appeared to understand and facilitate these positive aspects of detente. Now Afghanistan represents a change for the worse.

Condemning the intervention in Afghanistan, the PCE [Spanish Communist Party] bases itself on its revolutionary principles. Revolutions are not exported--this Marxist idea is perhaps more real today than every before--and certainly not through a military operation by a great power. Something else can be achieved by that: the conquest of another country. But it does not advance socialism; socialism has to be the result of struggle, of the creation of workers and the people.

That is why socialism is not helped by the system of military blocs and by intensifying the confrontation of blocs; quite the contrary.

Although it may not be possible to deal with it here today, there is no doubt that the Soviet intervention in Afghanistan makes the subject of the very NATURE of the Soviet system a matter of discussion. There is an obvious delay in dealing with this question in an open, straightforward manner, viewing reality as it is, in the Spanish Marxist debate. The present turn in Soviet policy indicates a more decisive influence by the military sectors. A number of decisions can only be explained within the framework of military thinking. On the other hand, the application of a policy which contains operations such as that of Afghanistan naturally causes the army to play an increasingly greater role in the making of decisions.

It is an aspect that it will be necessary to include in a more in-depth study, to which NUESTRA BANDERA shall make its contribution on the nature of the Soviet state and society.

4. The military occupation of a country by the Soviets and the hysterical reaction by President Carter created a reaction in some communist sectors, a reaction which could be called "two-sided." A choice must be made. There are only two sides. To be against imperialism there is only one place to be: on the USSR's side.

This reaction, aside from other reasons, undoubtedly is reflected in the attitude, at first sight surprising, adopted by the PCF [French Communist Party], which sided with the USSR. However, the concept of the "two sides" also exists among some communists here. It is proper to discuss the subject, to get as far as possible to the bottom of the problem.

At first sight that concept of the "two sides" seems to be something very simple, very clear, and therefore attractive. But the bad thing is that it does not REFLECT REALITY. It leaves out of our view the gigantic forces in the world today which are not with the Soviet Union but which, in turn, are against North American imperialism. Of the 104 UN countries which voted to condemn the Soviet intervention, THE IMMENSE MAJORITY are opposed to U.S. policy on a number of decisive issues. It is the so-called Third World. It is the movement of the nonalined. To ignore or underestimate that reality would be a failure to understand the changes, perhaps the most important phenomenons that are taking place and about to take place on the world scene and which are taking place OUTSIDE existing blocs. One of the characteristics of Eurocommunism is the radical break with this concept of the "two sides" (it undoubtedly had its justification in other times and because of that is still rooted in the political culture of many communists) and the preparation of a strategy based on the realities of our time.

In view of the alarming worsening of the international situation, the most important question posed to the Eurocommunist forces is the following: "Is it possible to achieve a NEW GROUPING OF FORCES on our continent, a sort of THIRD WAY on the plane of international relations capable of confronting a Soviet policy of the type of the Afghanistan intervention on the one hand, and on the other, a North American policy which tries to push towards the cold war, a break in economic, sports and cultural relations and the intensification of the arms race and military confrontations...?

In the platform of that new grouping there would have to be points such as the following: condemnation of any action of force in international relations, regardless from whence it comes, and the demand for the withdrawal of Soviet troops from Afghanistan; the demand for a renewal of dialog and negotiations for drawing away from the cold war and the reestablishment of detente; immediate negotiations on security and armament to put an end to the arms race; cancellation of the installation of new missiles in Europe and the attainment of a balance based on the control and reduction of weapons; preparations as of now, with participation of political forces, of the Madrid conference so that it will be an effective step toward security, disarmament and cooperation; the combination of political and diplomatic initiatives with mass mobilizations to achieve those objectives and the establishment of new relations between Europe and the Third World. It would be absurd to remain silent or underestimate the difficulties of a policy oriented in the direction indicated, particularly because it means a departure from the routine, the opening of virgin territory, the invention of new ways of making policy.

In any case, however, it is a policy which considers profound trends of the present historical phase. There are objective factors in Western Europe which are moving in the direction of a greater independence, a separation from what has been its "status" of subordination to the United States. New attitudes are visible at times in the midst of socialist and social-democratic parties. There is concern in the Catholic world, trends favoring an action that will diminish threats.

A number of political forces, specifically the PCE and PCI [Italian Communist Party], are working in a unified, plural field of broad political action to materialize that demand for the struggle for peace and detente.

It is necessary for every communist to be aware that today that struggle for peace is an integral and decisive part of a revolutionary determination.

BILATERAL FISHING COMMISSION ESTABLISHED WITH ANGOLA

LD310640 Madrid Domestic Service in Spanish 1700 GMT 29 Mar 80 LD

[Text] Minister of Transport and Communication Salvador Sanchez-Teran and his counterpart for fishing from the Republic of Angola, Emilio Guerra, have signed a protocol in Madrid, giving the go-ahead to formation of a mixed working commission which will meet in April and May and whose purpose will be the drafting of a wide-ranging fishing cooperation agreement between the two countries. During the time that the Angolan delegation has been in Madrid and Vigo, headed by the minister for fisheries, opinions were exchanged on the present state of relations regarding fishing, with a view to (?establishing) cooperation between the two countries.

UNION OF DEMOCRATIC CENTER SETS UP STANDING COMMITTEE

LD280939 Madrid ABC in Spanish 21 Mar 80 p 8 LD

[Unattributed report: "UCD Standing Committee Set Up Yesterday"]

[Text] The Union of the Democratic Center [UCD] standing committee was set up yesterday morning, and held its first meeting under the chairmanship of the prime minister and UCD chairman, Adolfo Suarez. The standing committee is composed of the following people: Adolfo Suarez, Rafael Ari-Salgado, Fernando Abril Martorell, Fernando Alvarez de Miranda, Pio Cabanillas, Rafael Calvo Ortega, Francisco Fernandez Ordonez, Joaquin Garrigues Walker, Landelino Lavilla, Rodolfo Martin Villa and Jose Pedro Perez-Llorca.

The committee, which will meet weekly, will be of an open nature, and other members of the Executive Committee will be able to attend its meetings, depending on the topics to be discussed.

At yesterday's meeting, various matters of an internal nature, such as the working timetable, the state of the party and the coming political council meeting--to be held at the end of April--were broached.

Article 24 of the centrist party's rules stipulates that the chairman will be able to set up a standing committee composed of Executive Committee members and including the party's secretary general to decide on day-to-day matters within the scope of the Executive Committee's own powers.

PREMIER VOICES 'CONCERN' OVER HOSTAGES TO BANI-SADR

LD021215 Copenhagen AKTUELT in Danish 31 Mar 80 p 4 LD

[Unattributed report: "Anker Jorgensen Writes to Iranian President"]

[Text] Prime Minister Anker Jorgensen has sent a letter to Iranian President Abolhasan Bani-Sadr in which he expresses concern over the situation of the American hostages in Tehran and hopes that the United Nations secretary general will reach a solution to the problem. Foreign Minister Kjeld Olesen confirmed this Sunday. According to the foreign minister, the latter also expresses regret that the commission which was set up to examine the Iranian Government's charges against the ex-shah was not able to achieve any results.

The contents of the prime minister's letter agree with the communique which the Scandinavian prime ministers adopted in Helsinki a few days ago. The American wish that the Western Euopean nations also make their views on the hostage situation known lies behind the sending of the letter.

PRESSURE MOUNTS FOR CHANGE OF ENERGY MINISTER

LD011517 Stockholm DAGENS NYHETER in Swedish 27 Mar 80 p 6 LD

[Sven Svensson report: "'We Refuse To Negotiate on Energy'; Social Democrats Deliver Ultimatum: Petri Must Be Replaced"]

[Text] "We hope that the government will implement the conclusions of the referendum and appoint a representative of alternative 2 as minister of energy," Social Democrat energy expert Ingvar Carlsson told DAGENS NYHETER. The Social Democrats will refuse to negotiate with the politically unaffiliated energy minister, Carl Axel Petri. And then there will be a great risk of trouble in question after question in the Riksdag.

The Social Democrats and the Liberals were behind alternative 2, which won the referendum. These two parties together represent a majority in the Riksdag.

The energy program which will be presented to the Riksdag must in all important points be based on the program contained in alternative 2, regarding both the number of reactors and the plans for phasing out nuclear energy.

With an apolitical energy minister, who has no contacts with and no support from the Social Democrats, who are the largest party behind alternative 2, the nonsocialist government could soon find itself in great difficulties.

The three neosocialist governing parties must first reach an internal compromise before proposals are put before the Riksdag. In the Riksdag the Social Democrats can demand changes, which the Liberal Party in turn can support by referring to the victory of alternative 2 in the referendum.

In the government the Liberal Party has raised the question of who is to be energy minister after the referendum, but no decision has been made. Party leaders agreed to return to the matter at a later date. It is well known that both Thorbjorn Falldin and Gosta Bohman would like to see the present apolitical energy minister, Carl Axel Petri, continue at his post. Both the Social Democrats and the Liberal Party consider it unreasonable to have an apolitical energy minister in this most political of all areas. If the present energy minister continues the Social Democrats will not negotiate with the government on the implementation of alternative 2.

"We do not decide who will be energy minister in a nonsocialist government but we hope that the government will draw the correct conclusions from the victory of alternative 2 in the referendum," said Ingvar Carlsson, whose views are confirmed by party leader Olof Palme.

"It is completely unreasonable to have an apolitical individual as energy minister--an individual who is not an expert on energy questions either. Our side will not lend legitimacy to government actions in energy questions, if the government is not represented by an advocate of alternative 2, which won the referendum," Ingvar Carlsson said. "If the government does not appoint a representative of alternative 2 as energy minister after this alternative's victory in the referendum we will await the government's proposals and examine them critically when they have been put before the Riksdag," Ingvar Carlsson added.

The Social Democrats consider that with an apolitical energy minister members of the moderate coalition party and the center party in the government will have the right of veto when it comes to implementing alternative 2.

If representatives of alternative 2 are to fill the post of energy minister, then ex-Energy Minister Carl Tham and ex-Foreign Minister Hans Blix, who was alternative 2's campaign leader, are the likely names.

With either of these two men as energy minister the government's energy proposals would be able to win broad support from the Riksdag from the very beginning. An energy minister who represents alternative 2 would be able to come to arrangements with the Social Democrats even before the proposals were laid before the Riksdag.

Soon the government will decide whether to fuel four nuclear power stations in accordance with the Nuclear Power Plant Act. The act states that reactors may be activated if there are agreements for fuel reprocessing and if totally safe storage of the highly radioactive waste can be insured.

The ballot paper for alternative 3 read "no fuel reprocessing at all." Does this have any significance for the government's decision on activation?

"No," replied Foreign Minister Ola Ullsten at a press conference Wednesday. "It is a question of political formulas, not of safety considerations."

"Carl Axel Petri's post as energy minister was provisional during government talks and it now remains to find a permanent solution," Ola Ullsten said. "We have not yet had time to discuss the matter within the government and the Liberal Party has not been able to make any demands."

PYM: POSSIBILITY OF DEVELOPING CHEMICAL WEAPONS STUDIED

WA021912 London REUTER in English 1906 GMT 2 Apr 80 WA

[Text] London, April 2, REUTER--Britain is studying the possibility of developing chemical weapons to counter what it says is a big Soviet build-up in chemical warfare capability, Defense Minister Francis Pym said today. Mr Pym said in a radio interview that the Soviets were able to "drop chemical weapons of the most horrific kind more or less wherever they like, and we have no such capability at all. It is an horrendous weapon to contemplate," he said, "because it represents such an awful threat, it is necessary for us to consider whether we in turn ought to seek to deter them from using it by having a similar capability ourselves." Mr Pym, speaking after publication of the Conservative government's first defense review since taking office last May, said no conclusions had yet been reached. The government said in its defense review that more money and equipment would be pumped into Britain's Army, Navy and Air Force every year, at least until 1984. The defense budget for 1980-81 would total 17.6 billion dollars, an increase in real terms of 3.5 per cent over the current year. The defense review admitted the spending would be a severe drain on Britain's economy but said it was necessary because of a growing Soviet threat to the West.

DAILY TELEGRAPH BACKS CARTER'S IRAN TACTICS

LD021347 London THE DAILY TELEGRAPH in Fnglish 2 Apr 80 p 18 LD

[Editorial: "Carter's Iran Torment"]

[Text] President Carter is doing his best to protect the lives--and eventually secure the release--of the Americans illegally held hostage in Iran. To this end, he is prepared to ignore the vilification unleashed against him by Ayatollah Khomeyni, whose hatred and blood-lust for the shah appear to entend into the realm of dementia. Instead, the President in his statement yesterday restricted himself to responding to the speech by the Iranian president, Mr Bani-Sadr. Mr Bani-Sadr had said that the hostages would be transferred from the embassy into government custody, if the United States declared publicly "that they will not attack Iran, that they are not conspiring against us and that they will not undertake any further actions against us." Mr Carter said that in the light of the announcement that control of the hostages would be transferred to the Iranian Government, America would not impose additional sanctions against Iran.

This falls some way short of the kind of public declaration Bani-Sadr had suggested, but it meets his main demand, namely, no further action against Iran. It is as far as Mr Carter could possibly have gone. There will be those who would argue that Mr Carter is approaching the whole matter from the wrong angle. The lives of the hostages, they might say, should be a secondary consideration to the question of America's dignity and standing as a great world power. The men and women held hostage are in their government's service just as much as soldiers committed to battle are. This is not the view Mr Carter has taken, and he is right. Nothing would be gained by a limited (it could only be limited) military punitive action against Iran which resulted in harm to the hostages but produced no overall change for the better in the Iranian regime.

Whether there will be a successful outcome leading to release of the hostages will depend now on whether Khomeyni and his bloodshot followers impose their will on those members of the government who would dearly like to get shot of the whole business. Mr Carter and the American people deserve more sympathy, not least from those crittics who, with no main solution to offer, fall back on nit-poiking the day-to-day tactics of the White House.

GOVERNMENT SPOKESMAN COMMENTS ON WALDHEIM REPORT TO UNGA

NC031225 Nicosia Domestic Service in Greek 1130 GMT 3 Apr 80 NC

[Text] Referring to the UN secretary general's report to the General Assembly on developments regarding the resumption of the [inter-Cypriot] talks the government spokesman has made the following statement:

The UN secretary general's report is an objective account of facts and developments concerning the intensive and persistent efforts that have been made for the resumption of the intercommunal talks. The report also publicly confirms everything that the Greek-Cypriot side has said regarding the position it had adopted throughout the course of the relevant consultations, as well as its constructive approach to the efforts for the resumption of the intercommunal dialog.

On the other hand it also confirms the statement of the Greek Cypriot side that the UN secretary general had suggested that the Greek Cypriot interlocutor had the right to comment and express reservations concerning the interpretation of certain concepts that were contained in the opening statement and that Mr Denktas had concealed this in his public statements and also that he had accepted only that part of the statement which served his purpose and rejected the rest.

Despite the fact that the UN secretary general's efforts for the resumption of dialog have so far not borne fruit because of the negative attitude of the Turkish side, the Greek Cypriot side will continue the same positive stand it has adopted up to now and will give every possible help to the UN secretary general's task because it believes that the intercommunal dialog based on the relevant agreements is the best procedure for finding a peaceful and viable solution to the Cyprus problem.

ATAKOL REJECTS GREEK PROPOSALS AS ANOTHER 'MANEUVER'

TA021808 (Clandestine) Bayrak Radio in Turkish to Cyprus 1530 GMT 2 Apr 80 TA

[Text] Minister of Foreign Affairs, Defense and Tourism Kenan Atakol said that the Turkish Cypriot views on the new Greek Cypriot proposals were submitted to the UN special representative in Cyprus, Galindo-Pohl, yesterday evening. Atakol added that the Greek Cypriot side, which was faced with a deadlock following the unconditional Turkish Cypriot acceptance of Waldheim's proposals, tried to eliminate this deadlock with a maneuver that it called new proposals. Atakol warned the UN secretary general against being deceived by this Greek Cypriot trick.

In a statement today Atakol said: Yesterday evening we submitted to the UN representative the Turkish Cypriot views on the new Greek Cypriot proposals delivered to us by the UN representative yesterday morning. We pointed out that the proposals submitted by the Greek Cypriots, which they call a new approach, are neither new nor do they present a new approach. Actually the UN special representative has been consulting the two sides on the disputed issues for the last 2 months. On 28 March he submitted the understanding reached during these consultations by the two sides. The Greek Cypriot proposals disclosed on 31 March, disregarding the consultations of the last 2 months and suggesting a return to the beginning, are aimed only at eliminating the deadlock faced by the Greek Cypriots following the Turkish Cypriot acceptance of Waldheim's recent proposals. The Greek Cypriots are trying to create the impression that they are submitting new proposals, thus diverting public attention away from Waldheim's 28 March proposals. They are trying to involve the UN secretary general in their maneuvers. If the Greek Cypriots are successful in their maneuver they will try to portray the Turkish Federated State as the intransigent side, and to make the public forget that it was actually the Greek Cypriot side that rejected the 28 March proposals.

The Turkish Cypriot stand is clear. Since there is no new approach there is no need for a reply. The UN secretary general should not be a tool of Greek Cypriot maneuvers and tricks, and should clearly point out in his report that the Turkish Cypriot side has unconditionally accepted Waldheim's 28 March proposals and that the Greek Cypriot side has rejected them. We would like to reaffirm our stand regarding the recent Waldheim proposals. We have unconditionally accepted these proposals. I would like to stress again that in the event the Greek Cypriot administration accepts Waldheim's proposals, the Turkish Cypriot side is ready to begin negotiations as soon as possible.

KIPRIANOU WELCOMES AAPSO SUPPORT FOR CYPRUS

NC031255 Nicosia Domestic Service in Greek 1130 GMT 3 Apr 80 NC

[Text] The president of the republic, Mr Kiprianou, has enphasized that the reason why the efforts of the UN secretary general for the resumption of the inter-Cypriot talks have not resulted in anything is the negative stand of the Turkish side, which insists that we should agree to unacceptable terms in advance, something that we cannot do. Mr Kiprianou, who was replying to an address by the assistant secretary general of the Afro-Asian People's Solidarity Organization, Mr Muri Abd ar-Razzaq, whom he received this morning together with the vice chairman of the movement and chairman of the EDEK party, Mr Lissaridhis, and members of the organization's Secretariat, stressed that we have made every possible effort in a spirit of good will and understanding for the resumption of the talks. Turkey, however, is not showing any signs of altering its stand on the Cyprus question.

In our efforts to settle the Cyprus issue, he said, we have accepted the biregional federation, but the other side is not interested in a federation, but in division and partition. In conclusion the president of the republic emphasized the determination of the Cypriot people to continue their struggle until vindication, and thanked the Afro-Asian People's Solidarity Organization for its support for Cyprus.

In his address, Mr Nuri Abd ar-Razzaq said that one of the reasons for which the leadership of the movement had come to the island was to open the newly-established international information center of the movement in Cyprus. Mr Nuri Abd ar-Razzaq thanked the president of the republic, who had made it possible to establish this center on the island.

In his statement Mr Lissaridhis said that the reason why the Afro-Asian People's Solidarity Organization had chosen Cyprus as the base for its information center is that it wants to show its solidarity for the struggle of the Cypriot people and its appreciation for Cyprus' stand on various international questions. It has been decided, he added, that a group from the movement should deal especially with the Cyprus question for the purpose of promoting the Cypriot people's struggle.

ATHENS DENIES GREEK-TURKISH 'SUMMIT' PROPOSED

ATO21710 Athens NEWS in English 2 Apr 80 p 4 AT

[Excerpt] A government spokesman said in Athens Monday that no proposal has been submitted by any quarters for a Camp David style summit on Greek-Turkish differences.

The spokesman was referring to a U.S. Senate report Saturday, which said that the United States may have to call a Camp David style summit to help Greece and Turkey bridge their differences over Cyprus and the Aegean Sea, and obtain Greece's reintegration into NATO.

ANOTHER GREEK SHIPYARD REPAIRING SOVIET SHIPS

ATO21440 Athens AKROPOLIS in Greek 2 Apr 80 pp 1, 9 AT

[Excerpt] Since the middle of March a second repair station for ships of the Soviet Merchant Marine and possibly of the Navy has been operating in the installations of the "Khalkis Shipyards."

Most local Khalkis personalities who were asked about this fact replied that it seems to concern a "new Neorion case" which, for various reasons, has yet to be announced.

In any case, it is a fact that about 20 days ago repairs began on the 3,115-ton Soviet freighter "Protsion" in the installations of the "Khalkis Shipyards." The ship arrived in the Bay of Mikron Vathi, Avlidhos, on the morning of 12 March in order to undergo general repairs.

Three days later and after strict security measures were taken so the news would not leak, the Soviet ship entered one of the two floating docks of the "Khalkis Shipyards" where it is still to be found.

Protsion is the first Soviet ship to be repaired at the "Khalkis Shipyards."

According to exclusive AKROPOLIS reports, the Soviet commerical ship Protsion has been recorded in the "Khalkis Shipyards" registry as belonging to a "private Soviet shipping company," although it is well known that the entire Soviet Merchant Marine belongs to the state.

According to the same reports, last February the shipping company sent a letter to the "Khalkis Shipyards" through the Foreign Ministry stating an interest in competitive bids by the "shipyards" so that it could send its ship for repair work.

Shortly thereafter the "Khalkis Shipyards" administration conveyed through the Foreign Ministry its bids which were considered competitive.

The next step was for the "company's" representative to come to Khalkis to sign the relevant contract and for the ship to arrive in the shipyards on 12 March.

Last Saturday, a distinguished Khalkis personality who is informed about the entire affair told us that the "agreement of the Khalkis Shipyards" with the Russian company for the repair of the "Protsion" must be the basis for increased cooperation between the "shipyards" and the Soviet Merchant Marine.

"It is a fact--the personality in question told us--that the 'Neorion Shipyards' cannot meet the constantly increasing repair needs of the Soviet Merchant Marine. For this reason, the agreement must be extended to include the 'Khalkis Shipyards,' whereupon I would not be surprised to see the Soviet Navy's ships arriving for repairs here."

GOVERNMENT CRITICIZES PASOK STAND ON ELECTION ISSUE

AT021547 Athens I KATHIMERINI in Greek 2 Apr 80 p 1 AT [Text] Yesterday the government noted that the responsibility for the outcome--positive or negative--of the impending election for a new president of the republic is borne by the opposition and especially by PASOK. Starting from the fact that New Democracy has only 174 deputies in parliament, authoritative government circles stressed that if the new president is elected by the current parliament in any case he will not represent only one party since at least 180 votes are required for his election. On the basis of current party strengths, no other party except for PASOK and the KKE has the necessary six deputies to become the determining factor in the election. (KODISO [Democratic Socialist Party] has four deputies, EDIK [Democratic Center Union] five, the National Party four, EDA [Unitary Democratic Left] one, KKE (Interior) one and seven deputies are independent.) In addition, it is being noted that the minority parties are far from having reached an agreement on the formulation of a joint stance in view of the presidential elections.

For these two reasons--most probably--thus far the government does not seem prepared to come to an understanding with the opposition, especially since this request has not been officially expressed by political parties.

This position is reflected in the statement which was issued yesterday by authoriatative government circles in reply to a question concerning the description of Papandreou's statement made the day before yesterday which was considered incoherent and contradictory.

The government statement to which--it should be noted--the PASOK chairman has not replied is as follows:

"First: In any case and if premature elections are held they will inevitably be linked with the election for a president of the republic since he will be elected by the new Chamber of Deputies.

"Second: The PASOK chairman brandishes the danger of a call for premature elections, a danger he himself can avert because the election of a president of the republic depends on the opposition.

"Third: The PASOK chairman is asking for parliamentary elections prior to the election of a president without understanding that questioning the right of the current parliament to elect a president undermines the regime and also that if the new parliament cannot elect a new president, because it needs 200 votes to do so, it will have to be dissolved and new elections held. All this confirms the complete confusion into which the PASOK chairman has fallen."

ECEVIT EXPRESSES VIEWS ON PRESIDENTIAL STALEMATE, VIOLENCE

Decries Election Developments

TA011643 Ankara Domestic Service in Turkish 1400 GMT 1 Apr 80 TA

[Text] In a news conference today, main opposition party leader Bulent Ecevit expressed the views of the RPP regarding the presidential election developments:

[Begin Ecevit recording] We have reached the 11th day of voting for president. There are therefore only 5 days left before the termination of the 15 days stipulated by the Constitution. No hopeful sign has so far emerged concerning the conclusion of the election. Although the entire parliament is responsible for facilitating the presidential elections, the RPP, the Justice Party and the National Salvation Party [NSP] are especially responsible for this because of the number of seats they occupy in the parliament. The other party groups have already announced that they are willing to make the necessary contributions to efforts to facilitate the election of a president.

The RPP is fulfilling all its duties regarding efforts to facilitate the presidential election. It is fulfilling them on time, and it is calling for dialog and cooperation on this subject. The RPP started to make these appeals weeks before the election process. However, both the Justice Party and the NSP have so far not taken any concrete steps in this direction. This situation causes concern. Both the functioning of the Constitution and the state and the prestige of the Turkish Grand National Assembly could be affected. If the election of a president is delayed, serious problems will arise with respect to the functioning of the Constitution and the state and the prestige of the parliament.

In addition, if the parliament has to resort to appointing an acting president, the authority of the acting president would be in question. This will add a new dimension to the problem. A person who maintains his party ties cannot be expected to be as impartial as required of a president by the Constitution.

The party in power obstructed the work of the Grand National Assembly for weeks before the beginning of the presidential elections. Now it is indifferent and has adopted an attitude which is hindering and delaying the election of a president. If the presidential elections have to drag on for weeks or months because of this, the Grand National Assembly will not be able to function during these weeks or months and no bills will be passed. It will not be able to fulfill its supervisory duty either. The laws awaited by several sections of the society will unfortunately be delayed as well. A presidential crisis will needlessly be added to the existing crises in Turkey, and a parliamentary crisis will also be created. This is why we expect all parties and groups in the Grand National Assembly to contribute to the speedy conclusion of the presidential elections.

A government that attempts to survive by obstructing the functioning of the National Assembly, on the one hand, and by hindering the presidential elections, on the other, has come to the end of its term. [end recording]

Comments on Violence

TA021728 Ankara Domestic Service in Turkish 1400 GMT 2 Apr 80 TA

[Excerpts] RPP leader Bulent Ecevit held a news conference today and expressed his views on incidents of violence. In reply to a question, Ecevit expressed the belief that the establishment of a new broad-based government will be beneficial.

[Begin Ecevit recording] The fact that the number of rightist activists are significantly low on the list of suspects and prisoners who were to be shot unless they surrendered in accordance with Law No 1481--dated 1971--and the fact that rightist activists who were assisted in escaping from prison--for example the person suspected of murdering Abdi Ipekci--do not appear in this list, constitute additional examples of the state's overt partiality. According to the announcement by the Istanbul martial law prosecutor, this prisoner shot another person after escaping from prison, and his friends shot a person who informed on him.

The state should deal with incidents of violence with impartiality, regardless of whether they originate from the left or from the right. However, it is a generally known fact that rightist activists are being protected. The daily average of persons being killed in violent incidents during the present government is three times greater than the daily average during the reign of the RPP government. This indicates that the methods used by the Justice Party government, the provocative style and attitude and the partial stand adopted by this government cannot bring peace and tranquillity to the country. It is impossible to secure internal peace by discriminating among perpetrators of violence and by attempting to counter terrorism with state terror. Furthermore, these methods destroy respect for the state.

There is a government in power today. However, its existence is a greater threat than its absence. Under these circumstances I believe that it is necessary to remove the government from office through democratic means as soon as possible. It will be beneficial to establish a broad-based--as broad as possible--government in a bid to solve certain basic problems, and particularly to repair the damage to the state. This is why I have, on certain occasions, proposed a possible RPP-Justice Party-National Salvation Party coalition. I do not think it would be correct to call this a national coalition since all the parties are not included. Such a government could not be expected to fully solve the basic economic and social problems. However, it could be expected to repair the damage to the state and make the democratic, legal state more effective. Naturally, the realization of my proposal does not only depend on me or the RPP. It also depends on the other two parties and on development. [end recording]

NSP COMMENTS ON PRESIDENTIAL ELECTIONS, MARTIAL LAW

[Text] Ankara, 2 Apr (AA)--National Salvation Party (opposition) Deputy President Sevket Kazan said today that, if the parliament failed to elect the new president of the republic by April 6 and Senate President Ihsan Sabri Caglayangil assumed office as acting president, Caglayangil's power to nominate the new senators from the presidential contingency would be controversial.

On the extension of martial law beyond April 26, Kazan recalled that the NSP spokesman said during debates on martial law in February: "This is the last time we are voting for the extension of martial law." The NSP parliamentary group would review the last two months' martial law practices and decide whether a further extension for 2 months is necessary, Kazan stressed.

GUNAYDIN BLAMES TERRORISM ON 'KURDISH NATIONALISM'

NC030817 Istanbul GUNAYDIN in Turkish 1 Apr 80 p 3 NC

[Article by Husamettin Celebi: "What the Young Officer Wanted To Say"]

[Excerpts] An army captain, a noncommissioned officer and a private in our armed forces were shot to death by treacherous persons in Mardin. At the funeral, the youngest of the officers in his address uttered a sentence which ought to be heavily underlined and seriously considered. Stressing the vehemence of this treachery, the young officer said the events in Turkey could not be called "terrorism" in the international sense.

And now when one of the youngest members of our armed forces found an opportunity to speak at his colleagues' funeral, he cried out to the entire nation and its competent authorities: "This is not terrorism". He was referring to what he had witnessed at close quarters. He did not merely voice impressions acquired from a distance.

If it is not terrorism, then what is it? We cannot expect that young officer to provide the answer. After all, the speaker was a soldier. Soldiers talk very little and say only what they are allowed to say. What should be done at this stage is to identify this movement which the young officer emphatically refused to accept as "terrorism." When we look at the pamphlets distributed on the occasion of the Persian New Year's Day we see that the answer is "Kurdish nationalism." This is a war with roots in Kurdish nationalism.

We were among those who made this diagnosis at least 3 years ago. We kept saying this is "separatism and subversion" and occasionally, like others, we reluctantly used the term "Kurdism." The truth is that in general we are like the doctor who has diagnosed his patient's trouble as "cancer" but refrained from spelling it out. We fear the complications which such an open statement would create. Efforts to cure the disease have so far proved abortive. The malady is worsening. By refusing to reveal the true diagnosis, we are doing a disservice to both the patient and to his environment.

It is high time we spoke openly. The separatist and subversive acts being perpetrated in east and southeast Anatolia, as well as in big cities such as Istanbul, Ankara, Izmir and in our industrial centers is "Kurdish nationalism." This is the truth which the young army officer wanted to stress at the sad ceremony in Mardin. If they are identified as "anarchists", "terrorists" and "murderers"--a new term coined by the Turkish radio and television network--we can easily trace this truth. A vast majority of them have been brought up being told that "they are not Turks." They themselves know this. The state knows it. So there is no harm in the nation knowing it also. The nation must know so that it can properly evaluate the efforts and sacrifices of the state officials.

TCP STATEMENT CALLS FOR DISCLOSURE OF U.S.-TURKISH AGREEMENT

TA021008 (Clandestine) Voice of Turkish Communist Party in Turkish to Europe and Turkey 0600 GMT 2 Apr 80 TA

[Statement issued on 31 March by Turkish Communist Party [TCP] Central Committee]

[Text] The pro-American Demirel government and the military clique have signed a new slavery agreement with the United States. This agreement--the details of which are being kept from the people--is further trampling our national sovereignty, contradicting our national interests and endangering our regional peace and security. The agreement totally reflects U.S. imperialism's hegemonist interests in Turkey and our region.

The new slavery agreement once again provides the United States with bases for aggression and spying on our soil, reiterating the right of the United States to carry out armed intervention in Turkey.

By taking this step, the pro-American government has opened the way for dangerous adventures that might transform out country into a nuclear cemetery. This agreement--imposed on Turkey within the framework of the Carter doctrine--represents an open incitement and a threat against the Soviet Union, the socialist countries, Afghanistan, Iran and the Muslim Arab peoples of our region.

This agreement contradicts the political document signed between Turkey and the Soviet Union and the principles of goodneighborliness and cooperation.

The U.S. objective is to bind Turkdy more strongly to NATO through this agreement. The plans for establishing a war industry included in this agreement will provide imperialist arms monopolies with new profits, but will aggravate the country's economic crisis. With increased spending on armaments under the guise of the modernization of the armed forces, heavier burdens will have to be shouldered by our people who already caught in the vice of unemployment and a high cost of living.

Statements by the foreign minister, who signed the agreement with the U.S. ambassador to Ankara, are only an attempt to hide the truth from the public. To try to protray the U.S. bases on our soil as Turkish military installations is nothing but an attempt to deceive through lies. The placing of these bases under so-called Turkish command is only a deceitful measure taken in the face of the increased reaction by our people against U.S. imperialism and of the discontent among the armed forces.

By stating that military cooperation with the United States will be carried out within the framework of NATO, the government is trying to hide the extent of broad authority extended to the United States through this agreement. In fact, the major imperialist force which controls the NATO Treaty is still the United States. Turkey has been left with no right to object either to aggressive operations to be undertaken by NATO or to action to be taken from U.S. bases on our soil.. Turkey has been entrusted once more with the role of outpost and gendarme of U.S. imperialism.

The United States and the other imperialist countries are taking advantage of the grave economic crisis our country is experiencing in order to strengthen their hegemony. The collaborationist Demirel government, which is going around in search of economic aid from imperialist countries, is again selling out our country's independence for dollars. Our people will not forget this treachery.

The Turkish Communist Party is calling for the public revelation of the secret terms of the agreement. Possibilities exist for tearing up this agreement, which is only provisionally in effect until it is approved by the parliament. This can be achieved through the resistance of all patriotic forces--within and outside the parliament--in favor of national independence.

CUMHURIYET CRITICIZES DEFENSE AGREEMENT WITH U.S.

NC030845 Istanbul CUMHURIYET in Turkish 1 Apr 80 p 2 NC

["Window" column by Ilhan Selcuk: "The Inheritance of the Defense Cooperation Agreement"]

[Excerpts] The Turkish-U.S. defense cooperation agreement has been signed. We can divide the tasks we have undertaken into three categories. According to the defense cooperation agreement, in a war between the superpowers, Turkey will be: A) an advance guard; B) a big ear; and C) the first target.

Truly Turkey has been unable to rid itself of the burden of being the advance guard of the United States in the Middle East. With 30-odd listening posts, it has become Washington's "big ear" in the area, and it runs the risk of being the "first target" in the event of a nuclear war. What are we getting in return? The answer to this question is up in the air. Are we getting 250 million, 300 million or 500 million [dollars] a year? With a gradually collapsing economy and a continually corroding Turkish lira against the dollar, the policy of improving our defense by leasing bases runs counter to contemporary wisdom.

The Turkish-U.S. defense cooperation agreement is the product of a policy that is not compatible with our history, Ataturkism, nationalism and humanity, because:

A) This agreement is contrary to our history because Turkey won its freedom by waging a national independence struggle against imperialism.

B) This agreement is contrary to Ataturkism, for Ataturk was against such agreements.

C) This agreement is also contrary to nationalism. Leasing territory in our homeland to a foreign power for military purposes for money's sake cannot be considered a nationalist act. It is in fact a shame that an oppressed and destitute Turkey should grant zones of influence in Anatolia to an affluent superpower for material interest.

D) This agreement is against humanity as well, for exposing 50 million people to the dangers of a nuclear war is disrespectful of humanity. We must avoid being "the host region" in a conflict between the United States and the Soviet Union. Instead of taking every possible step to prevent these two superpowers from choosing Turkey as the war arena on a possible day of reckoning, converting Anatolia into a nest of American bases is the product of an outdated philosophy, which shows disregard for the lives of our people.

No matter from what angle we look at it, the Turkish-U.S. defense cooperation agreement is illogical in the world of the eighties.

It is impossible for such an agreement to be put into operation without prior submission to parliament for ratification.

The submission of the Turkish-U.S. defense cooperation agreement to parliament in the Turkey of the eighties appears to be a necessity. The parliamentarians voting for such an agreement in parliament will have to clear their conscience. It is not easy to repeat in Turkey the tragedies of Hiroshima and Nagasaki which mankind cannot possibly forget.

EUROPE'S NEUTRALS SAID TO FAVOR MADRID CSCE

AU031300 Vienna DIE PRESSE in German 3 Apr 80 p 2 AU

[Special DIE PRESSE report: "Preparations for Madrid CSCE: Neutrals Take Wait-and-See Attitude"]

[Text] Vienna (P.M.)--Europe's neutrals--Finland, Austria, Sweden and Switzerland--are endeavoring to bring about an intensification of preparatory work for the Madrid CSCE follow-up meeting. As was announced on Wednesday [2 April] by the Vienna Foreign Ministry, a meeting of the deputy secretaries generals [of the four countries' foreign ministries] had been held the day before in Helsinki, and another meeting will probably be held in Stockholm in May.

According to the communique, the representatives of the four foreign offices discussed "the current international situation, especially the prospects for the forthcoming Madrid CSCE follow-up meeting." "Questions of security and disarmament and other problems of common interest" were also discussed.

This brief, formal announcement seems to confirm what is being said unofficially about the Helsinki meeting: In view of the ticklish international development touched off by the Afghanistan invasion, even the group of neutrals is undecided about how to proceed at this stage. However, it is declared in Vienna, there is enough time before the Madrid meeting [11 November] for the neutrals to coordinate their views. Moreover, they intend to find out about nonalined Yugoslavia's ideas before launching any new initiatives. In principle--according to the same source--the neutrals are in consensus that the Madrid meeting must take place.

Austrian Foreign Minister Comments

AU031301 Vienna Domestic Service in German 1100 GMT 3 Apr 80 AU

[Text] In the opinion of Foreign Minister Pahr, the second CSCE follow-up conference to be held in Madrid in November is not even endangered by the Soviet invasion of Afghanistan. In an interview Pahr referred to the Madrid meeting as more necessary than ever before, because the current international situation had severely affected detente. Acting on Austria's proposal, the foreign ministers of the participating states are to go to Madrid to create better conditions to achieve success in the talks.

KREISKY TO CONFER WITH DJURANOVIC, BAKARIC IN BELGRADE

AU040911 Vienna ARBEITER-ZEITUNG in German 4 Apr 80 p 1 AU

[Text] Vienna (AZ)--Chancellor Kreisky will pay a 3-day visit to Belgrade beginning next Tuesday [8 April] accompanied by Carinthian Provincial Governor Wagner and Styrian Deputy Provincial Governor Adalbert Sebastian.

Kreisky's visit is regarded as rather important because it amounts to a backing-up for Tito's successors.

Kreisky will have two talks with Premier Djuranovic and talks with Presidium Member Bakaric and Vice President Kolisevski. The visit underscores Austria's good relations with Yugoslavia, which were also demonstrated for Foreign Minister Pahr's visit to Belgrade.

KURIER JOURNALIST SEES KREISKY VISIT AS SUPPORT FOR TITO SUCCESSORS

AU040912 [Editorial Report AU] Vienna KURIER in German on 4 April carries on page 3 a Wolfgang Broer article previewing Kreisky's visit to Yugoslavia, headlined "To Tito Heirs Kreisky Visit Is Very Welcome." Broer declares that this visit is obviously welcome to Tito's political heirs and should for many reasons amount to a political backing of their position. According to Broer, the SFRY leaders have noted with satisfaction Kreisky's repeated statements that Yugoslavia is a stable country that is capable of defending itself. Broer continues:

"Moreover, the Austrian Government chief's visit can be used to demonstrate the 'completely normal' conditions in the country and the functioning of the 'post-Tito era,' which for all practical purposes has already begun.

"Finally, Tito's heirs expect to find a number of common positions with Kreisky on foreign policy issues--for example, in assessing the Afghanistan crisis. The Yugoslav mass media's statements on Afghanistan, as is known, have been repeatedly criticized by the Soviets recently in an unusually sharp manner.

"Kreisky will discuss with Yugoslav Premier Djuranovic primarily the strained East-West relations in the wake of the Afghanistan crisis, as well as the role of the nonalined countries.

"Vienna and Belgrade have common interests in this respect which could be simply summed up as follows: 'Afghanistan has happened. What can be done now?' Both states naturally have a vital interest in a continuation of the policy of detente."

VIENNA PAPER NOTES NORTHROP F-5 INTERCEPTOR OFFER

AU311352 Vienna KURIER in German 29 Mar 80 p 2 AU

[Helmut Zwickl report: "Interceptors: Competitor for Mirage"]

[Text] The "air battle" over Austria continues. The American Northrop Company has submitted to the Austrian ministries of defense and trade a new offer for the purchase of "F-5E Tiger II" interceptors. It is based on barter transactions with Austrian firms and, in addition, an Austrian aircraft industry is to be established that would create 500 new jobs.

The Americans already know the weak point of the barter deal that is to entice Austria to buy 24 "Mirage-50" interceptors. Thus, for example, the Austrian aluminum industry would have to make substantial investments to meet the special requirements of airplane manufacturer Marcel Dassault.

Thus, what the Americans now suggest is the foundation stone-laying for an Austrian airplane industry. A similar program had already been worked out in connection with the planned purchase of the Israeli "Kfir" interceptor.

At that time Wiener Neustadt was to be the site of the envisaged airplane plant. Meanwhile, the "Kfir" has tailspun completely out of the Austrian sky, following massive intervention from the Arab camp and Chancellor Kreisky himself pulling the emergency cord: "Interceptors from a belligerent country are out of the question for Austria." Thus, the first dream came to a quick end.

Now Northrop for the first time presents concrete plans. The twin-jet "F-5" interceptors could be largely assembled in Austria, as is done in Switzerland, and the Americans would contribute their know-how. The final assembly and servicing of the patrol planes, as well as the servicing of civilian planes (here they are thinking of the Austrian Airlines) could eventually provide 500 jobs, according to the Northrop project.

The Americans have already selected 137 Austrian firms turning out 60 different products for barter transactions.

Since the "Mirage-50" is rather well known and not only to Austrian politicians, Northrop yesterday also submitted to Vienna a confidential report that amounts to a comparison test between the F-5E Tiger II and the Mirage-50. The gist of that paper is the following: At the price of 24 "Mirage-50" planes Austria could by 39 F-5E interceptors. Over a 10-year period the Northrop interceptors would cost the Austrian taxpayer 63 percent less than the French Delta-fighters. With the aid of plain figures the report attempts to prove that the decisive quality for Austria's tiny airspace is not the Mirage-50's mach-2 figure, but rather the superior maneuverability of the F-5E in the subsonic range.

So to speak, as the ultimate attack in the air battle over Austria, Northrop offered "the shortest deliver time": 8 of the supersonic Tiger planes, which are flying in 27 countries, would be available as early as in 1981. They were originally earmarked for Sudan.

BIOALCOHOL PLANT FOR U.S.--The Austrian Vogelbusch Company, which is partly owned by the Voest-Alpine Steel Corporation, has succeeded in obtaining against fiercest international competition a U.S. order for the planning of the largest U.S. bioalcohol plant. The alcohol plant, with an envisaged daily output of 700,000 liters, is to be built in Pekin, Illinois. The Vogelbusch Company, which has been specializing in the production of liquid fuels from biomass for the past 10 years, has gathered extensive experience in Brazil where its plants are currently turning out 40 percent of the 4.5 million tons of fuel alcohol produced annually. MARTENS SUBMITS GOVERNMENT'S RESIGNATION TO KING

NC031627 Paris AFP in English 1620 GMT 3 Apr 80 NC

[Text] Brussels, April 3, (AFP)--Prime Minister Wilfried Martens today submitted his government's resignation to King Baudouin following yesterday's rejection by the Senate of Mr. Martens' plan to turn Belgium into three federated language regions.

A place statement said that King Baudouin, who interrupted a Spanish holiday to fly home for the meeting with Mr. Martens, had not yet announced whether he would accept the resignation.

In the meantime, he had asked Mr. Martens to do everything he could to solve the crisis.

The government's proposal to federalise Belgium into three regions--Flemish-speaking Flanders, French-speaking Wallonia, and bilingual Brussels--yesterday failed to win Parliament's necessary two-thirds majority approval on an essential point for the second time in a week.

Martens Statement

LD031726 Brussels Domestic Service in French 1614 GMT 3 Apr 80 LD

[Text] Prime Minister Wilfried Martens has returned from Laeken Castle and immediately made a statement to the numerous journalists present here. I propose that you all listen to what he said:

[Begin Martens recording] Ladies and gentlemen: From the start, especially in our policy statement, the government affirmed that in our country it has become extremely difficult to implement an economic policy adapted to circumstances since state reforms have not been previously realized.

This is perhaps one more reason for underlining in unequivocal terms, before the vote on the special draft bill on the regions and the communities, the interest attached by the government to the adoption of this draft bill.

I said in the Senate that the bill was of vital importance to the continuation of the government's action and that the vote would be equivalent to an expression of confidence or no-confidence in the government.

The government majority parties hold a two-thirds majority in the Senate. Normally, the government could have expected to see this bill adopted. Despite the unanimity of the entire government, I was, however, forced to observe that during the vote on article 5 the two-thirds majority was not attained.

Even though I am aware of the consequences in the present economic and social circumstances, I could not do otherwise than draw the necessary conclusions from this vote. Consequently, I proposed to the Cabinet that the government's resignation should be submitted to the king. The king has reserved his reply and has instructed the prime minister to examine whether it is possible to find, in the shortest possible time, a solution to the current crisis. [end recording]

LD031924 Hamburg DPA in German 1631 GMT 3 Apr 80 LD

[Excerpts] Bonn--Guenter Mittag, member of the GDR State Council and the SED Politburo, is to visit the Hannover fair on 16 April and also go to Bonn at the invitation of Otto Graf Lambsdorff, federal economics minister. Government circles are not yet confirming a report in the latest issue of DER SPIEGEL according to which Mittag is also to have a meeting with Federal Chancellor Helmut Schmidt.

GOVERNMENT SPOKESMAN REJECTS CRITICISM OF GENSCHER

LD031458 Hamburg DPA in German 1331 GMT 3 Apr 80 LD

[Excerpt] Bonn--The attacks made by NEUES DEUTSCHLAND yesterday of Federal Foreign Minister Hans-Dietrich Genscher were today strongly rejected by Government Spokesman Armin Gruenewald and described as "unseemly." Gruenewald stressed at the same time that Genscher's statements on Soviet arms policy in recent years and on the Soviet invasion of Afghanistan reflected the Federal Government's standpoint, which was supported by all members of the federal cabinet.

COLUMNIST LAMENTS CARTER'S LACK OF LEADERSHIP QUALITIES

DW031203 Munich SUEDDEUTSCHE ZEITUNG in German 3 Apr 80 p 4 DW

[Dieter Schroeder article: "Not Born To Be a Leader"]

[Text] Occasionally a term from the world of the western movies must be used to characterize Jimmy Carter's style of government: "The Gang That Couldn't Shoot Straight." Being unable to shoot straight is a charge which still applies to Carter even after nearly 4 years in office. This comment fairly accurately shows the gap in the activities of this president, the gap between substance and style, between goal and path pursued. The President knows what he wants to be, and approximately what he would like to achieve, yet in the choice of means to this end he reveals an insecurity which almost daily increases the doubts in his leadership capabilities. Yet this skepticism hardly reaches the American voters who, with one exception, present Carter with one triumph after another in the primaries.

This phenomenon so far has been interpreted only inadequately. One explanation might be that Carter is fairly strictly sticking to the definition which presidential candidate Adlai Stevenson once gave for the essence of democratic leadership: The government cannot be stronger and more adamant than the people; it cannot devote itself to a cause any more firmly than the people can." Carter has always wanted to abolish the distance between Washington and the people; above all he wanted to be decent, honest, sincere, and economical. Even his worst opponents admit that he has remained decent to this day. Granted, he has kept hardly any of the promises he made, and he has not solved any of the great problems. Yet he has not burdened the Americans with a great deal either. He formulates feelings and secret wishes, but does very little, and even that without vigor and purposefulness.

Strength is something which the Americans would like to have, but if possible without having to endure a strong man or make sacrifices. In this respect they generally do not differ from other democratic nations, but what must be added in their case is their special historical experience: The United States achieved its world significance without having to pay a high price for it. It was Sunday's child among the nations, and thought so itself. It waged wars without having to lower its standard of living; it resisted the "evil" in the world without tasking itself in blood, sweat and tears.

The President did not have the courage to make it clear to the Americans that times have changed; but then he did not show the power of judgment necessary to recognize these changes. Only both capabilities together add up to the essence of strong leadership. It was his mistake to believe that the United States still is a young, vigorous nation which, if aware of its own virtues, would wield more weight and influence in the world than the "conservative," inflexible Soviet Union. This is why he believed that he could [several words indistinct] balance policies and the relationship with the Soviet Union.

This policy failed from the outset, last but not least because the world views the United States differently from the way the United States sees itself: entangled in the quarrels of this world, the attempt to repress Vietnam, Watergate, and the abortive machinations of the CIA. Even the gradual awakening under the shock of the latest events in Iran and Afghanistan has not bridged the gulf between claim and reality. Carter has failed to find a strategy for his policy. But it could not be found, because the objective has been unclear and blurred from the outset. That criticism pertains to SALT negotiations as much as to the human rights policy, the search for Mideast peace, and relations with the Soviet Union and Cuba.

Following his fixed star of morality, Carter soon became lost in the jungle of power politics. Since his original intentions could not be implemented, he turned around and often overshot the mark in the other direction. The shah was first a "friend" in an unstable region, then he was dropped. But eventually he was admitted to a New York hospital because of Carter's bad conscience and wrongly understood decency. "Afghanistan" overnight became the "severest crisis of postwar times." Although Washington saw the Soviet intervention coming, it did nothing for a long time. Then it warned the Soviet Union, although it had lost its credibility long ago. Shortly before Carter had had to accept a defeat in the Cuban crisis in connection with the Soviet brigade, a defeat for which he himself was responsible because he both allowed the affair to be played up and cooperated in it.

The list of ill-considered and erratic action could be continued almost at will. It undermined the reputation of reliability and freedom to act not only among friend and foe, but in the Third World as well. Yet Washington was surprised when Pakistani dictator Ziaul Haq, when he was endangered by the Soviet invasion of Afghanistan, rejected an offer of $400 million in aid. He demanded not only more money, but more importantly, guarantees which would protect him against a change of policy in Washington.

If the United States lacks firm leadership, the rest of the Western world has no rudder either. Schmidt and Giscard d'Estaing are hardly able to fill the vacuum. In addition, they would find it hard to muster the solidarity demanded by Washington. Their carefulness is also dicated last but not least by the question with whom and for what they ought to show solidarity. Is Carter's reaction to the intervention in Afghanistan dominated only by the election campaign, or does it indicate a new and lasting direction of American policy? It is hard to answer the question logically. Does Carter seek only his own interests, or those of his allies as well? Doubts are also permissible in this respect: Have the consequences of an Olympic boycott been thought through, and what will happen afterward if the Russians are still in Afghanistan? So far there has been no answer to this.

It is unavoidable that Carter will be compared with some of his great predecessors, particularly Truman. His containment policy consisted not only of gestures, but of firm, coherent policy which saved Western Europe, Greece, Yugoslavia, Korea and Berlin.

One can hardly return to Truman's policy, last but not least because the United States has failed to win over reliable friends in time in the region between Turkey and China which is now endangered. Iran is the best example: The United States has not only lost much good will, but also its authority. One can hardly hold it against the United States that it permits a mad old man to dance on its nose, but one can hold it against the United States that it did not recognize this development in time and prevent it.

Carter wanted to have his "ear to the ground," as Churchill once called concern for the moods of the voters. But the Briton warned simultaneously against it because a nation can hardly look up to a "leader caught in this clumsy position."

PRESS REACTION TO CARTER DECISION ON IRAN

DW021246 Cologne Deutschlandfunk Network in German to East and West Germany 0605 GMT 2 Apr 80 DW

[Press review]

[Text] STUTTGARTER ZEITUNG writes: Once again it looks as though a solution to the Tehran hostage crisis is a bit nearer. If Iranian President Bani-Sadr does succeed in having the U.S. Embassy personnel transferred to the custody of the Revolutionary Council, as he promised Tuesday, this definitely would constitute a decisive step toward their release. President Carter gave Bani-Sadr some backing by postponing the imposition of additional economic sanctions which were postponed once before in January. But how long the newly aroused hope for a solution to the crisis will last probably depends primarily on whether the highly delicate climate of compromise that seems to have gained the upper hand in Tehran at the moment can be stabilized. The United States can contribute toward this end by exercising as much restraint as possible at the moment.

The editorial of SUEDDEUTSCHE ZEITUNG reads in part: The latest hope for early liberation of the hostages had hardly abated as a result of the strong and powerful words of Ayatollah Khomeyni when the President once again grasped for a straw which was even thinner than the preceding ones. To him, the words of President Bani-Sadr, who has already been repudiated by Khomeyni several times, that the hostages will be taken into Iranian Government custody provided the United States refrains from conspiring against Iran, constitute a positive step justifying the postponement of the threatened sanctions. But if we look at the words of the ayatollah and his president through a magnifying glass, we find that they indicate little that is positive: Both insist on the extradition of the shah. And yet it is understandable why Carter hesitates to impose the sanctions, not having fully abandoned hope that Bani-Sadr is merely giving lipservice in demanding the extradition.

AUGSBURGER ZEITUNG notes: It is in vain that we look for concrete promises in Bani-Sadr's statement to the effect that the U.S. hostages in the American Embassy in Tehran will at long last be turned over by the terrorist group to the Revolutionary Council. Instead, Bani-Sadr just vaguely hinted at the possibility of this step in the event that Washington accepts a number of conditions, conditions which would nearly be tantamount to the prostration of the world power United States before Tehran. At the same time, the question crops up as to what extent promises by official Iranian quarters can be trusted at all after the bitter experiences of the past several months. Still, it may well be that secret accords were made between Carter and Bani-Sadr which induce the U.S. President to indulge in such optimism.

LUEBECKER NACHRICHTEN writes: It is hard to join with President Jimmy Carter in seeing positive developments in the statement of Iranian Chief of State Bani-Sadr. Who is ruling in Iran? Obviously not Bani-Sadr. If the U.S. President still relies on the vague words from Tehran, renouncing the tougher course he has announced 24 hours before against the unpredictable rulers in Iran, it may be understandable due to his concern for the hostages. Behind this, seem to be personal problems of the election campaign fighter Carter.

At any rate, the man in the White House has again not indicated a clear stance. Also there is little that indicates an imminent release of the hostages. Those in power in Iran obviously do not want to renounce them because they believe they can use the terror game against the United States to distract their own people from the chaos that continues to spread throughout the country.

The daily DIE WELT notes: If the signals of disaster from Tehran are not misleading, a decisive act in the hostage drama has begun. When an end will be achieved, and what kind of an end it will be, is in the hands of the stubborn old man who has made himself a prisoner of his hatred for America, and who represents that hatred--a symbol and ferment of the Iranian revolution--in a more than life-sized way. This attitude is not at all predictable any more, which makes it a security risk for the world. But the clock is running out. It has already shown more than 150 days of patience and restraint by the Americans and their president. The countdown of an unpredictable escalation can be stopped only by the ayatollah himself.

RUHR-NACHRICHTEN of Dortmund states: So Washington continues to bet on patient waiting. hoping for President Bani-Sadr, who would prefer to make a peaceful end to the hostage drama as soon as possible, as well as on the Iranian Parliament, which in June is supposed to decide on the fate of the hostages. These hopes, however, are very vague because Bani-Sadr, as demonstrated by events, does not belong to those who are really in power in Iran and because the outcome of the parliamentary vote is most uncertain. Since in such a situation the United States does not have the proper means to exert pressure on Tehran, the question must be asked whether the allies of Washington are not called upon to exert coordinated pressure to make Iran give in. The common letter action by the European government chiefs ought to be just the beginning.

YOUNG SOCIALISTS VOICE UNDERSTANDING FOR USSR POLICY

DW031118 Bonn DIE WELT in German 3 Apr 80 p 1 DW

[Gottfried Capell article: "JUSOS Have Understanding for Russian Invasion: Kremlin Feels Surrounded"]

[Text] Bonn--A delegation of the SPD youth organization Young Socialists has learned while in the Soviet Union, according to their statements, about "concrete indications" that the United States had wanted to create for itself in Afghanistan a "substitute base" for the influence lost in Iran. This is what JUSO [Young Socialist] Deputy Chairman Reinhard Schultz told newsmen in Bonn yesterday. The Young Socialists therefore believe that "they know the motives" for the Soviet invasion of Afghanistan, "although they do not accept them," Schultz said.

Schultz reported that the JUSO delegation waged controversial discussions in the USSR on Afghanistan. Without any changes it advocates the view that the Afghan people themselves must determine their development. But he added that "Anxieties about external threat have increased in the Soviet Union. The arms programs of the West, Carter's policy of superiority and the reckless imperialist action with respect to the oil countries have led to a fear of encirclement," Schultz said. After talks with Soviet politicians the JUSO delegation gained the impression "that the Soviet Union is interested in an early withdrawal of its troops if the borders of Afghanistan are guaranteed internationally."

According to Schultz, this includes an international guarantee that there will not be any intervention against Afghanistan, "no matter what the nature."

In this connection Schultz sharply attacked "cold war fanatics like U.S. President Carter and Strauss," but also "those who, like Genscher, want to enter into a comm nity of destiny with the United States at all costs." They want to "deposit their responsibility at the checkroom of NATO headquarters." Schultz resolutely opposed any economic or sports boycott measures. He called on the Federal Republic's sports officials to show "civic backbone" and to reiterate the participation of the Federal Republic in the Olympic games, even "if the United States should force the Federal Government to make recommendations to the contrary."

Another key subject of the Moscow talks was the Eurostrategic medium-range weapons. The "NATO arms decision" has fanned the anxieties of the Soviets. "The Federal Government should kindly take the Berlin SPD party congress decision seriously and urge the suspension of the NATO decision as long as Salt II is not ratified," Schultz demanded.

CDU spokesman Henrich described the statements by the JUSOS as unsurpassed in "naivete and credulousness." The SPD leadership is obligated, however, "to refute without delay the unbelievable remark about the "military superiority claim" of the U.S. President."

In contrast, the deputy SPD Executive Board spokesman, Schellschmidt, stated that the "exaggerated criticism of the Young Socialists, especially that relating to the U.S. President and members of the Federal Government, should not be overrated. This should not make people overlook what the delegation has brought back with it in the way of remarkable impressions.

COMMENTATOR SEES STAGNATION IN EC-CEMA TALKS

DW011233 Frankfurt FRANKFURTER RUNDSCHAU in German 1 Apr 80 p 3 DW

[Brussels dispatch signed HA: "No Headway"]

[Text] The early conclusion of a treaty between the EC and the Council of Mutual Economic assistance of the East Bloc (CEMA) might have the effect of a signal showing that despite the critical international situation the decisions of the CSCE Conference of Helsinki in 1975 continue to be valid for the normalization of relations between Eastern and Western Europe. But such considerations do not seem to exist in Moscow.

Negotiations between officials of both organizations in Geneva did not produce any headway in March. CEMA continues to insist that provisions be incorporated into the treaty which in the opinion of the EC governments must be subject to future trade agreements between Brussels and the individual CEMA states. This is why EC Foreign Relations Commissioner Wilhelm Haferkamp has let CEMA Secretary General Fadeyev know that new negotiations on a political level are nonsensical as long as no headway has been made in the talks among experts.

Romania, however, has dodged the quarrel and concluded two new agreements with the European Community which create considerable alleviations for its exports to the Western European market. In doing this it was the first CEMA country to accept the 1974 treaty offer of the European Community made to all East Bloc states.

Certain political forces in Bonn are now pressing for more "flexibility" by the European Community vis-a-vis CEMA in order to continue detente policy in a visible way. But London, and even Paris, see no reason to soften up the common positions held in the 4-year negotiations of the European Community Commission with CEMA. Afghanistan also plays a role here, although it is not mentioned officially. And since West Berlin's membership in the European Community belongs to the disputed negotiation points where CEMA has so far not given in, the Federal Government cannot exert pressure (even if it wanted to).

BERLINGUER VIEWS PCI REFUSAL TO ATTEND EUROPEAN CP MEETING

AU040839 Rome ANSA in English 0800 GMT 4 Apr 80 AU

[Text] Rome, April 4 (ANSA)--Italian Communist Party (PCI) Secretary Enrico Berlinguer said Thursday that his party has refused to attend the conference of European communist parties because it would be "a contradiction for the PCI". In the closing speech of the party's National Council here Thursday, Berlinguer touched on the PCI's international role, with particular reference to the decision to not take part in the conference to be held in Paris at the end of the month and to his forthcoming visit to China.

Berlinguer stressed that the "PCI" considers the conference "wrong in method, timing and theme. This is not the way to contribute to the greatest efficacy of the fight for detente and disarmament. Participation in the conference would be a contradiction for the PCI. From a long way back and up to the last national congress, the party line has moved in the opposite direction, that is, it aims at the largest possible involvement of forces in the fight for peace, disarmament in Europe and world detente".

Speaking about Europe, Berlinguer said that "the PCI believes in the fundamental importance of repairing and intensifying relations with socialist, social democrat and leftist parties with the purpose of confronting the aggression of the right" and to "widen every path for the resumption of dialogue between the two super powers and for detente".

Speaking about his visit to China at the invitation of the Chinese Communist Party, the "PCI" secretary said that it is his party's method "to entertain relations with all progressive and revolutionary democratic parties, whether they are communists or not" and that "therefore, the spirit with which this trip will be undertaken is clear".

Shortly before delivering his speech Berlinguer met with Gianni Cervetti, the "PCI" official who was sent to Moscow to inform Soviet Politburo member Andrey Kirilenko of the party's decision to not attend the conference.

Further Remarks

LD032234 Acme Domestic Service in Italian 1800 GMT 3 Apr 80 LD

[Text] Communist Party Secretary Berlinguer closed the meeting of the party's National Council today. In his speech, he dealt with international problems, the forthcoming local elections and the government crisis. He emphasized the disagreement between the Italian and French communists on the pan-European communist conference--which will be held in Paris and which will not be attended by the Italian Communist Party and the Spanish Communists. The Italian Communist Party, Berlinguer said, believes that in Europe it is of fundamental importance to consolidate relations among the socialist, social democratic and leftwing forces. Speaking about the government, Berlinguer said that the present crisis marked a defeat for the Christian Democratic forces of the "preamble" policy and was a blow to the Social Democratic Party. The Communists, Berlinguer said, will judge the new government only when it is constituted.

PRESS ON PCI DECISION TO NOT ATTEND EUROPEAN CP CONFERENCE

AU031720 Rome ANSA in English 1610 GMT 3 Apr 80 AU

[Text] Rome, April 3 (ANSA)--The Italian Communist Party (PCI) refusal to attend a conference of European communist parties to be held in Paris on April 28 and 29, attracted considerable attention in the Italian press today.

The conference was proposed by the French and Polish communist parties.

The PCI paper "UNITA" today quoted Giancarlo Pajetta, in charge of the party's foreign policy department, as judging counterproductive any conference on European peace and disarmament that included only the communist parties of Europe. Pajetta underscored the differing position of the various European communist parties. "Some, like ours, asks for the opening of negotiations and a study of problems of missile control and balance, while others lead states that have missiles," he said. The PCI leader also said it was unthinkable to the PCI that any meeting of communist parties would not bring up matters like that of the situation in Afghanistan just because the conference organizers wanted to make such matters taboo.

Pajetta also insisted on the need for maximum clarity on the part of the communist parties with regard to their respective autonomy. He referred back to the European summit in Berlin in 1976 and the affirmation that emerged to the effect that each communist party was fully autonomous. Only in this way could progress down the road to a new internationalism be achieved, in the framework of the European workers movement, he said.

The Christian Democratic Party (DC) paper "POPOLO" asked what kind of Europe was being aimed at. The daily claimed that the PCI was carrying forward an ambitious strategy that saw a Europe that was initially third-force-like, then equidistant, then neutral and gradually pushed into the economic and strategical orbit of the Soviet Union while preserving its own political and cultural physiognomy. "IL POPOLO" said it viewed with interest the PCI's search for a new identity.

"PAESE SERA" saw the PCI refusal in part due to that party's conviction that not only the communist parties but other political forces as well (especially the socialists, social democrats, Christian groups and progressive and lay forces) were interested in problems of detente. Also, the PCI felt the conference was called without taking into account the controversies existing between certain of the parties (the Italian, Yugoslav and Spanish). Moreover the initiative was being prompted by those who approved the Soviet intervention in Afghanistan and therefore a certain confusion could arise between the reasons for detente and those inspiring Soviet foreign policy, the paper said.

Rome;s "REPUBBLICA" spoke of "a historic separation from the Kremlin", "a communist schism" or, better, "a communist schism of the West", like that of the East between China and the Soviet Union. The PCI leadership has anchored the party to the principles of Western democracy and pluralism, the paper said. As it detaches from Moscow, the PCI looks to new constellations and a communism that has discovered the spirit of the West, the paper concluded.

L'UNITA QUESTIONS METHOD, ESSENCE OF EUROMISSILES FORUM

LD031549 Milan L'UNITA in Italian 2 Apr 80 p 1 LD

[Editorial: "Some Observations Concerning Method and Essence: Conference Convened by French and Polish Communist Parties"]

[Text] The French and Polish communist parties plan to convene a conference of European communist parties to draw up an appeal on the issue of deploying new missiles in Western Europe. The news, published by L'HUMANITE today, has already been reported by the press. The Spanish Communists have already announced that they do not intend to take part in the conference. We know of no decisions from other parties.

The issue has in fact for some time been the topic of bilateral exchanges of opinion promoted by the French and Polish communists, in which PCI leaders, among others, have taken part. On these occasions the PCI leaders have repeatedly pointed out their doubts concerning the opportuneness of the initiative, expressing the belief that there is a danger of its being not only of little use, but even damaging to the very objectives of detente and disarmament in whose name it is being convened.

The two parties' convening of the conference, despite the many objections made, prompts reservations, mainly concerning method, but also concerning its essence. It will be recalled that the 1976 European communist parties conference in Berlin was proceded by detailed preparation. The various parties' representatives met over 2 years previously to debate whether or not it was opportune to hold such a conference: It was also established that each step should be taken in accordance with the rule of common consent. This rule--which is indispensable, since we acknowledge the existence of no international communist party organization--is now being ignored.

This being the case, matters of method become linked with those of principle and political content. Naturally this does not at all mean that meetings among communist parties on specific topics should not be taken into consideration; indeed, such meetings have been held over the years. But in the present case one wonders whether a conference of communists alone is the most advisable forum for dealing with the issues of peace and disarmament. Indeed, a vast debate is underway on this topic in Europe, involving not only the communist parties but also socialist and social democratic parties, Christian movements and organizations (mainly Catholic in our country) and groups of other leanings--a debate which concerns not only joint action for peace but also the methods and forms for making such action possible and effective.

A conference such as the one planned would give the impression that the communist parties are being isolated from this range of forces. Moreover, these same communist parties have very varied stances on the issues in question. Indeed, some of them govern states which have large arsenals at their disposal and which form one of the two military blocs present on the continent. Other parties such as ours, on the other hand, are in an entirely different situation. Therefore, the responsibilities and obligations in the two cases are also different.

One wonders whether, under these circumstances, some generic hope expressed in an appeal can be of any real use. Indeed, it is obvious that in such a framework there would be a danger of losing the specific proposals on the missiles issue which we put forward when, together with our condemnation of NATO's decisions, we called for a moratorium on deploying the new weapons on both sides. A meeting explicitly limited to discussing and approving an appeal and excluding any other topic of analysis and debate would also omit many important peace issues ranging from the military balance to the issues raised by the Afghan events, on which stances differ: the Italian Communists certainly do not intend to abandon their own positions.

How is it possible with such initiatives to build effective struggle movements capable of impinging on the European political situation? Mass movements of considerable magnitude have already emerged in several European countries in connection with detente and disarmament: These movements do not intend to aline with any one single political current or, still less, equate their stances and actions with those of the countries which lead the blocs concerned. On the other hand, any action for peace can only be effective if it is consistent with the particular political characteristics of each country.

Lastly, the way in which the conference is being convened once again poses several questions concerning the attitude toward relations among communist parties--questions dictated not be a concern with responding to the adversary's speculations but by the need to know whether the idea of an international organization and therefore of a leadership center, so often rejected in authoritative documents drawn up by our movement, is in fact emerging once again. These are, in any case, uncertainties which must be avoided by adopting clear stances.

It finally must be said that, although on the basis of these considerations the PCI will not attend the conference, it does not in the least intend to isolate itself by this decision. Indeed, we will not be the people to start polemics with those who do attend, and we will certainly not alter our relations with the other parties. But it is equally certain that we do not intend to help isolate those who have concerns and reservations similar to our own on this issue.

SOCIALISTS APPROVE RESULTS OF TRIPARTITE NEGOTIATIONS

LD032234 Rome Domestic Service in Italian 1800 GMT 3 Apr 80 LD

[Excerpt] The Socialist Party Central Committee has just ratified the results of the tripartite negotiations concerning the formation of a new government, with the reservation that the final approval will be given by the Directorate--as requested by the left wing. The agreement was ratified in spite of the seven votes against cast by the Achilli group and 12 abstentions by De Martino's followers.

Further Progress Made

LD032345 Rome Domestic Service in Italian 2000 GMT 3 Apr 80 LD

[Text] The government crisis is nearing its solution. The Christian Democratic and Republican Party directorates and the Central Committee of the Socialist Party have ratified the agreements on the tripartite government.

Premier-Designate Cossiga met the Liberals who will enter neither the government nor the parliamentary majority. The Liberal Party is awaiting clarification from Cossiga about his request for a Liberal Party position that could in some way be positively connected with the tripartite government. The list of ministers may be determined tomorrow so that Cossiga may submit it to President of the Republic Pertini.

Berlinguer, secretary of the Communist Party, repeated his party's "no" to the tripartite solution of the government crisis which, according to Berlinguer, undoubtedly represents a defeat for the Christian Democratic forces behind the "preamble." The Communists will express a definitive view only after the government has been formed.

MELO ANTUNES VIEWS REVISION OF CONSTITUTION

LD030708 Lisbon Domestic Service in Portuguese 0000GMT 3 Apr 80 LD

[Excerpts] Lt Col Melo Antunes, chairman of the Constitutional Committee, yesterday gave us an interview on the occasion of the 4th anniversary of the Constitution. Questioned about the issue of the revision of the Constitution, Melo Antunes said:

[Begin recording] Personally, I think that the Constitution should be changed as little as possible, since among other reasons the life of a people cannot, in my opinion, sustain sudden or successive breaks in its continuity by means of sudden or successive changes in their Constitution. The life of a people is always characterized by a certain continuity, in the political, social, cultural and economic spheres, enshrined in a specific document represented by the Constitution, and the life of a community cannot be periodically in a state of suspense and dependent on sudden changes in the Constitution which govern their collective life. Therefore, this should be the first basic idea: There should be as little change as possible in the Constitution.

Second, I think that some changes should be introduced into the excessively ideological wording of the Constitution. In some aspects, I believe that the Constitution may have gone a bit too far, which was perfectly understandable considering the time it was drawn up. The Constitution was drafted at the height of the revolutionary period, which in itself is not an evil, but merely the result of our history as it was experienced in 1974-76. Therefore, the language used also reflected the life of the Portuguese people during that period, and as I said there is nothing wrong with that. It is simply a historical fact which we should be proud of. Now that this period has passed, however, I think that it is somewhat necessary, in order to achieve a greater consensus with regard to the Constitution, to remove from the text of the document a few excessively ideological aspects of the language used. This however--it should be made very clear--does not mean that what is essentially advanced in its content, should be called into question, particularly regarding economic, social and cultural rights and individual rights and freedoms.

The blueprint of a transition to a certain model of socialism is, in my view, correct, and should be preserved; it is a fundamental advance of Portuguese society and should remain a basic goal. [end recording]

[Excerpt] It was officially announced in Lisbon yesterday that President Ramalho Eanes will pay a 5-day official visit to the Republic of Cape Verde from the 16th of this month. He will be accompanied by his wife, Deputy Prime Minister and Foreign Minister Freitas do Amaral, and a member of the Council of the Revolution whose name has not been disclosed, and the secretary of state for fisheries. The presidential party is due at Cape Verde's Sal Airport on the afternoon of the 16th.

VISITING BELGIAN MINISTER VIEWS WESTERN FAILINGS

[Jose Luis Carrascisa report on interview in Madrid with Belgian Foreign Minister Henri Simonet: "Europe's Ambiguity Has Facilitated Soviet Expansionism"--date not specified]

[Text] Nobody knows whether we are at the end of an era or at the start of another. Henri Simonet, 49, a socialist, Belgian foreign minister and one of the most imaginative politicians to have passed through the EEC Commission (he was its deputy president from 1973 through 1977), quotes Antonio Gramsci, the man who inspired Eurocommunism, to describe the profound crisis in international relations at a "time in history when what is about to die is not yet dead and what is about to replace it is not yet born."

Simonet is uncompromising in his acknowledgement of Europe's responsibility, its inability to find a solution to this crisis, which can no longer be viewed in accordance with the old outlook of the balance between the two superpowers. This is the essence of his remarks to this paper. "It is tragic, but the EEC has once again proved itself incapable of drawing up a joint foreign policy at a time when the revolution in Iran was the first example of the evident redistribution of power which is taking place in the world. An elderly cleric with the support of a handful of students committed to making their country regress two centuries has brought the free world's major power to its knees, hitherto with impunity."

Bipolar Terror

"Some Europeans," Simonet continued, "Act as if the bipolar order were still intact, whereas in fact it only survives because the balance of terror is still bipolar. Detente is simply the two superpowers' realization of their mutual destructive capability. Kissinger defeines it in his memoirs as the way to 'deal' with the USSR's emergence as a superpower." While the West had a conservative idea of detente, the USSR never believed that detente compelled it to maintain the status quo.

Ever since the U.S. withdrawal following the Vietnam war, Simonet pointed out, Soviet expansionism has been continuous and the ambiguity of certain members of the alliance has merely facilitated this. "We Europeans have criticized the United States alternately for action and inaction, for its domination and passiveness. The same people who once criticized it for creating a 'condominium' with Moscow are now criticizing it for being too unyielding. The Americans, disappointed with Europe, feel as if they were in a besieged citadel and tended toward isolationism until the Afghan invasion reminded them that a superpower cannot ignore world events."

Vietnam for USSR

[Question] Why did the Soviets intervene in Afghanistan?

[Answer] I consider the hypothesis that they made the same miscalculation as the Americans in Vietnam plausible, but I would not overstress it. They were trying to prevent Muslim "contagion" from spreading to them through a domino effect, and perhaps miscalculated the reactions which that would provoke.

[Question] The tension has been created and still Europe has not decided on a stance.

[Answer] Those opposed to deploying new weapons on the old continent point to the argument that in fact the only concern in the final analysis in U.S.-USSR strategic parity--a postulate equivalent to an act of faith in unreserved U.S. compromise. It is paradoxical that it is precisely the advocates of this doctrine who are most critical of the United States within the Atlantic alliance.

"Strategic Balance"

According to Simonet, the West is now devoting so much attention to the military balance that it is in danger of forgetting a more important kind of balance: the "strategic balance." "The USSR," he said, "has used its revolutionary ideology as a pretext for intervening in the Third World, for dealing with the 'crisis of capitalism' which the USSR itself encouraged and even provoked. Moscow never concerns itself with resolving the Third World's problems because they almost always work in its favor.

"The West, on the other hand, has direct economic interests in the Third World and in the future its policy must not be to prevent nonalinement as far as possible so as to preserve its clientele of defenseless regimes, whatever the cost. The eventual solution in Rhodesia is a good example of lucid diplomacy based on what the British call 'enlightened self-interest.'

"The strategic balance is now based more than ever on this nonalined movement, whose survival seems more than problematical in view of Marshal Tito's imminent demise."

PCE'S CARRILLO CONGRATULATES CEAUSESCU ON REELECTION

AU031010 Bucharest SCINTEIA in Romanian 2 Apr 80 p 3 AU

[Text of congratulatory message sent by Santiago Carrillo, general secretary of the Spanish Communist Party (PCE), to President Nicolae Ceausescu on his reelection as president]

[Text] To Comrade Nicolae Ceausescu, president of the Socialist Republic of Romania.

Dear Comrade, on your reelection to the position of president of the Socialist Republic of Romania please permit me to extend warm congratulations and to wish you great successes.

I want to renew my feelings of friendship for you.

SCANDINAVIAN FOREIGN MINISTERS ISSUE COMMUNIQUE

LD021513 Stockholm DAGENS NYHETER in Swedish 29 Mar 80 p 6 LD

[Tor Hognas dispatch: "Ministerial Meeting in Helsinki: Security Policy a New Development in Scandinavia"]

[Text] Helsinki, 28 March--Sweden would be well suited to playing host to a European disarmament con. .ence, the Scandinavian foreign ministers pointed out in the final communique from their meeting in Helsinki on Friday [28 March].

The ministers expressed their concern over international developments and stressed the importance of a solution to the Afghanistan crisis, which would mean a speedy withdrawal of foreign troops.

Finnish Foreign Minister Paavo Vayrynen was able to support without hesitation the statement on Afghanistan, which follows the UN line and does not mean a condemnation of the Soviet invasion.

But Vayrynen did not wish to answer journalists' questions as to whether the invasion of Afghanistan was based on the friendship and assistance between the two countries.

A new feature in the communique is that for the first time the foreign ministers stressed the significance of the Scandinavian countries' "well-known and consistent security policy."

Accord ng to the text of the com..unique, this security policy has "contributed to the creation of a stable situation in Scandinavia." It is also useful in the maintenance of peace and security in a broader international context.

This can be seen as a direct answer to the critical statement that the Scandinavian balance is changing.

The ministers want a total ban on nuclear arms tests and active preparations for the Madrid security conference in November. The meeting is especially important in the present situation, which is making great demands on detente.

The ministers want "a balanced result to the negotiations" in Madrid. This is to insure better compliance with the results in terms of the principles of the Final Act.

In the Middle East the necessity of implementing the Palestinians' legitimate national rights by their exercise of self-determination was emphasized. They must have the right to take part in negotiations on their future.

Thus the PLO has been given the green light. But the ministers also stress that the Palestinian rig..t to self-determination must come about with full respect for Israel's right to live in peace within secure and recognized borders.

The ministers expressed their satisfaction over the developments in Zimbabwe and acknowledged the willingness to cooperate which the British Government has shown.

The Scandinavian countries will consider how they can aid an independent Zimbabwe in its efforts to insure stable developments.

The South African policy of apartheid is once again condemned. The ministers also confirmed their countries' support for attempts to insure respect for human rights in all lands.

The next meeting of the foreign ministers will take place in Oslo 1 and 2 September.

NORWAY

NO RESPONSE TO NORWAY-SPONSORED MOVE ON TEHRAN HOSTAGES

LD031319 Oslo AFTENPOSTEN in Norwegian 1 Apr 80 p 12 LD

[Morten Fyhn report: "Norwegian Initiative To Secure Release of Hostages"]

[Text] In all secrecy Norway has devoted itself to active diplomatic efforts to secure the release of the American hostages in Tehran. Two weeks ago, following a Norwegian initiative, a request was made by about 30 nations to the Ayatollah Khomeyni's son and close colleague, Seyed Ahmad, in which permission was sought to visit the hostages. Yesterday the Foreign Ministry instructed Ambassador Tormod P. Svennevig in Tehran to contact the Iranian authorities again.

Authoritative sources have told AFTENPOSTEN that the initiative was taken independently and not at the direct request of the American authorities. As far as AFTENPOSTEN can ascertain, Norway has been busy with the question of how to get in touch with Iran's real leaders and with those occupying the embassy, since it has resulted that neither Iran's president nor the foreign minister has any control over the hostage situation.

When the Danish ambassador had an appointment with Khomeyni's son on 18 March on other business, the opportunity was carefully used to insure that the request from the 30 countries had been communicated directly to Iran's supreme leader. It is normally extremely difficult to get to meet Khomeyni's son and apparently completely impossible to have a meeting with Khomeyni himself.

The request from those nations which supported the Norwegian initiative asked that visiting arrangements be made so that foreign diplomats would be allowed in to see the hostages. held since 4 November last year. Further reminders were given regarding the 30 states' views on the taking of hostages and on the regulations in international law concerning the inviolability of embassies. The countries behind the request also included Sweden and Denmark, as well as countries from Asia, Africa, Latin America and Europe. The Norwegian aim was precisely to gather as broad a range of opinion as possible to increase pressure on Iran.

Khomeyni's son received the request, but since then neither Norway nor any of the other countries has received any reaction to it. So it is not clear whether the request has reached Imam Khomeyni, even though this was promised. Both Iran's President Abolhasan Bani-Sadr and Foreign Minister Sadeq Qotzbadeh are aware of the Norwegian move.

Yesterday a new telegram was sent to Ambassador Svennevig from the Foreign Ministry with instructions for him to contact the Iranian authorities in order to try to find a solution to the hostage drama. Svennevig will also inform the Iranian authorities that the Scandinavian foreign ministers last week expressed their deep concern for the hostages and repeated their support for the UN attempts to secure their release.

STORTING DEFENSE COMMITTEE VIEWS SPENDING PRIORITIES

[Unattributed report: "Defense Forces Need Greater Investment in Equipment: Antiaircraft Missiles a Matter of Urgency"]

[Text] The Storting Defense Committee singles out the need for modern antiaircraft missiles as especially important among new materiel acquisitions in the coming years. The antiaircraft missiles will protect our airfields. In its recommendations arising from the report of the Defense Commission on the activities of the defense forces in the period 1979-1983, the committee emphasized that such a purchase is of vital importance for the arrival of allied reinforcements and for the operational possibilities of our own air force. In addition the unanimous committee notes that the need for renewel within our naval defenses will become urgent by the mid-eighties.

The unanimous committee asserts that our defense forces are faced with great problems relating to investment in the materiel sector in the coming years:

"The rapidity of technological developments gives rise to a pressing need for modernization and replacement of materiel so that our defense capability can be preserved," the committee stated in the recommendations.

Regarding land defenses there is an especially urgent need for antiaircraft defenses, antitank defenses, fire support, mobility and endurance during hostilities. There is also a need to modernize and expand the fighting capability of naval and air defenses, the committee notes. It must be a principal aim to strengthen important, but weak links first, so that we maintain a balanced defense force free from obvious weak points which an attacker could exploit.

"The purchase of the F-16's will use up an extremely large part of materiel investment funds in the first few years", the committee pointed out. The modernization of surveillance and warning systems will also require considerable sums. Among the new acquisitions, the committee wishes to call attention to the need for modern antiaircraft missiles to defend our airfields.

The committee goes into greater detail regarding naval defenses, and points out that by the mid-eighties the need for renewal within this branch of our defenses will be most urgent. It will embrace both vessels for the navy and heavy arms for the coastal artillery. The committee assumes that those points which have been raised in the debate on naval defenses since the commission reached a decision, will be assessed in greater detail in future evaluations of the structure of naval defenses. The debate has principally concerned the questions of types and numbers of vessels. The home guard also has a great need for investment, and the committee asks the Defense Ministry to look more closely into this.

The committee points out that the scope of investment in buildings and installations for the defense forces should also be expanded in the coming years, and asks the Defense Ministry to insure this in its budget proposals. Funds for the maintenance of buildings and installations should also be increased. The committee emphasizes that funds for buildings and installations should be distributed among the various categories so that priority is given to installations for fighting and defense forces and to garrison installations. There is agreement that a great need exists for ammunition dumps, vehicle depots and camps and that these categories must be given the highest priority.

In addition, the committee points out that it will be of significance for the improvement of the situation with regard to officers in the defense forces if a satisfactory solution to the problems of living quarters can be found. It is important that officers should, as far as possible, be allowed to arrange their own housing, and the committee is satisfied that the ministry is attempting to smooth the way for such a development.

SWEDEN

STOCKHOLM APPEALS TO BANI-SADR FOR HOSTAGES' RELEASE

LD031317 Stockholm SVENSKA DAGBLADET in Swedish 1 Apr 80 p 1 LD

[Unattributed report: "Swedish Plea to Bani-Sadr"]

[Excerpt] On Monday Sweden joined in the broad international action to free the hostages who have been imprisoned for 149 days in the American Embassy in Tehran.

The Foreign Ministry instructed our charge d'affaires in Tehran, Embassy Counsellor Ake Johnson, to call on President Abolhasan Bani-Sadr and to appeal to him to assume responsibility for the hostages.

This international move comes at a time when the drama surrounding the imprisoned Americans in Tehran seems to be approaching a climax. At the same time as President Jimmy Carter sent a message to the Iranian leaders, which was described in Tehran as an ultimatum, a number of European countries took action to exert pressure on the leaders of the Iranian Revolution.

Sweden had not been asked to convey more than an appeal, but it is possible that other European countries have also warned Iran of the possibility of sanctions and indicated that they would break diplomatic ties with Iran if the Revolutionary Council were not able to persuade those occupying the embassy to release the hostages they have held since 4 November last year.

NAPOLITANO EXPLAINS PCI POSITIONS, VISITS LABOR PARTY LEADERS

LD031437 Rome L'UNITA in Italian 26 Mar 80 pp 1, 17 LD

[Antonio Bronda dispatch: "Napolitano Meets Labor Party Representatives in London"]

[Text] London--At the London International Relations Institute's invitation, PCI Directorate Member Giorgio Napolitano yesterday conducted a lecture-debate on the subject "Continuity and Interruption in the Process of International Detente." The meeting took place at the institute's headquarters in Chatham House, St James Square, and provided an opportunity for British politicians, diplomats, journalists, experts and academics to find out more about our party's stances.

In his lecture Comrade Napolitano explained the PCI's viewpoints on the basic causes of the present tension in international relations and on the reasons for the crisis in detente. He then recalled the PCI's stance in the debate on Euromissiles and its condemnation of the Soviet intervention in Afghanistan.

Napolitano then tackled the problem of reviving detente and the conditions and "rules" on the basis of which such a revival is possible. He explained the reasons for the PCI's disagreement with the retaliation policy advocated by the United States and concluded by stressing the importance of Europe's role and the significance of the various initiatives taken recently by the PCI on the international plane. Many questions were asked aimed at obtaining further details on particular points regarding hypothetical solutions to the Afghan problem by an agreement which would guarantee independence; various views of detente were also reviewed and particular interest was shown in the resumption of the PCI's relations with China.

Comrade Napolitano was later received at the House of Commons by Joan Lestor, chairwoman of the Labor Party's International Committee, for a meeting which was attended by many Labor members of Parliament. Napolitano expressed our party's interest in such meetings which are part of the PCI's initiatives toward all leftwing forces in Europe and he then expounded both the PCI's international policy and its viewpoints on the Italian political situation at the present time.

There followed a specific exchange of ideas on questions of economic development and employment as posed in Italy and Europe. Several members of the Labor Party leadership such as Tony Benn, Frank Allaun and other members of Parliament including Stuart Holland, took part in the debate. The Labor Party representatives referred to the obviously reactionary policies proposed by the Conservative government and agreed on the appropriateness and usefulness of more datelined [as published] exchanges of experiences and opinions among leftwing European forces on these problems.

UN SECRETARY GENERAL SEEN SHIRKING RESPONSIBILITIES

NC041034 Nicosia I MAKHI in Greek 4 Apr 80 pp 1, 7 NC

[Excerpt] Diplomatic circles in Nicosia have termed UN Secretary General Waldheim a Pontius Pilate for the stand he has adopted in his report to the General Assembly on the Cyprus issue. The same circles are saying that in his report Mr Waldheim is trying to divest himself of any responsibility for the failure of his efforts. He considers both sides responsible for the deadlock because of their divergent and firmly supported stands, and avoids saying which of the two sides is scorning the UN resolutions.

Further Waldheim Effort Urged

NC041035 Nicosia ELEVTHERI KIPROS in Greek 4 Apr 80 p 1 NC

["Stands and Views" column]

[Excerpt] In his report to the United Nations yesterday Dr Waldheim promised to continue his efforts to create the preconditions for talks. We firmly believe that if the secretary general directs these efforts from a distance, they are doomed to failure.

We call on Dr Waldheim to immediately convene talks under his personal auspices. The aim of these talks should be the solution of the Cyprus question and they should be held within the framework of the two agreements. Let him devote a few days of his time and let him make a sustained, personal effort. The secretary general's role gives him every right to take such an initiative.

Dr Waldheim wants to solve the Cyprus question. He can do it. His first step is to convene the talks. Then we will see who will respond and who will refuse. In any case we, on our side, are willing. If there is no response from the other side then the General Assembly and the Security Council will have the floor.

Firmer Stand Toward Turkey Sought

NC041036 Nicosia O AGON in Greek 4 Apr 80 p 2 NC

[From "Our Stands" column: "After the Deadlock"]

[Excerpts] UN Secretary General Waldheim's report to the General Assembly has formally placed the seal on the deadlock in the efforts for resuming the intercommunal talks. Our side has stressed that it is prepared to continue the efforts. Mr Waldheim has stated that he is willing to continue to offer his good offices. But from the Turkish side there seems to be not the slightest disposition for talks. Denktas' long absence abroad is indicative of this attitude.

Now the president of the General Assembly will have to appoint a special committee entrusted with strengthening the secretary general's efforts. We do not think that at this point many diplomatic niceties towards the Turkish side are justified. Denktas and Ankara have shown scornful intransigence. And it is time--for both the committee that will be appointed as well as the third parties, which, with their stand allow Ankara to be intransigent--to point out that the scorn of Denktas and Ankara cannot be tolerated forever.

DENKTAS DENIES CIA ORGANIZED WORLD ISLAMIC CONGRESS

TA282105 (Clandestine) Bayrak Radio in Turkish to Cyprus 1930 GMT 28 Mar 80 TA

[Text] President Rauf Denktas has said that the decision concerning the Turkish Federated State of Cyprus adopted by the World Islamic Congress is realistic, sincere and positive. Replying to reporters' questions on the issue, Denktas described as completely unfounded reports in the Greek Cypriot press that the World Islamic Congress had been organized by the CIA. Denktas said that the Greek Cypriots were trying to achieve through propaganda what they had failed to achieve through the force of arms, but that they were unsuccessful.

COLUMNIST APPRAISES U.S. AMBASSADOR'S STATEMENT

NC290635 Nicosia ELEVTHERI KIPROS in Greek 29 Mar 80 p 3 NC

[From the "Comments" column: "Practical Proofs"]

[Text] The statement by U.S. Ambassador Stone during the signing of an agreement at the Foreign Ministry of the republic is particularly interesting. It is worth noting what the U.S. ambassador said and then, appraising the content of his statement, we shall give our own views.

Mr Stone said that the interest of his country in the people of Cyprus is very great and sincere. We agree that the American people have understood the drama of Cyprus, that they have taken an interest in it, and that as proof of this interest they have given considerable economic assistance to the refugees. The Cypriots are not ungrateful. They are aware of, they remember and will always stress what the American people have offered them.

Mr Stone further said that the United States continues to do what it can to support a fair solution to our problem. However, if we take into account that these efforts have been exerted continuously since 1974, we must be disappointed. It is unacceptable for a superpower like the United States to spend 6 whole years in efforts regarding human rights, humanitarian problems and violation of moral principles and rights. Are we to admit that the United States is unable to find a proper solution and to insist on its implementation?

The U.S. ambassador concluded his statement by saying that the United States, within the framework of this effort, will continue to assist and support the UN secretary general's efforts for a Cyprus solution. But it is now obvious that this effort will not succeed. It is actually dead. Is the United States going to support such an effort?

We expect practical proof from Mr Stone's country. We expect a very clear effort that will be based on UN principles, will safeguard human rights and will bear the mark of principles of justice. We will most willingly respond to such an effort. We are waiting for it!

TO VIMA FORESEES BILATERAL ACCORDS WITH NATO, U.S.

AT031714 Athens TO VIMA in Greek 3 Apr 80 p 1 AT

[Excerpts] Bilateral defense agreements with the United States and NATO may constitute the alternative solution for Greece's return to the alliance's military wing if the relevant talks which seem to be entering their last stage finally fail.

This possibility is now being studied by the government while, according to TO VIMA reports, there are no longer any substantive objections by the military leadership which thus far had considered the return to the NATO military wing as the only solution to the problem.

The handling of the entire issue, in any case, will now pass to the clearly political level and talks will continue by the Foreign Ministry and NATO Secretary General Luns. In any case, it should not be precluded that a "final round" may still be held at the military level if General Rogers comes back with new proposals.

In Athens a competent Foreign Ministry source questioned in this connection stated that the Greek Government does not know whether Rogers has submitted a report nor does it know of any new initiatives by the alliance.

In any case, it is noted in this connection that the U.S. Government is principally interested in the fate of the bases in Greece which is still in suspense as the Greek-U.S. defense agreement has yet to be signed. On the other hand, granting "facilities" to NATO too, according to government sources, may solve certain problems of compensation for the alliance's infrastructure installations in Greece.

Government Reiteration

AT031715 Athens Domestic Service in Greek 1230 GMT 3 Apr 80 AT

[Text] In reply to a question regarding press reports on NATO and the bases, a government spokesman said the following: First, according to the government's reports, so far General Rogers has not submitted a report. Second, the government's position on the issues of NATO and the bases have been defined by the prime minister's speeches in the Chamber of Deputies and by the government statement of 23 February 1980. The government, concluded the government spokesman, has nothing to add to these statements.

The same circles added that foreign ships must observe Greek laws and comply with instruction by local authorities.

U.S. AMBASSADOR ACCUSED OF MEDDLING IN GREEK AFFAIRS

AT291426 Athens RIZOSPASTIS in Greek 29 Mar 80 p 2 AT

[From the "Radical" column: "What Did McCloskey Want?"]

[Text] U.S. Ambassador McCloskey has recently demonstrated perpetual motion and has tried to surpass in novelty even his distant predecessor, Peurifoy. Timidly at first, he took the initiative to make certain ceremonial visits for the purpose, as reported, of "rekindling" Greek-U.S. relations. Suddenly, however, he put aside diplomatic discretion and began advancing with well-known American bluntness. After his speech at the Propeller Club in Piraeus in which he reminded us that we are the old faithful "allies" of the United States, and of the things we are indebted to in the "Truman Doctrine," and in which he outlined the framework of our country's foreign policy as a NATO member, McCloskey unexpectedly paid his provocative visit to Larisa. Without even advising the government he visited the commander of the air force and the commander of the 1st Army and the military installations. Instead of protesting--if for no other reason at least because he had ignored it--the government took great pains to cover up McCloskey's impropriety in order to dispel the people's and the opposition parties' strong reaction. Emboldened by the government's immeasurable "tact," McCloskey began "secret" meetings. On Wednesday before last (20 March) [as published] McCloskey visited National Defense Minister E. Averof-Tositsas at the Pentagon. The meeting and the discussion which took place have been covered by a cloak of silence, something which means that the meeting cannot be described as merely "ceremonial," all the more so when currently Washington and its principal NATO allies are intensifying their pressures in all directions in order to reconfine our country to the NATO military wing. Characteristically, the government announced absolutely nothing on McCloskey's visit. However, that frenzied lecture on national division by the national defense minister in his order of the day to the country's armed forces cannot pass unnoticed because it was a lecture that in any case conflicted with President of the Republic Tsatsos' message calling for a "national consensus" and with the prime minister's message. The bitter experience of the recent 30 years does not permit attributing certain situations only to possible "eccentricities" by the people in power, and in any case the Greek people abhor the tactics of "secret diplomacy" that the government is trying to implement in contacts with the U.S. ambassador.

U.S. EVALUATION OF GREECE'S MILITARY SIGNIFICANCE VIEWED

[By TO VIMA correspondent St. Evstathiadhis]

[Text] New York, 1 April--Military experts in Washington who have notable experience in their fields now claim that the Pentagon does not consider Greece to be "directly threatened" by a Soviet military attack in the event of a more general crisis as opposed to Turkey and, secondly, to Yugoslavia which U.S. staffers put in the category of countries that will receive "direct" Soviet military pressure in a crisis.

On the basis of very recent evidence--information by responsible U.S. authorities, maps, and so forth--the same military experts claim that Greece does not seem to be placed at all within the borders of so-called "Soviet aggressive activity" in the broader area of Central and Western Europe inside which NATO and the Americans also include part of northwest Africa.

The meaning and the consequence of such an evaluation of Soviet intentions regarding Greece--namely, that the Greek area does not constitute the "direct" target of Soviet military interest--is that the United States and NATO will not deal specifically with Greece to "protect it militarily" in case of a crisis.

The Pentagon defines the terms "crisis" and "more general crisis" as the situation which would be created during peacetime in a broad area which, according to Washington's assessments, could lead to a military clash of great dimension. According to military experts, contingency plans for such a crisis are not always the same as plans for military operations in the same area.

The same military experts, who have worked for many years with staffers and other groups of the U.S. Armed Forces and NATO, add that first, the Pentagon concept concerning Greece's not being "immediately" threatened by the Soviet Union is not something new, but they stress that it is interesting that this U.S. position has remained uninfluenced by recent geopolitical developments in the area--notwithstanding the fact that different things are heard from Washington at this time when a propaganda war is being waged.

Second, recently representatives from the Pentagon and other government services in Washington repeatedly and indirectly, but most clearly, showed--in testimony before Congress, in briefings and so forth--that the U.S. Armed Forces' role in the "Greek area" will be very limited in a crisis in the area precisely because, according to their assessments, this area does not attract "direct" Soviet military interests. On the contrary, the Straits area [Dardanelles] for instance, is described as a "Soviet target" and according to Washington justifies U.S. military interest in the event of a crisis.

Finally, the same sources note as a characteristic fact that, in a very recent Pentagon analysis of the geopolitical factors of the broader Greek area, Greece's military contribution as such in the case of a crisis appeared very limited--as opposed in some way to Turkey's contribution. The official text mentions: "The Greek forces share the duty of protecting the NATO southeastern wing (jointly)... Greece contributes immeasurably to the strengthening of the (Atlantic) alliance with the bases and facilities it affords to the U.S. forces..."

PREMIER ADDRESSES CABINET ON ECONOMY, INTERNATIONAL ISSUES

[Text] Today at 1100 the Council of Ministers convened under the chairmanship of Prime Minister Karamanlis. At the beginning of the meeting various official business matters were discussed and then the prime minister briefed the cabinet members on current internal and external developments. Specifically referring to the country's domestic situation, Karamanlis stressed that if the international political and economic condition is taken into consideration the situation prevailing in Greece can be considered satisfactory. In addition to political normalcy and social peace, Karamanlis went on to say, the country's economic situation is under control as was ascertained during yesterday's broad conference.

Of course, like all the world, we are facing problems. The most serious of these are inflation and the balance of payments, both of which are influenced by international economic developments, especially the energy problem. Of course, the prime minister said, they are also influenced by domestic causes like the courageous incomes policy of the last 5 years and high public and private expenditure.

This means that to a great extent the cure of these problems depends exclusively on us; that is, small sacrifices and self-restraint will be needed which, without subjecting us to deprivations, will avert dangerous developments.

I regret to say, Karamanlis stressed, that recently various groups do not seem to understand these truths. An exacerbation of trade unionist demagogy has been observed which many times is also encouraged politically. We are dealing with a sort of competition in strike manifestations which have acquired an epidemic form. The endemic querulousness typical of Greek life should be added to these. However, someday, the prime minister stressed, we must understand that only within the framework of a well-governed and prosperous state can citizens improve their life.

Then referring to the international situation the prime minister stressed that this is so confused and dangerous that no people can feel secure. This is more true for our country which lies in the world's most sensitive area, the area from the eastern Mediterranean to the Persian Gulf. In Afghanistan, Karamanlis stressed, the Soviet Union damaged international detente and efforts will be needed to restore it. In Iran international order has been abolished and in the Middle East the combination of the Palestinian problem and the energy problem have led to explosive situations. Furthermore, in the Balkans there is an impression that developments may occur which will necessitate increased vigilance. This situation, the prime minister concluded, political and economic, international and domestic, necessitates true national unity and avoidance of political and social tensions which could weaken the country. This is necessary all the more since our well-known and critical national issues, the creation of which is not our responsibility, are still outstanding.

Finally Prime Minister Karamanlis suggested that the cabinet members intensify their efforts for greater effectiveness in their fields. He also suggested that they cooperate with the various classes and regularly and objectively brief public opinion.

CONFERENCE REVIEWS GREEK ECONOMIC SITUATION

AT031620 Athens Domestic Television Service in Greek 1900 GMT 2 Apr 80 AT [Text] Under the chairmanship of Prime Minister Karamanlis, a conference was held today with the participation of the minister of coordination, the minister of economics and the minister of agriculture, as well as the directors of the Bank of Greece and the National Bank, on issues connected with the European Community, industry and energy, commerce, labor.

During the conference the course of the Greek economy was examined within the broader framework of international economic developments. It was ascertained that our country's economy is basically sound and that it does not inspire uneasiness despite the more general unfavorable international economic developments. After the recent successive price increases of crude oil, the international economy presents a picture of uncertainty, instability, increased inflation and expansion of deficits in the balance of payments. These phenomena result, in most countries, in a significant delay of or reduction of the rate of development and in increased unemployment.

On the basis of recent figures from the OECD and the EEC it is expected that the rate of increase of the gross local product of EEC countries in 1980 will be 1.2 percent. In 1979 it was 3.3 percent while in some OECD member countries it is expected that even real income will drop; for instance in England it will be minus 2 percent.

In addition, this year in all EEC countries a significant increase in inflation has been observed. In some cases it has even doubled. On the basis of figures for the first 2 months of 1980 inflation in Britain was 18.8 percent as against 9.5 percent in 1979, in Denmark it was 13.2 percent as against 6.8 percent last year, and even in the strong economies of West Germany and the United States it increased between 1979 and 1980 from 2.9 percent to 4.7 percent and from 9.7 percent to 14.0 percent correspondingly.

These developments were accompanied by a high increase in unemployment which has reached a point causing severe social problems. In the last 3 months of 1979 unemployment in Belgium reached 11.3 percent, in Spain 9 percent and in Italy 7.6 percent. The anti-inflationary policy implemented by all OECD countries is expected to lead to greater unemployment.

Regarding the balance of payments, on the basis of recent EEC figures a significant increase was noted in deficits, which have almost tripled. The 1980 deficit is expected to reach $20 billion as opposed to a deficit of $7 billion in 1979 and a surplus of $17 billion in 1980 [as heard]. Characteristically, the example of Germany is being mentioned where the deficit will amount to $10 billion in 1980 as against a deficit of $3.7 billion in 1979 and a surplus of $9.4 billion in 1978. It must be stressed that the phenomenon is general and extends to most OECD countries. Compared with the unfavorable international developments which were previously mentioned, the Greek economy's course appears to be rather satisfactory.

The rate of increase in the gross national product, despite an anti-inflationary policy, is predicted to surpass 2 percent; that is, it will be almost double the corresponding rate of the EEC countries. Furthermore, it is expected that unemployment will not increase in 1980 and will remain at current levels which represent "friction unemployment." The maintenance of unemployment at these low levels is a significant achievement by the Greek economy and an example in the international area.

In the field of investments it is expected that only a small increase will take place this year which will be due to the deliberate reduction of public investments and to the restriction of economic activity within the framework of the anti-inflationary policy that is being followed. Investment in the remaining sectors of the economy will show a substantive increase that will be due principally to beginning the implementation of certain large industrial investments and to increasing the effectiveness of the incentives for regional development. Characteristically, it is expected that the financing has been secured and the implementation will begin of the investments for petrochemicals and chrome ore by ELEVME [Greek Industrial and Mining Investments Company], for the great cement unit of [word indistinct] and for the significant extension of the alumina plantoof "Aluminum Hellas." These investments represent a total of about 30 billion drachmas.

The expansion of the incentives for regional development and their adjustment to incentives in force in the EEC--as envisaged in a relevant draft bill--will also lead to a significant increase of the investments being made in border regions. The public sector as a whole is moving within the framework of forecasts and it is believed that it will constitute a factor for greater inflationary pressures. Specifically, the regular budget in the first 3 months, despite the long strike of the bank employees, the voluntary restriction of imports and the low rate of economic activity, was implemented in an absolutely satisfactory manner regarding expenditure and revenue.

In the first 3 months of 1980 inflation declined slightly. Specifically, the consumer price index increased by 6.2 percent while in the corresponding period of 1979 it had been 7.2 percent, despite consequences which had arisen from the increase in the price of fuel and imported raw materials. The decline of inflation is expected to speed up in the second part of the year and this will be the result of the continuing anti-inflation policy that is being implemented by the government and the result of a decrease in prices of imported commodities which has begun to appear and is expected to intensify.

Thus, the goal which the government set for inflation in 1980 appears to be realistic with perhaps small deviations. Regarding the monetary-credit program, because of the long bank strike, there are no credible figures yet that allow accurate conclusions to be drawn. From the temporary figures available, it emerges that there has been a significant loss in deposits and an increase in the entire financing of the economy. These developments were accompanied by a significant expansion of monetary circulation. The situation began being normal early in March and in recent days a significant rebound in deposits took place. The total financing of the economy and monetary circulation appear cautious.

Characteristically, it is stated that in the 10-27 March period savings account deposits increased by 2,794,000,000 drachmas as against an increase of 416 million drachmas in the same period of 1979. It is stressed that the government is determined to implement steadfastly the monetary-credit program it has charted for the current year. Developments in the balance of payments during the first 3 months when the consequences of the measures for imports began appearing were satisfactory. The implementation of the agreement which was made with the productive classes is developing normally and the government is absolutely satisfied with results so far.

From the available temporary figures it emerges that the increase in imports has substantively dropped while exports and invisible earnings continue to develop normally with a certain greater development to follow.

The difference in the balance of current payments is expected to increase by only about 10 percent, from $2,258,000,000 in 1979 to $2.5 billion in 1980, despite the additional burden of $700 million resulting from the increase in the price of crude oil. This deficit will be earily met by the influx of private capital and by public borrowing which is predicted to remain at the 1979 levels and will be confortably achieved with absolute ease thanks to the high international credit rating which the country maintains.

At this point it should be observed that the influx of private capital in the form of deposits in foreign exchange has recently shown some stagnation, especially in dollar and sterling deposits, following the significant increase that has occurred in interest rates on such deposits abroad which fluctuate in the range of 18 to 20 percent.

So that the normal influx of foreign exchange deposits can continue, about a month ago the interest rates for deposits by seamen were decontrolled and we are already proceeding to decontrol other deposits in sterling and dollars to deal effectively with competition from banks abroad.

The general conclusion which emerges from the development of the basic figures is that the Greek economy is successfully dealing with the consequences arising out of unfavorable international economic developments and it continues to be basically sound. With the understanding and cooperation of the productive classes, workers and all the people the government is determined, with absolute consistency and steadfastness, to follow the anti-inflationary policy it has charted and which is undoubtedly the only possible policy dictated by current circumstances aiming at guaranteeing the economy's stability without ignoring long-term development goals.

DEMIREL REPLIES TO CARTER MESSAGE ON DEFENSE AGREEMENT

TA041032 Ankara Domestic Service in Turkish 1000 GMT 4 Apr 80 TA

[Text] Prime Minister Suleyman Demirel said that the new Turkish-American defense and economic cooperation agreement is an important achievement in the friendly relations between the two countries, based on their common democratic values, peaceful ideals and deep-rooted cultural and humanistic ties.

Prime Minister Demirel sent a message to President Carter in reply to the latter's message on the occasion of the signing of the new Turkish-American defense cooperation agreement. In his message dated 29 March, the date the agreement was signed, President Carter said that he was convinced that it was necessary to help Turkey in every possible way and that he gave great priority to exert efforts in this direction.

In his reply message, Demirel said: My government is pleased to hear you state that the new agreement brings serious duties to the United States for helping Turkey, an ally, in the strengthening of its defense and economy and, also, that you consider efforts in this direction a priority issue.

FOREIGN MINISTER ON WALDHEIM REPORT TO UNGA

[Text] Foreign Minister Hayrettin Erkmen has said that rather than resume the intercommunal talks in Cyprus, the Greek Cypriot administration is continuing its old attitude of exploiting the subject for certain long-term goals.

Replying to a question by a TRT correspondent, Erkmen expressed his views regarding UN Secretary General Kurt Waldheim's recent report on the Cyprus issue. Erkmen recalled that on 28 March Waldheim proposed a text to the two sides in a bid to prepare a common ground for the resumption of the intercommunal talks. He continued: The Turkish Federated State of Cyprus unconditionally accepted this text without reservations. The Greek Cypriot side, on the other hand, has rejected this proposal and resorted to various maneuvers hindering the attempts to find a common ground. This is the situation at present. The side hindering the resumption of the talks is the Greek Cypriot side, which is not prepared to accept the Waldheim proposals of 28 March. By accepting the UN proposal as it is, the Federated State has again displayed its good will and conciliatory attitude. Erkmen added that this basic point was clearly shown in Waldheim's report as well.

Waldheim's report was welcomed by the Federated State. The minister of foreign affairs, defense and tourism of the Federated State, Kenan Atakol, replying to a TRT correspondent's question on the report, said that the Turkish Cypriot side agrees with Waldheim's view that the intercommunal talks constitute the best solution for the problem. Pointing out that it is pleasing that the report noted that the Turkish Cypriot side accepted Waldheim's recent proposals as they are, Atakol said: If the Greek Cypriots had also accepted these proposals, the intercommunal talks would have resumed.

REPORT ON RESOLUTION OF ISLAMIC WORLD CONGRESS

LD290128 Riyadh SPA in Arabic 2215 GMT 28 Mar 80 LD

[Text] Famagusta, 28 March, SPA--The Islamic World Congress confirmed at the end of its eighth session in Famagusta, Cyprus, that Palestine, in its recognized international borders before partition, is an Islamic country populated by a Muslim people. It confirmed that all the Palestine region belongs to the people of that land and called on all Palestinians to participate in its liberation from the aggressive Zionists.

In its final communique issued today, the congress confirmed that any recognition, or the granting of any legitimacy to the aggressor in Palestine, or the signing of any form of settlement with Israel is anti-Islamic and an act of treason against the Muslims. The congress called on world public opinion to support justice and human rights and not to pay attention to Zionist claims and lies. The congress also called on Islamic public opinion to understand the danger threatening Islamic existence, heritage and civilization and to the civilization of all mankind. The congress explained in its final communique that the Islamic world is called upon to struggle to raise what is right and reject all the traces of aggression and all attempts by the enemies of God to force Islam into submission.

The congress condemned the Soviet invasion of Afghanistan, describing this invasion as the barbaric actions of a great power that claims that it works for peace.

It appealed to all Muslim states and peace-loving and justice-loving states to use their influence to call for immediate and unconditional withdrawal from Afghanistan, and for allowing the Afghan people to determine their own fate without any foreign interference. It also called for preservation of the Islamic nature of Afghanistan and appealed to the governments and individuals of the international organization to help the 700,000 Afghan refugees.

The congress called for the setting up of a balanced federation for the Turkish and Greek communities in Cyprus, and for insuring guarantees for complete self-rule for each community, so that each would live in peace and would administer its own affairs without interference from the other side.

The congress expressed deep concern over the condition of Muslims in the Philippines and called on the Government of the Philippines to implement the Tripoli agreement, which stipulates the necessity of giving Philippine Muslims their legitimate rights by giving them real self-rule in their historic homeland.

The congress stressed its full support for the liberation movements in Eritrea and it denounced the Ethiopian regime and its supporters. It called on Muslim states in general and the Islamic Congress organization in particular to adopt all effective means and methods to end this regrettable state of affairs and to assist in restoring independence to Eritrea.

The congress condemned the Ethiopian armed invasion of western Somalia and declared that the presence of foreign forces near the Horn of Africa is regarded a constant threat to all the Muslim countries and the sea routes in the region.

The congress pointed out that the right to self-determination is one of the basic rights of all peoples and should be exercised in the interests of world peace. The congress reaffirmed its support for the demands relating to self-determination in various places, regardless of whether these concern Muslims or non-Muslims.

The congress emphasized the Soviet interference in the internal affairs of some African states and reaffirmed that this constitutes a grave danger, threatening the safety and security of Africa, and called on the Islamic nations to be aware of this matter.

The congress condemned the policy of racial discrimination in Africa and called on the wealthy Islamic universities to establish faculties for African studies to prepare specialized people, so that they might work in various parts of Africa with an aim to publicizing its past and present and the dangers which are threatening it. The congress called for the rewriting of African history in order to remove the falsifications and deliberate errors and the twisting facts committed by colonialist historians.

The congress confirmed that the OAU is the strongest representative of African countries and urged Islamic countries in Africa to play an effective role in the running of its affairs. The congress called on the UN Disarmament Committee to reach an international agreement which guarantees the security and integrity of all states, and in particular ones which have not been able to develop their own nuclear [word indistinct] for various reasons.

The congress called for the formation of an effective Islamic reconciliation committee to deal with any disputes that may arise between member countries; the committee should deal with all political, economic, financial and commercial disputes.

The congress called for the strengthening and consolidation of the means of cooperation and consolidation between Islamic countries to achieve economic integration between them. It pointed out that every encouragement should be given to the proposal submitted in Dakar concerning the establishment of an Islamic economic council to improve cooperation in the fields of airlines and maritime transport, in addition to banking operations, insurance, trade and industry. The congress expressed the hope that an Islamic economic market would be established.

The congress called for paying attention to the problem of securing food for Islamic countries and setting up an Islamic food organization along the lines of the UN food organization to secure foodstuffs for Islamic countries facing threats from Western countries. The congress called on Islamic countries to show concern for the position of Islamic minorities and assist them in solving all their religious, educational and cultural problems, so that they are not separated from the Islamic nation.

The congress called on Islamic countries to establish diplomatic missions at various levels in all countries that have significant Islamic minorities. These should include cultural sections, along the lines of the British Council, friendship houses and other cultural establishments to assist Islamic minorities, especially in the religious, cultural and social fields.

The congress expressed appreciation to King 'Abd al-'Aziz University for the Institute for Islamic Minorities Affairs which it had set up and called on the rich Islamic universities to do likewise.

The congress expressed its total support for the establishment of the International Center for Islamic Education in holy Mecca, which will protect the Islamic education system against the invasion of other cultures. The congress recommended that the Arabic language should be the language of the states of the Islamic world. The congress demanded that the teaching of the Arabic language should be compulsory in all Islamic schools in the world, without slighting any national or regional language.

The congress expressed its support for the establishment of an Islamic organization similar to the United Nations Educational, Scientific and Cultural Organization, UNESCO, to work for the development of the Islamic heritage and to care for science and technology in the colleges and universities of the Islamic world. The congress proposed organizing an international symposium to debate the reestablishment of the Islamic system. It pointed out that Islam stresses the necessity of the rule of law and that the Islamic world should set an example to be followed throughout the world in this field.

The congress pointed out that all information media in the world are controlled by non-Muslims, who distort facts about the Muslim world. It called for a better [word indistinct] Muslim news agencies. It expressed pleasure at the fact that the ISLAMIC NEWS AGENCY has begun operations.

The congress explained that there is an urgent and pressing need to consolidate the defense capabilities of every Muslim state, in addition to establishing a common and integrated defense system among the states of the Muslim world. The congress expressed appreciation for the organization by the Islamic Institute for Defense Technology of a conference in London last year. It called on Muslim states to work for the serious implementation of the London conference resolutions.

The congress declared its backing and support for the just demand of the countries of the Third World regarding the establishment of a nuclear weapons-free zone in Africa, the Middle East and Southeast Asia.

The congress called on all member states to work for realization of this goal. The congress emphasized the right of developing countries to use nuclear energy for peaceful purposes.

WIENER ZEITUNG REVIEWS 20TH MBFR ROUND

AU041142 Vienna WIENER ZEITUNG in German 4 Apr 80 p 1 AU

[Unattributed report: "A Stalemate Also in the 20th Round"]

[Text] The 20th round of the talks on a reduction of forces in Central Europe, which have been going on in Vienna for nearly 6 and 1/2 years, ended yesterday [3 April] without tangible results. At separate press conferences marking the end of the round the West and the East, although stressing their readiness for compromise, charged one another with hampering progress at the negotiations by failing to respond to proposals.

The Eastern side pointed out that the latest Western proposals are actually aimed at "destroying" the work done by the 19 state delegations over a period of more than 6 years. The Western side emphasized that the talks on "accompanying control measures" make this round of the talks "appear useful in that respect."

The representative of the NATO states, Dutch chief delegate W. De Vos van Steenwijk, stressed at the press conference that the Western side, as before, regards a clarification of the discrepancies regarding Eastern troop strength figures in the reduction area as decisive for the progress of the negotiations. According to Western information, the Warsaw Pact states are said to have a numerical superiority of 150,000 men, while the East maintains that there is an "approximate balance" between the armed forces of the two sides.

De Vos furthermore stressed the importance attached by the NATO countries to the "accompanying control measures." An agreement on such measures is necessary, he said, because even after the envisaged reduction of forces, Central Europe will remain an area where armed forces are concentrated, thus giving rise to the serious danger of false assessments of potential troop movements.

In this field the Eastern side has for the first time made certain statements so that this round of negotiations can be regarded as "useful" up to a point, De Vos said. In his statement he underscored the West's readiness for compromise which, he said, was reflected in the proposals of December 1979. These proposals provide for a troop reduction in the first reduction phase of 30,000 men by the Soviet Union and of 13,000 men by the United States. At the same time the West renounces for the time being the fixing of an overall reduction quota for the Warsaw Pact states. This quota should be fixed in the negotiations on the second reduction phase.

CSSR chief delegate E. Keblusek, spokesman of the Warsaw Pact countries, declared that the latest Western proposals (of December 1979) amounted to a "radical change of the Western position." The Western side refuses to reduce or limit arms as well as troop strengths of the air force, and it does not want to adopt any corresponding commitments for a second reduction phase either. According to Keblusek, the Soviet speaker at today's (3 April) last plenary session, Ambassador N.K. Tarasov, pointed out that the participating NATO states were "destroying the results of the joint 6-year work of the representatives of 19 states," since the West was virtually returning to the same positions it represented at the beginning of these negotiations.

The Eastern side, furthermore, declared that the USSR's unilateral concession to withdraw 20,000 soldiers from the GDR in the period October 1979 to October 1980 would lead to unequal reduction conditions if the proposal submitted by the West were to be upheld. Irrespective of the USSR's unilateral measure, one is seeking to impose upon it an additional reduction quota of another 30,000 men.

The Western side argued in this context that the Soviet Union's decision to affect a unilateral forces reduction was made independently from the Vienna negotiations and consequently had nothing to do with these talks.

In his statement Keblusek also drew attention to the Eastern proposal calling for the submission of new troop strength figures as of 1 January 1980 because the 1976 figures are no longer in line with the existing situation. This proposal, he said, is undoubtedly another important step toward accommodating the Western position. In conclusion, the Eastern side expressed "serious concern" over the unfavorable development at the Vienna negotiations, especially with regard to the intensification of the arms race by the Western side.

After the Easter break, the negotiations will be resumed on 14 May.

GENSCHER HOLDS TALKS ON HOSTAGES WITH IRAN'S TABATABA'I

LD041228 Hamburg DPA in German 1151 GMT 4 Apr 80 LD

[Text] Bonn--On Thursday evening Federal Foreign Minister Han-Dietrich Genscher held talks with Sadeq Tabataba'i, supervisor of the Prime Minister's Office of Iran, on the international efforts aimed at the release of the hostages being held by Iranian students in the U.S. Embassy. This was confirmed today by the Foreign Ministry.

According to reliable sources in Bonn, Tabataba'i returned to Tehran directly after his talks with Genscher. This has led to an unconfirmed belief that there had possibly been some success in finding a solution to this problem during the talks. Tabataba'i has very close contacts with Iranian President Bani-Sadr and Iran's religious leader Ayatollah Khomeyni.

SCHMIDT INTERVIEWED ON AFGHAN INCURSION, DETENTE

Discusses Possible Solutions

LD041706 Hamburg DPA in German 1521 GMT 4 Apr 80 LD

[Excerpt] Bonn--In the opinion of Chancellor Schmidt, the USSR must be (?persuaded) in many ways to withdraw its troops from Afghanistan and so end the crisis caused by their incursion. In an interview (published in Bonn) with MUENCHER MERKUR (Saturday edition), the chancellor said that this was necessary because the West did not have the means, nor has it intended, nor must it intend to push the Soviets out of Afghanistan by military force.

Schmidt declared himself strongly in favor of a continuation of the policy of detente despite the Afghanistan crisis. Detente has brought inestimable advantages, not only for the German people but for all West and East European states as well as for the two world powers. It would be a change for the worse if this more predictable policy went up in smoke.

According to the chancellor it is also possible to hold out to the Soviets the prospect of military or economic concessions, or of cooperation in spheres far removed from or not directly situated at the source of conflict. Nor would the USSR find it possible to withdraw unless Afghanistan's nonalined status was guaranteed. If Afghanistan's sovereignty, once it is restored, is to be recognized, say by the USSR, Pakistan, India and the United States, then this must be irrevocably linked with attempts to end the Soviet intervention in Afghanistan.

On U.S.-European Relations

LD041942 Hamburg Domestic Service in German 1800 GMT 4 Apr 80 LD

[Excerpt] Federal Chancellor Schmidt is convinced that, in spite of the Afghanistan crisis, the United States will adhere to the policy of detente. In an interview for Saturday's edition of MUENCHNER MERKUR, Schmidt said that President Carter had assured him that the United States wants to maintain East-West contacts in order to end the arms race. Schmidt denied that there are irritations between Bonn and Washington because of Afghanistan. However, he confirmed the Federal Government's view that, in working out a Western approach, the differing interests of the United States and of the European allies must be taken into consideration. The federal chancellor said that in an alliance of sovereign states there must be regard for one another and that the relationship with the foremost Western power is not one of giving and receiving orders.

Schmidt repeated the European Community's position that a Soviet troop withdrawal from Afghanistan could be made easier following a promise that the West does not intend to turn Afghanistan into an anti-Soviet bastion. The EC proposal for making Afghanistan neutral was based on this promise.

GENSCHER CALLS FOR BALANCED DISARMAMENT, NEGOTIATIONS

LD051413 Hamburg DPA in German 1303 GMT 5 Apr 80 LD

[Text] Bonn--Against the background of events in Afghanistan, Federal Foreign Minister Genscher has said that it is decisive that the Federal Republic should respond to the demands of the present time by a "policy of firmness, clarity of purpose and predictability." This includes, he said in a Bavarian radio broadcast today, Bonn's contribution to the Western defensive alliance to safeguard equilibrium, aid for the countries of the Third World to strengthen their independence, as well as continued vigorous pursuit of the disarmament proposals which have been submitted to Moscow on a number of occasions.

Genscher renewed his appeal to the USSR to take the concrete disarmament proposals of the Western alliance seriously, and to discuss them. Moscow must not be allowed to force a new arms race upon the world. "We want negotiations on disarmament in order to safeguard an equilibrium at the lowest possible level of armaments," the foreign minister stressed. He affirmed the resolve to use the 3 years before the stationing of the first U.S. nuclear medium-range missiles in Western Europe "to get the negotiations on medium-range weapons going and, it is to be hoped, to bringing them to a conclusion."

It is important for the security of the countries of the Third World that the USSR should discuss the proposal of the EEC foreign ministers for an independent, nonalined Afghanistan with all states concerned. "We do not seek to derive any advantage," he emphasized, "from a withdrawal of Soviet troops from Afghanistan." The sole purpose is to enable that small nation to organize its state as it thinks right.

APEL CONSIDERS SOVIET LEADERS 'CAUTIOUS, RESTRAINED'

LD051319 Hamburg DPA in German 1241 GMT 5 Apr 80 LD

[Text] Hamburg--Hans Apel, the federal defense minister, agreed with his interlocutors in Australia, New Zealand and Japan that "Moscow surely has no big plans" for world domination. In an interview granted to the North German radio in connection with the end of his 2-week trip to the Pacific Ocean area, Apel said he thinks there was a general consensus of opinion during the talks that cautious, restrained politicians are at work in Moscow who are willing to act, however, whenever opportunities arise as they have in Afghanistan, Ethiopia, Mozambique and Angola.

Therefore, it is important for Western policy "that no political or economic vacuums be allowed to arise." In this way, the Soviet Union would have difficulty in pursuing its policies. Apel thinks it "useless to try and penetrate the minds of Kremlin politicians." It is far more important to make the predictable, consistent nature of our policies clear to them. For this, "more Western coordination" is required which, of course, excludes "one-way traffic."

FRANCOIS-PONCET COMMENTS ON POLICY TOWARD CHAD

LD041958 Paris Domestic Service in French 1800 GMT 4 Apr 80 LD

[Text] While fighting continues in Chad, the French-African conference in Paris has officially ended after being extended. Chad was in fact not on the agenda but in the corridors there was much talk about the Ndjamena events. This provided the opportunity for French Foreign Minister Jean Francois-Poncet to recall France's policy of neutrality: [Begin Francois-Poncet recording] As you know, France has been pursuing for more than 2 years a policy of peace and reconciliation regarding Chad. France will continue this policy and will not allow itself to be diverted from this task, which is the only way in which Chad can be returned to peace and reconciliation. [end recording]

At the French-African conference this morning the main subject was that of refugees. There are 4 million refugees on the African Continent alone and 10 million throughout the world. Great attention is of course being paid now to the Chad refugees who are exiled in Cameroon.

LE MONDE VIEWS CARTER HANDLING OF IRANIAN CRISIS

LD031145 Paris LE MONDE in French 3 Apr 80 p 1 LD

[Editorial: "April Fool's Day in the Iranian Crisis"]

[Text] Another April Fool's Day. That was probably the impression which prevailed in the United States on the evening of 1 April. The hopes raised that morning over the fate of the Tehran hostages suddenly seemed very premature. The animosity felt against the Iranian leaders was coupled in some Americans with extreme irritation at Mr Carter in that he had tried to use the affair--not unsuccessfully as the results show--to exert a timely influence on the Wisconsin and Kansas voters who went to the polls that day.

The disappointment was particularly acute since the White House had hinted over the weekend that it hoped to be able to officially announce an "important breakthrough" in the hostage crisis. After meeting the chief of the executive, Republican Senator Jacob Javits even stated solemnly: "The moment of truth has come for the United States and our allies." The various U.S. spokesmen were all of the same opinion, mentioning the possibility of new sanctions ranging from a total embargo to breaking off diplomatic relations.

In these circumstances Mr Carter's decision to postpone the imposition of additional sanctions, stating that Mr Bani-Sadr's remarks constituted a "positive step," must have seemed surprising. The U.S. President certainly realized that, for the time being, nothing could be done in Tehran without the support of the imam, who had just categorically rejected his request for the hostages to be placed under the Revolution Council's control. Furthermore, Mr Bani-Sadr's "yes, but" was accompanied by conditions such that it virtually amounted to a polite "no."

Aside from Mr Carter's election concerns, U.S. diplomacy is in a blind alley. It has fortunately ruled out the military option which would endanger the hostages' lives and is reluctant to declare an all-out "political and economic war" on the Iranian regime.

Such a step would in fact certainly not have the desired effects. On the Iranian plane it would help to radicalize the internal situation and weaken the "moderates" in the Revolution Council who, together with Mr Bani-Sadr, are seeking an honorable solution to the hostages problem. At the international level, it would undermine the U.S. strategy in the Middle East which is aimed at rallying all the Islamic countries against the Soviet Union over Afghanistan.

The Carter administration's margin for maneuver is, therefore, much reduced. Analyzing the deeper motives behind the President's Iranian policy in NEWSWEEK, Mr George Ball, former U.S. under secretary of state, states that Mr Carter is doomed to go on trying all the diplomatic means at his disposal "while awaiting changes in the chaotic political situation in Iran which might offer him fresh openings for a final solution."

As Mr Ball stresses, Mr Carter will need a great deal of courage to persevere in this "realistic course" and not to give way to pressure from those who are demanding "action" which they presume would end the unjust and unjustifiable ordeal which the 50 hostages in the U.S. Embassy in Tehran have been undergoing for 150 days.

CPSU DELEGATION ARRIVES TO STUDY PCF PROPAGANDA ACTIVITY

[Text] A delegation of the Lebanese National Movement comprising Lebanese National Movement Vice Chairman In'am Ra'd, Socialist Party Vice Chairman Tariq Shihab and Nadim 'Abd as-Samad, member of the Politburo and Secretariat of the Lebanese Communist Party, was received by Maxime Gremetz, Politburo member and PCF Central Committee secretary.

During these talks Maxime Gremetz reaffirmed the PCF's intention to do all in its power to develop the French people's solidarity with the Lebanese National Movement and its struggle for a democratic, united and independent Lebanon.

TUNISIAN WORKERS, STUDENTS OCCUPY ARAB LEAGUE OFFICE

NC041301 Paris AFP in English 1252 GMT 4 Apr 80 NC

[Text] Paris, April 4 (AFP)--Tunisian workers and students today occupied the Arab League offices in Paris for 90 minutes to protest the death sentences pronounced against 15 men who participated in the attack on the Tunisian town of Qafsa.

The peaceful occupation and an accompanying hunger strike by 12 protesters, who have been fasting since Wednesday, were organized by several French and Tunisian groups.

In a news conference the protesters said that they had the support of "a very broad sector of Christian movements, labor unions and French political parties."

The protesters said that they also were planning a demonstration in front of the Tunisian Consulate in Paris.

On March 27, the Tunisian State Security Court in Tunis sentenced 15 men to die for allegedly having attempted to overthrow the regime of President Habib Bourguiba by means of the armed attack on Qafsa two months earlier.

The men were captured by Tunisian security forces after the attack, which killed 45 people and wounded 111. The Tunisian Government said that the guerrilla squad had been trained and armed by Libya, which the Libyan Government denied.

The Tunisian court gave another 24 men sentences ranging from hard labor for life to six months in jail, and acquitted a further 20.

MEMBERS OF 'DIRECT ACTION' GUERRILLA GROUP INDICTED

AU032002 Rome ANSA in English 1930 GMT 3 Apr 80 AU

[Text] Paris, April 3 (ANSA)--Seventeen of the nineteen persons arrested here at the weekend as members of the urban guerrilla organization, Direct Action, have appeared before a night session of the French court for the security of the state. Fifteen of them, including Italian Olga Girotto, were formally indicted and ordered jailed. The other two had no charges preferred against them and were released.

The hearing was held at the end of the six days of preventive detention permitted to the investigators under the French legal code.

The court's investigating magistrate Michel Legrand handed down a whole list of charges against the five women and ten men indicted, linking the whole to an attempt to replace the authority of the state with an illegal authority, the accusation that brought the case before the court for state security.

None of the defendants made any statement or chose a defense lawyer. The identity of the two cleared of all charges was not released.

The number of Italians now incriminated by the court after the French police's anti-terrorist swoop is five.

Apart from Olga Girotto, another four were picked up in southern France and held for some days in the port city of Toulon before being transferred to Paris. The four--29-year-old Franco Pinna, 28-year-old Enrico Bianco, his wife, 28-year-old Oriana Marchionni, and 28-year-old Luigi Amadori--appeared in a separte hearing. They were indicted for associating to commit crime and for taking part in a successful raid against the coffers of the miners' pension fund near Lille. In their case too, the charges were described as forming part of an attempt to replace the authority of the state with an illegal authority. The robbery netted almost three and a half million dollars.

NEW GOVERNMENT SWORN IN; MINISTERS ANNOUNCED

LD042118 Rome Domestic Service in Italian 2000 GMT 4 Apr 80 LD

[Text] The new government--the second under the premiership of Cossiga and comprised of Christian Democrats, Socialists and Republicans--has been sworn in by the head of state. This concludes one of the shortest government crises; it lasted only 16 days. After next week, Premier Cossiga will outline the government program in both chambers of Parliament. This will be followed by a vote of confidence. Opposition by the Communists and the Social Democrats is taken for granted. The Liberals described the tripartite formula as vague and based on pretentious nominalism and discrimination which divides the lay parties. Criticism of the new government's composition has been expressed by the Christian Democratic "proposal" group led by Segni. The government, its statement says, is born under the banner of the worst logic of expediency because our fundamental aim has always been the renovation of the party. We denounce, the statement concludes, the methods which have done so much harm to the party and the country. At 1000 tomorrow the Council of Ministers will hold a meeting to appoint state under secretaries.

Cabinet Composition

Parties' Reaction

AU050848 Rome ANSA in English 0800 GMT 5 Apr 80 AU

[Text] (ANSA) Rome, April 5--Italy's new government holds its first cabinet meeting here today amidst a flurry of mixed reactions to Premier Francesco Cossiga's three-party coalition of Christian Democrats (DC), Socialists (PSI) and Republicans (PRI) and to the men appointed to head its 27 ministries. Today's cabinet meeting will be devoted to the appointment of undersecretaries for these ministries.

The most favorable reaction to the government came from the DC LA DISCUSSIONE weekly, whose next issue will carry an editorial lauding the "solid majority" backing the new coalition in Parliament and the new government's open-minded attitude toward the "democratic parties" not included in it.

But the DC's conservative faction, "Proposta", whose spokesman Vito Scalia was a minister in Cossiga's former coalition of Christian Democrats, Social Democrats (PSDI) and Liberals (PLI), was an outspoken critic, charging that the new ruling arrangement arose "from the worst factional logic".

The PSI came out with contrasting reactions, giving observers the impression that the brand new "truce" between party Secretary Bettino Craxi's following and the party's powerful leftist faction was flimsy at best. Former Secretary Giacomo Mancini threatened to step down from the party's leadership board yesterday and vote against the new government in a Parliament in protest against Craxi's "personal" and "monarchic" way of running the party. Mancini's major gripe was with the way Craxi made all the "final decisions" about the settling the government crisis "in terms of personal negotiations", disregarding a Central Committee request to consult the party leadership. In Mancini's opinion, Craxi's conduct was "disgraceful" and "exceptionally grave" enough to warrant a censure motion from the party's upper echelons.

Deputy Secretary Claudio Signorile issued a statement yesterday voicing "reservations about the ambivalence and nature of the government". He explained, however, that the PSI's leftist flank had a poor showing in the government for the sake of the forthcoming regional elections, which required "unity even outside the party's ranks".

The PANORAMA news weekly gathered two interviews from Craxi-follower Claudio Martelli and the newly-appointed state holdings minister, Gianni De Michelis. Martelli asserted that "the ghost of center-left rule" can be avoided in the new government as can "the errors" of the past. (Ed. note: "Center-left rule" refers to the four-party partnership of Christian Democrats, Socialists, Social Democrats and Republicans that ran the country for most of the 1960's, up to 1974.) De Michelis indicated that the major risk facing the Socialists at this point was that of "suddenly finding itself with more power than it could handle".

The (right-of-center) liberal Party issued a statement charging that the three-party set-up was "ambiguous" and was based upon "discriminations dividing the nation's secular parties". PLI Deputy Secretary Antonio Patuelli cited cited the "excessive" number of ministries in the new government as a sign that the country was "returning to its old way of governing".

The PSDI was just as critical, charging the new coalition was breaking away from the policy of "national solidarity" and paving the way for the entrance of the Communist Party into government ranks.

Leftwing Proletarian Unity (PDUP) M.P. Eliseo Milani made the sarcastic remark here yesterday "I take pleasure in noting that the clean-up campaign was such a big success".

The quip was in reference to the highly-touted bid on the part of the new coalition to inject greater morality into government affairs while at the same time leaving bureaucracy with even more ministries than in the past.

FOREIGN MINISTER COLOMBO: EEC, DETENTE MAJOR PRIORITIES

AU050855 Rome ANSA in English 0720 GMT 5 Apr 80 AU

[Text] Rome, April 5 (ANSA)--Italy's new foreign minister, Emilio Colombo, has singled out European Economic Community (EEC) budget problems and East-West detente as two of the major responsibilities facing his forthcoming term in office. Colombo was one of the 27 ministers sworn into office in Rome yesterday with Premier Francesco Cossiga's ruling coalition of Christian Democrats (DC), Socialists (PSI) and Republicans (PRI).

In remarks to the press after the swearing-in ceremony, the former European Parliament speaker cited the dispute over Britain's contributions to the EEC as a key problem facing Italy's duty chairmanship of the Brussels-based ministerial organizations. He specifically pointed to the conflict that has arisen between the European Parliament and the EEC Executive Office in Brussels over the budget and Britain's contributions to it.

The new Italian diplomatic chief also addressed his responsibilities to "the very severe problems stemming from the recent grievous developments endangering East-West detente" which, he added, "needed an appropriate response".

The veteran Italian political leader, who has been a member of the Rome Parliament since the foundation of the Italian Republic and has a long career of government service behind him, also described the duties of the newly-established Ministry for EEC Affairs, headed by Christian Democrat Vincenzo Scotti. The new ministry, according to Colombo, was created to meet a timely requirement, that of taking care of implementing EEC policies inside Italy. Its job, he added, would be to see to it that all of the Rome government's ministries handled their jobs in accordance with Community standards.

Colombo was elected European Parliament speaker in 1977 and stayed in the post until last year, when direct universal suffrage elections brought a new assembly into office.

DC's PICCOLI PRAISES PCI'S EVOLVING AUTONOMY FROM USSR

AU051605 Rome ANSA in English 1530 GMT 5 Apr 80 AU

[Text] Rome, April 5 (ANSA)--Christian Democrat Party (DC) Secretary Flaminio Piccoli said today that his party is closely following the Italian Communist Party (PCI) moves of autonomy away from the Soviet Union, such as its recent refusal to attend the European communist parties conference.

In an interview with the Rome daily LA REPUBBLICA Piccoli said that his party agrees to "favor... further developments, avoiding naturally any form of interference in the PCI's internal affairs. We are aware that this will be a hard contest for (PCI Secretary Enrico) Berlinguer to win". Piccoli added that Berlinguer's firm coherence and steady course must be recognized.

"There have been some backward steps, such as Berlinguer's visit to Moscow, and we remarked on this. But then the forward path was resumed. And this going back and forth demonstrates the seriousness of the process of autonomy of a party stemming from the October Revolution and which for many decades lived in communion with the international communist movement led by the Soviet Union".

According to Piccoli, the Italian Communist Party knows very well the thinking of the Soviet ruling class and is the one that has the most to fear from Soviet hegemony. "The PCI, headed by a moderate leadership elite of Western culture...sees the gravity of attitudes which can lead to dangerous outcomes". While not sharing the opinion of those who believe the latest developments are the result of an under-the-counter agreement between the PCI and Soviet Union, Piccoli criticized PCI leaders when they speak of "real socialism". "I understand that there are reasons of opportunity but it certainly slows down the party's evolution to the West".

BERLINGUER TO VISIT NORTH KOREA DURING CHINA TRIP

AU051620 Rome ANSA in English 1550 GMT 5 Apr 80 AU

[Text] Rome, April 5 (ANSA)--Italian Communist Party (PCI) Secretary Enrico Berlinguer has added North Korea to his itinerary when he goes to China next week. The PCI press office announced today that North Korean President Kim Il-song has extended an invitation to the Italian Communist leader to visit his country. Berlinguer will be accompanied on his visit to the two Asian nations by PCI foreign bureau chief Gian Carlo Pajetta, Central Committee members Antonio Rubbi, Angelo Oliva and Silvana Dameri.

VATICAN DENIES REPORTS THAT POPE HAS LEUKEMIA

AU051611 Rome ANSA in English 1540 GMT 5 Apr 80 AU

[Text] Vatican City, April 5 (ANSA)--The Vatican today denied reports appearing in a Rome daily today that Pope John Paul is suffering from a form of leukemia. Rome's LA REPUBBLICA had said in today's issue that a mysterious illness is slowly debilitating Pope Wojtyla. "Pope John [word indistinct] while active, must take it easy and for the last few months has taken the habit of resting in the afternoon".

LA REPUBBLICA said it is believed that the pontiff is suffering from a form of leukemia which must be kept under control with periodical blood transfusions which the pople undergoes during his days of rest at the papal summer villa at Castelgandolfo south of Rome. Vatican spokesman today voiced surprise that reports of this kind appear in the press "with such superficiality when the pope's daily and intense activity is proof of his complete physical efficiency".

TERRORISTS BOMB TWO ROME POLICE BARRACKS

[Text] Rome, April 5 (ANSA)--A high-powered bomb blasted through the attic of the police department's major barracks in Rome during the night. Three hand grenades were also hurled at another barracks by three unidentified assailants. Both of the attacks were claimed by a group calling itself "Communist Patrols for Counter-power", the same organization that bombed another barracks in the capital on January 20. The explosion in the police department's central barracks near the Holy Cross in Jerusalem Church smashed the water tanks on the roof and seriously damaged the building's hydraulic system. Two officers were treated for shock in the hospital.

(?Many) policemen from the barracks told reporters last night that they believed the assailants had planned a major attack and not a mere demonstrative gesture. The same view was expressed after the January 20 attack, in which about twenty police officers were injured. The general belief at the time was that it was only a question of luck that the bomb did not cause a large-scale massacre.

CARRILLO, MSZMP'S KADAR TO DISCUSS INTERPARTY TIES

LD041055 Madrid MUNDO OBRERO in Spanish 30 Mar 80 p 13 LD

[Unattributed 29 March report on interview with PCE [Spanish Communist Party] Executive Committee Member Nicolas Sartorius: "A Realistic Congress"--place not specified]

[Text] Nicolas Sartorius and Andreu Claret have just returned from Budapest, after attending the Hungarian communists' 12th congress as delegates. MUNDO OBRERO held a brief conversation with Sartorius yesterday in order to convey to our readers the PCE representatives' first impressions received in Hungary.

"Both in the Central Committee's report, which Kadar presented, and in the delegates' speeches and Kadar's final summation," Sartorius told us, "I noted an effort at critical realism (within the limits of the criticism usual at the congress of a party in power), especially with respect to the economic problems, which are Hungary's central concern today. It is praiseworthy that the problems and difficulties should be called by their name, while also appraising what has been accomplished, but without exaggeration or rhetoric and--I would say--without dogmatism. I noted that there is great concern about young people's problems. On the other hand, women's problems, which were central at the previous congress, figured to a lesser extent. There was no fundamental new development in international issues. However, great concern about the issues of peace and disarmament is apparent. International issues are touched on, taking into account the individual circumstances surrounding Hungary's position. There are some points of agreement with the PCE's stances, such as, for instance, the interest in detente, but at the same time there are matters on which we do not agree, such as the issue of Afghanistan. Some of the foreign journalists covering the congress made much of the fact that the talk which we gave at the Salgotarjan mining and iron and steel complex was published on the following day in the party's newspaper citing our party's disagreement with the Soviet intervention in Afghanistan."

[Question] According to all the observers, the economic issues were the principal issues at the conference. What is happening with respect to the economic reform plans?

[Answer] The impression is that the congress represented a reaffirmation and a development of the 1968 economic reform policy. There are very important measures, such as increasing pay differentials, work incentives, the emphasis on increased productivity and enterprise profitability and increasing the role of the market within the framework of the planned economy. Kadar's speech on these matters was realistic. The situation will deteriorate, he said, and it is necessary to work harder, with greater discipline; it is necessary to push onwards.

[Question] What impact has your visit had on relations between the Spanish and Hungarian communists?

[Answer] Relations between the two parties are normal; I would say that they are good. This visit has helped clarify some misunderstandings which may have existed. We had the opportunity to converse with members of the Hungarian Socialist Workers Party leadership. Kadar talked with us informally for quite a while, and we believe that there are prospects for intensifying and improving relations with the Hungarian communists even further. To this effect a meeting between Carrillo and Kadar, the date of which has yet to be set, has been planned and we have prepared the ground for it. There is great interest on both sides in maintaining good relations and in their being as open as possible. Neither we nor they are alarmed by the differences, and we must debate them openly, without being overly diplomatic, understanding the conditions under which each of us operates.

ANTISUBMARINE HELICOPTERS ARMED WITH NUCLEAR WEAPONS

WA071200 London REUTER in English 0923 GMT 6 Apr 80 WA

[Text] London, April 6, REUTER--Britain has armed its anti-submarine helicopters with nuclear weapons known as depth bombs, the Ministry of Defense said today.

The bombs explode underwater with such force that they can destory an enemy submarine some distance away.

Each of Britain's anti-submarine helicopter fleet of 66 aircraft has been fitted with at least one such device.

Unlike the nuclear depth bombs carried by the Royal Air Force's Nimrod sea patrol planes, which are American-made and controlled, the helicopter weapons are made in Britain.

The Defense Ministry would not confirm reports that each bomb has a yield of up to 10 kilotons, about half the destructive power of the Hiroshima bomb.

The government revealed the existence of the helicopter bombs this week in a defense policy document. It noted that the Soviet submarine fleet would continue to grow during the 1980s.

The naval helicopters fly from Britain's three carriers, other warships and land bases.

IRA PASSES 'DEATH SENTENCES' ON PETER JAY, DENIS HEALEY

NC041224 Paris AFP in English 1213 GMT 4 Apr 80 NC

[Text] Hamburg, April 4 (AFP)--The Irish Republican Army (IRA) has passed death sentences on former British Ambassador to Washington Peter Jay and former Chancellor of the Exchequer Denis Healey, a self-proclaimed member of the IRA leadership said in an interview published here today.

Naming himself merely as "Patrick", the IRA man said Mr Jay, son-in-law of former Labour Prime Minister James Callaghan, had been condemned in the same way as Lord Mountbatten, "executed" last year.

"Patrick" also pledged that the movement would continue attacking British forces stationed in West Germany.

He told the weekly journal DER SPIEGEL that "almost all the soldiers who are called to oppress the people of Northern Ireland are stationed by rotation in West Germany".

And he alleged that several Belfast regions had been simulated in the British barracks at Munster to enable the soldiers to train in street fighting.

The IRA received "no material or physical support" from the Red Army Faction which had totally different aims, and was not linked to "comparable national liberation groups such as the Basque ETA [Basque Fatherland and Liberty Group]," he said.

O AGON: ROLANDHIS TO ASK FOR U.S.-EEC MEDIATION

NC050833 Nicosia O AGON in Greek 5 Apr 80 p 1 NC

[Excerpt] The Cyprus Government will ask for U.S. and EEC mediation to lift the deadlock and open the way to a just, peaceful and honorable solution to the Cyprus issue. These moves are expected after the Easter holidays.

Foreign Minister Rolandhis is expected to request the mediation of the EEC countries. During the middle of next week he will have special talks with his British, French and West German counterparts, which will be held in Lisbon.

The minister leaves Tuesday for Lisbon through Athens and will return on Saturday. The European Council conference will deal with various international issues that mainly concern the countries of the council.

According to reliable sources Mr Rolandhis will explain to his West European counterparts the Cyprus Government's views and will stress that the Greek Cypriot side has shown all good will and moderation and that every effort has been exerted to insure the success of the UN secretary general's efforts, but these efforts stumbled over the intransigence and insincerity of the Turkish Cypriot side.

ROLANDHIS ON POSSIBLE UN COMMITTEE, OPPOSITION CHARGES

NC041749 Nicosia Domestic Service in Greek 1600 GMT 4 Apr 80 NC

[Text] Referring to news reports and comments in today's press on the question of the UN committee and the handling of the political issue, Foreign Minister Rolandhis has stated that there is no question of the government asking or not asking for the UN committee, adding that the UN General Assembly has already authorized its president to appoint the committee in the event that the UN secretary general's report notes that no progress has been made in the talks.

Mr Rolandhis also stated that, given the choice between a substantive dialog and a committee, he prefers--as he has always preferred--substantive dialog. He stressed that it was the Turkish side's absolute negation, stalemate and obstinately firm stance--which relies on the colossal Turkish military cover--that would probably lead the UN General Assembly president to the decision to appoint a committee.

Rolandhis then said that the committee would be formed if considered expedient by the General Assembly president since there have already been 4 months of intensive efforts toward negotiations. He added that the committee, if formed, does not prevent Dr Waldheim from continuing his efforts toward a dialog because the committee's activities would not conflict with his task. This is why, Rolandhis stressed, Dr Waldheim is right in noting in his report that he will continue his efforts for resuming the dialog.

Rolandhis went on to say that it was not the secretary general's duty to comment on the question of the committee in his report or even to refer to it. According to the General Assembly mandate, Dr Waldheim's duty is to prepare a report on the progress of the talks based on the 19 May 1979 agreement.

Rolandhis further said that the allegation that he personally pursued the formation of a committee merely to win the battle to create an impression was untrue. He added that this matter was not decided upon by himself but by the national and ministerial councils and that the UN resolutions procedure showed that substance counted and not impressions.

On the question as to whether our issue will regress as a result of Mr Denktas' displeasure with the formation of the committee, since he himself does not like it, Rolandhis said that since Mr Denktas finds as many excuses as he likes in order to keep the Cyprus problem unsolved or to consolidate the faits accomplis, our criteria therefore should not be Denktas' pleasure or displeasure but the objective righteousness of our actions.

Denies 'Mismanagement'

NC050755 Nicosia O FILELEVTHEROS in Greek 5 Apr 80 p 1 NC

[Text] Because of the opposition's efforts to attribute the deadlock in the Cyprus issue to the alleged "mismanagement" of the issue of resuming the intercommunal talks, Foreign Minister Rolandhis made the following statement to O FILELEVTHEROS:

"The UN secretary general's report shows the extent of the Cyprus Government's efforts to resume the dialog.

"The Turkish side, with its utter refusal to cooperate and with its insistence on a partitionist solution, has once again frustrated the dialog.

"The opposition continues to say that the problem could be solved through good management. Since the Turks currently clearly accept nothing but partition, it is naturally to be deducted that the opposition's 'good management' is nothing but partitionist management."

KIPRIANOU BLAMES TURKEY FOR WALDHEIM'S FAILURE

NC061722 Nicosia Domestic Television Service in English 1610 GMT 6 Apr 80 NC

[Text] President Kiprianou said today that Turkey was to blame for the failure of the efforts of the UN secretary general to reactivate the Cyprus intercommunal talks. On our part, he said, we did everything possible to facilitate the resumption of a fruitful dialog, but the Turkish attitude was such that it undermined the consultations and frustrated the holding of the talks.

The president was speaking during visits to army camps on the occasion of the Easter holidays. He was accompanied by the minister of the interior and the commander of the National Guard.

Mr Kiprianou said: We shall continue our struggle--always ready for a meaningful and constructive dialog, but at the same time ready to carry on until we achieve an honorable and nationally acceptable solution.

He stressed that the Greek Cypriot people would never accept the results of the Turkish invasion or a partititionist solution. Turkey, he added, would have to abandon its expansionist policy before progress towards a settlement could be achieved.

ATAKOL WELCOMES WALDHEIM'S REPORT ON CYPRUS

TA041535 (Clandestine) Bayrak Radio in Turkish to Cyprus 1030 GMT 4 Apr 80 TA

[Text] Foreign Affairs, Defense and Tourism Minister Kenan Atakol expressed his gratitude to UN Secretary General Kurt Waldheim, who made public his report on Cyprus. Atakol noted with pleasure that the report stated that the Turkish Cypriot side accepted the recent proposals.

Atakol noted: I would like to thank the honorable Waldheim for his efforts to find a peaceful solution for the Cyprus issue. In his report, the secretary general has noted that a solution to the Cyprus problem can be attained through the intercommunal talks. We agree with this view. We would also like to express our gratitude to the honorable Waldheim for stressing the fact that the intercommunal talks constitute the only way to find a peaceful solution for the Cyprus problem.

The fact that the report noted that the Turkish Cypriot side accepted the secretary general's recent proposals as they exist is also pleasing. If the Greek Cypriots had also accepted these proposals, the talks would have resumed. As always, through the statements of their government's spokesman, the Greek Cypriots are attempting to distort and conceal the realities. They are trying to hide the fact that they did not accept Waldheim's recent proposals. Efforts to conceal the truth will not yield any desired result for anyone. It will be possible to solve the problem only if the Greek Cypriots accept the realities of Cyprus.

TFSC ANNOUNCES NOTAM ON ITS AIRSPACE STILL VALID

[Text] The Turkish Federated State of Cyprus has announced that the NOTAM it had issued in connection with its airspace is still valid and that it will not allow the Greek Cypriot administration to have flights in the air corridor between Ercan and Ankara unless the Ercan Air Traffic Center is informed.

The Turkish Cypriot minister of public works and communications, Erdinc Gurcag, said in a statement in Lefkosa [Nicosia] that the air corridor between Ercan and Ankara was under the control of those two air traffic centers. He pointed out that planes entering this corridor without the knowledge of Ercan or Ankara did not have any flight sa ty. Gurcag said that if, despite this, the Greek Cypriot administration scheduled flights inside this corridor it would lead to dangerous situations. The minister recalled that any plane entering the Ercan-Ankara air corridor must first contact the Ercan Air Traffic Center.

TO VIMA: ADMIRAL SHEAR'S VISIT REQUEST REJECTED

ATO41447 Athens TO VIMA in Greek 4 Apr 80 p 1 AT

[Text] Admiral Shear, commander of NATO forces south Europe, asked to make a protocol visit to Greece but the Greek Government did not follow through on his request, thus virtually rejecting it.

According to TO VIMA reports from Brussels the Greek answer to the U.S. admiral's proposal was "questionable and, in a last analysis, negative." The same sources stated that subsequently the admiral did not insist on his proposal and the entire issue "remains open."

It must be noted the U.S. admiral had repeatedly supported pro-Turkish positions and that even recently, when he visited Turkey, he once again took a position in support of Ankara's views on the question of Greek-Turkish differences.

A government spokesman stated yesterday that according to information available to the government there has so far been no submission of the Rogers report after rejection of his proposals by the Greek Government.

The positions of the government on the issues of NATO and the bases, the government spokesman added, have been defined in the speeches of the prime minister in the Chamber of Deputies and in relevant government statements. He added that the government has nothing new to add to these statements.

At the same time, however, the government is expecting new NATO proposals which, most likely, will this time be submitted under the initiative of the alliance's Secretary General Luns. At the same time the government does not exclude the possibility that General Rogers will return in a last ditch effort by making new proposals which, however, on the bases of current developments, are not going to be considered as a basis for discussion.

In such an eventuality the Greek Government is reportedly considering alternate solution and it is already considered more than likely that it is turning toward bipartite accords with the United States and NATO.

For its part yesterday the KKE (Interior) stressed that bipartite military accords with the United States and NATO, as an alternative to returning to the alliance's military wing, would be another new blow against the country's independence and integrity. It was added that such a development would involve Greece in imperialist plans against the Arab peoples and the socialist countries without, at the same time, protecting it from tangible dangers such as Turkish chauvinist plans.

Government Denial

ATO51447 Athens NEWS in English 5 Apr 80 p 4 AT

[Text] Concerning reports of NATO Admiral Shear having asked to pay a courtesy visit to Greece but being told that he is a persona non grata here, a government spokesman said the story is not accurate.

The same government spokesman added that Admiral Shear may pay a courtesy visit to Athens when he leaves the alliance, but only a courtesy visit and nothing more.

A Ministry of Defense source also denied that the government turned down this proposal made by the commander of the allied forces of southern Europe, Admiral Shear. This source added that Admiral Shear, who is retiring from NATO, will come to Athens at the end of April, only for a courtesy visit, and will return to his headquarters on the same day.

U.S. TO MAKE 'FINAL OFFER' ON NATO RETURN

[By TO VIMA correspondent St. Evstathiadhis]

[Text] New York, 5 April--The United States will undertake an initiative, officially this time, on Greece's return to the NATO military wing and most probably this move will take place at the end of next week.

The U.S. initiative on Greece's return is linked with the issue of discussion of the bilateral military agreement about which the State Department these days has shown vigorous interest without meeting, however, a corresponding response, as Washington claims. In this connection, U.S. sources in a position to know stated that the Pentagon now gives priority to the signing of the bilateral agreement but in no case will it combine or even link the relevant talks with the issue of return.

The form and the content of the relevant initiative is not known, at least as of this moment, but it is certain that it has been inspired by the National Security Council which some months ago, before General Rogers had assumed his duties in NATO, had shown interest for a more active involvement. Given the significance attached to the decisions and activities of the Council, which is chaired by adviser Zbigniew Brzezinski, its involvement, even indirect, in the issue of Greece's return to NATO certainly gives special dimensions to the entire issue.

The U.S. initiative will be in the nature of a "final offer;" that is, either Greece accepts the content of the proposals which will follow or NATO and Washington will judge that the issue of the return has ended at least as far as NATO is concerned.

Of course in Washington, where there is no official or any other statement regarding a direct U.S. initiative toward Athens and competent sources are confirming that Rogers' mission has "finally failed" and that there is no ground for its revival, the same sources now claim that General Rogers "was so busy with more substantive issues of the greatest priority" that he was not able--or did not want--to deal more seriously with the issue of Greece's return. It should also be noted that several months ago General Rogers had notified Washington that a "political intervention" was needed on the issue and in fact had suggested that NATO Secretary General Luns intervene (last December TO VIMA had written about this).

During a talk with TO VIMA, U.S. sources in Washington expressed optimism concerning the results of an official U.S. initiative on the issue of the return but also recognized at the same time the "singular political situations" which had developed in Greece recently. They based their optimism first on the fact that there is a declared and official interest--to a certain extent it is a request--by the Greek Government and certain political personalities for direct "U.S. intervention in the issue," and second on the fact that currently the U.S. Government has a greater margin for influence over Ankara following the signing of the U.S.-Turkish military agreement.

Finally they based their optimism on the fact that the Greek Government and the Greek Armed Forces "cannot remain indifferent" when they realize that this will be the last NATO activity for Greek return.

Informed sources in Washington, which in the past had repeatedly stipulated that there would be an official U.S. initiative for Greek return, attributed vote-getting motives to the initiative that is being planned. They recall that personalities from AHEPA [American Hellenic Educational and Progressive Association] and other Greek-American organizations recently "requested" President Carter to intervene in the issue of Greece's return to NATO, letting it be understood that thus he would have their political and other support.

Apparently the Greek Government is not yet fully informed on U.S. activities on the issue of return. It should not be precluded that one or two senators from the group of five who will arrive in Athens on Tuesday--probably Baker and Biden--will sound out Foreign Minister G. Rallis in this connection when they meet him. The day before yesterday the senators were briefed by the competent government official on "issues connected with U.S. policy in countries they will visit (Oman, Turkey, Greece)."

PASOK CHAIRMAN, KKE (INTERIOR) CC SECRETARY MEET

AT051250 Athens TO VIMA in Greek 5 Apr 80 p 1 AT

[Text] Bambis Dhrakopoulos, secretary of the Central Committee of the KKE (Interior) yesterday paid a visit to the Kastri home of the leader of the majority opposition party and chairman of PASOK, Andreas Papandreou.

As reported Papandreou and Dhrakopoulos exchanged views on domestic and international developments. The domestic issues discussed included the latest reports and developments of the presidential election issue, the election law and others.

As is known the KKE (Interior) criticized "New Democracy" in the resolution of its latest Central Committee meeting. The criticism concerns "New Democracy's" efforts to exploit the presidential election issue for the purpose of perpetuating its stay in power and PASOK's efforts to deal with the issue in a polarizing way for the purpose of strengthening difference between the two largest parties.

The KKE (Interior) reiterates its proposal for a solution with a president with the broadest possible support to be agreed upon after consultations between the opposition parties and "New Democracy."

In the same resolution the KKE (Interior) requests cooperation between the opposition parties on a series of issues related to the creation of conditions during the forthcoming election so that the people may genuinely express their views. Specifically it wants implementation of the simple proportional representation system of election, granting the vote to 18-year olds and for full equality in the use of the mass information media.

It is believed that yesterday Dhrakopoulos expounded these positions to A. Papandreou. It is considered likely that the meeting will be repeated prior to the presidential election.

I AVYI: PAPANDREOU STATEMENTS 'MERIT SPECIAL ATTENTION'

AT011801 Athens I AVYI in Greek 1 Apr 80 pp 1,6 AT

[Editorial: by Th. Tsouparopoulos: "PASOK and Eurosocialism"]

[Text] On his return from West Germany, where he conferred with the chairman of the Social Democratic Party and chairman of the Socialist International, Willy Brandt, Andreas Papandreou made certain statements which we believe merit special attention. [paragraph continues]

He revealed that in expanding contacts with European socialist parties, PASOK expects a visit from the bureau of the socialist group of the European Parliament between 6 and 8 May "for discussing the question of PASOK's participation in the European Parliament."

In addition, Papandreou said that West Germany has had contacts with representatives of the Italian Socialist Party who will come to Greece in mid-April "to prepare the exchange of delegations between the two parties." It is also reported that next month Papandreou will meet the head of the Spanish Socialist Party [as published] F. Gonzalez, in Madrid.

It is essential to underline two points in the statements by the chairman of PASOK in addition to underlining the number of his meetings with representatives of European socialist parties: One--the important role to be played in Europe by closer relations between progressive-democratic parties which represent "the existing progressive forces" and, two--the necessity for a common front by all progressive forces in Europe, within which Papandreou places PASOK, which will oppose the forces of European reaction. Explaining this line Papandreou stressed, "imagine if Strauss comes to power in Germany. What will be the consequences of such a development in Europe?"

The reader will have no difficulty in concluding that these statements by Papandreou, immediately after his contacts with European socialist leaders, forge a new PASOK policy in the sector of its international relations. It is true that recently and particularly after our country's accession to the EEC PASOK has tried to find points of contact with the Community and its institutions.

Yet there was no clear position on the establishment of ties with the European socialist and progressive movement and, in addition, there was no mention of the necessity for unification of these forces, with the participation of PASOK, in dealing with the dangers arising from a total victory of the European right wing. There were no such orientations and estimations within PASOK. On the contrary there were clear statements against any contact with European socialist and social-democratic parties. PASOK's international relations were strictly limited to contacts with Arab socialism as it is expressed--with so many variations--by the Ba'th and other related groups.

We will not explain here what has intervened in order to bring about this important turn for PASOK. The reasons are evident. If PASOK wants to conclude its progress toward authority then it cannot remain outside the movement of European progressive forces. If it remained outside this movement then it would be identifying its existence with the unreal, sterile, isolationist policy of dogmatic parties. The evaluation and the stress we lay here are not a criticism or critique of PASOK. This could not be because simply the policy which PASOK adopts today on issues of the EEC, of European policy and so forth, is the firm line and policy of the KKE (Interior). We have viewed the EEC as an arena for class struggle and we invited all progressive forces to join us. This policy had two aspects: our people's struggle for the best possible conditions for accession to the EEC and the coordination of this struggle with the struggle of European progressive forces for the creation of a worker's Europe. These goals remain unaltered today. These are the goals of Eurocommunism and of all progressive forces.

Today, under the existing international crisis and the necessity to protect the democratic conquests of the peoples, of detente and international peace, the policy of unity between European progressive forces and, first of all, of the communists and the socialists have a special significance. [paragraph continues]

This is because such unity brings together the only "existing forces" which are able to oppose, and they do oppose, the forces of reaction, of war andintervention in other countries. From this aspect the latest statements by the Italian Communist leader Berlinguer gain a special significance.

He stated: "We are determined to continue strengthening this initiative and our contacts, believing that understanding and the search for all possible approaches between leftist and democratic forces of all types of orientation, must be pursued with determination, by overcoming old and new prejudices and suspicions so that the European labor movement may fulfill its basic mission in support of detente, against the antipeople policy of the right and so that new avenues may be opened to democratic development and the revival of society."

It is unfortunate that this so clear and essential policy is opposed not only by international reaction but also by the leading group of the French Communist Party headed by Georges Marchais who describe it as an alliance of the forces of the right. Marchais and his group condemn the policy of alliances with the socialists with the very same arguments used by the communist parties before 1930 with the result that Hitler and European fascism came to power. It is, however, interesting to stress here that only a few months ago--naturally before Afghanistan--while addressing a socialist international delegation which visited him in Moscow, President Brezhnev [title as published] stated that it will be a "joint duty" of the socialists and communists to fight for peace, detente and democracy. We also recall that during the recent meeting of the Socialist International in Vienna, while condemning the intervention in Afghanistan, it proclaimed the necessity for resumption of efforts toward detente, for overcoming coalitions and for a greater role for the countries of the Third World.

We write all this in order to stress the fermentations taking place within the European labor movement and in order to indicate that the time has come for every true progressive party to choose either the course indicated by the "existing progressive forces" referred to by Papandreou or the sterile denial which leadsto isolation or to the "international relations" of the type pursued by the dogmatic KKE.

Papandreou's statements open up new prosoects for PASOK itself. We are in no position to know to what extent the policy announced will be actually implemented. We can and we must say, however, that its implementation ought to be carried out with similar overtures both toward the European as well as to the Greek Eurocommunist movement and the other progressive forces.

As for us, the communists of the revival, we can only express our satisfaction because the majority opposition party has now adopted the principles of our own policy which we have been constructing with diligence and devotion on the basis of scientific socialism.

REPORTAGE ON PRESIDENTIAL ELECTION, DISCUSSIONS

15th, 16th Voting Rounds

TA031434 Ankara Domestic Service in Turkish 1420 GMT 3 Apr 80 TA

[Text] The Senate and the National Assembly failed to obtain results from the 15th and 16th rounds of voting held to elect a president during the joint session today. The National Salvation Party [NSP] senator from Erzurum, Lutfu Dogan, was the candidate during the 15th round of voting. Dogan received 83 votes in the voting in which 472 members participated. Presidentially-appointed RPP Senator Muhsin Batur, who was not a candidate, received 131 votes. Ninety-seven votes were distributed among various members and 161 ballots were blank. There was no quorum in the 16th round of voting. The Senate and theNational Assembly will hold a joint meeting tomorrow to continue the presidential election.

Erbakan-Demirel Meeting

[Text] National Salvation Party [NSP] leader Necmettin Erbakan, who said yesterday that his party would try to produce a positive outcome in the elections for president, began his contacts today. Erbakan called on prime minister and Justice Party leader Suleyman Demirel at the latter's office at 0930. After a 45-minute meeting, the NSP leader replied to reporters' questions. He said that his party had decided to do all it could since the 12 days of presidential elections have yielded no results. He said that the NSP had nominated a candidate yesterday, thus showing the caliber of the person they were considering for the post. Stressing that his party was not pursuing a partisan attitude regarding the presidential elections, Erbakan said: The point is to insure that a person who deserves the post assumes it. We want a respectable person loyal to what we call the national view and a person who believes in a national solution to problems. Acting from this view, when it was impossible for a NSP colleague to win the elections, we decided to visit the other parties.

Erbakan said that he told Demirel at the meeting that the NSP was a constructive party which wanted the issue to be resolved with the help of the other parties and with cooperation as soon as possible. Erbakan said: I told Demirel that since the president leaves his party the minute he assumes the presidential post, the NSP can do everything possible to insure that a colleague from the Justice Party wins the election, provided we agree on that colleague. I told him that we must try to agree on such a person as soon as possible.

Erbakan stated that Demirel said that the Justice Party would try to make all possible contributions to this step of good will. The NSP leader added that they agreed that the parliament should continue with the presidential election meetings until 2400 every night as of Monday.

Erbakan said: We are trying to agree on a candidate as soon as possible. We also agreed that the Justice Party will make the following suggestion as soon as possible--"We are considering the following colleagues from the Justice Party for the presidential post. Which one do you think would be appropriate?"--or that we will reach an agreement on what considerations we might have regarding this issue as soon as possible.

Erbakan's meeting with Ecevit, which began at 1400, lasted 70 minutes. In a statement following the meeting Erbakan said that, during his meetings with Demirel and Ecevit, they concluded that it would be beneficial to implement a special election method in a bid to allow the parliament to reach a decision as soon as possible. Erbakan noted: We now want all the future candidates to propose their candidacy at a specified time so that the Grand National Assembly can vote for each candidate separately in accordance with a certain procedure and reach a consensus. We thus want to hasten the result by insuring that everyone propose their candidacy as soon as possible rather than delay it. Erbakan also expressed the hope that the consultative committee of the Assembly will find the opportunity to develop a procedure on this issue tomorrow.

In his statement, Ecevit said that his views regarding the method of electing a president are very similar to those of Erbakan. Ecevit continued: We agreed that it would be suitable to determine certain rules during the weekend in order to insure a fruitful working atmosphere for reaching a consensus at the Grand National Assembly session on Monday. This is why I think it would be useful to convene the consultative committee again tomorrow. I will discuss this subject with my colleagues. I believe that we have entered a hopeful stage, even if it has been delayed slightly.

Erbakan later met with Turkes. The meeting, which began in Turkes' office at 1515, lasted 40 minutes. In a statement after the meeting Erbakan expressed his satisfaction that both the RPP and the NAP are sincere about the issue of electing a president as soon as possible. Pointing out that they had agreed that the parliament should work longer hours as of Monday and exert every effort until a result is attained, Erbakan said: All possible good will and efforts will be displayed in order to elect a president within the framework of the national solution.

In his statement Turkes noted that it would be very beneficial for the country to elect a president as soon as possible. Pointing out that dragging out the presidential elections also delayed the functioning of the National Assembly, Turkes said: This is why all the political parties should reach an agreement and cooperate in electing a president. The meetings on this issue were hopeful.

Erbakan held a 50-minute meeting with Ozdilek at 1600. After the meeting Erbakan said that the procedure applied so far delayed the election of a president. Pointing out that this procedure also facilitated the candidates' tendency to keep their candidacy until the end, Erbakan noted: With a new procedure, the candidates will be proposed at the beginning and this will precipitate a decision by parliament through incessant rounds of voting within the framework of the Constitution and the parliamentary rules and regulations. This is what we all wish.

Ozdilek said he agrees with the NSP on the subject of presidential elections, however, his group needs a preparatory period.

Lastly, Erbakan visited Baykara. In a statement after the meeting, which lasted about 1 hour, Erbakan said that the Presidential Quota Group also agrees with the view that the president should be elected as soon as possible and with a parliamentary majority. Baykara noted that his group wants the speedy election of a president.

Meanwhile, the Assembly consultative committee could not reach a decision during its meeting to determine a special agenda on the presidential elections. The representatives of political parties brought various proposals to the consultative committee meeting, which convened at 1400 under the chairmanship of National Assembly President Cahit Karakas. However, an agreement could not be reached on any of the proposals.

17th, 18th Voting Rounds

[Text] The 17th and 18th rounds of voting to elect a president failed to produce results at the joint session of the Senate and National Assembly today. Four hundred and eight members of the Grand National Assembly participated in the 17th round. The National Salvation Party senator from Erzurum, Lutfi Dogan, who was the only candidate during this round, received 49 votes and RPP senator from the Presidential Quota Group Muhsin Batur, who was not a candidate, received 121 votes. Various other members received 111 votes, 124 votes were blank and 3 votes were declared void. Since the 17th round yielded no results, the 18th round was held. However, the votes were not counted because there was no quorum. The Grand National Assembly will meet again at 1500 on 7 April to continue presidential voting.

Continued Interparty Contacts

[Text] Contacts continued today among officials of certain parties in connection with the election of the president. RPP Deputy General Secretary Altan Oymen met with National Salvation Party General Secretary Oguzhan Asilturk at the parliament today for talks. AKAJANS [MEDITERRANEAN NEWS AGENCY], ANKA [ANKARA NEWS AGENCY] and ANATOLIA report that the officials exchanged views on the subject of reaching results as soon as possible in the election of the president.

Replying to questions by journalists on the same subject, Justice Party National Assembly Group deputy leader Oguz Aygun said that serious candidates for the post of president would be known by Monday. Pointing out that all parties should adopt a stand by Monday on the election of the president as soon as possible, Aygun said: Holding contacts to date, the deputy leader of four parties have decided that the dandidates for the post of president should be duly elected by their parties. Today and tomorrow the Justice Party organization will continue to assess the opinions and preferences of its members on this issue. Meanwhile, our party leader Suleyman Demirel is continuing his contacts with Ecevit at the appropriate time.

Caglayangil Becomes Acting President

[Text] Senate President Ihsan Sabri Caglayangil has assumed duties as acting president. Caglayangil arrived at the presidential mansion in Cankaya at 1000. He was received and welcomed at the Cankaya mansion entrance by the general secretary of the President's Office, Umit Haluk Bayulken. Caglayangil then met with his close colleagues. After the meeting, Caglayangil assumed the office of acting president.

PRESIDENT KORUTURK BIDS FAREWELL TO OFFICIALS, PEOPLE

Demirel, Council of Ministers

TA041314 Ankara Domestic Service in Turkish 1000 GMT 4 Apr 80 TA

[Text] President Fahri Koruturk, whose term of office will end on 6 April, bid farewell to Prime Minister Suleyman Demirel and the other ministers. Koruturk arrived at the prime minister's office at 1100 and was received by Demirel on the steps of the building. Koruturk and Demirel later held a 1-hour meeting at the prime minister's office. In a statement before the meeting, Koruturk said: I came to hold my weekly meeting with the prime minister. This is a farewell visit as well. Following his meeting with Demirel, Koruturk bid farewell to the ministers as well.

In a speech during his farewell to the Council of Ministers, Koruturk said:

[Begin Koruturk recording] The law prevails in our country, which is governed in accordance with the free democratic parliamentary system. I will hand my duties over to my successor on 6 April. During my 7-year term, I followed the functioning of the state through my weekly meetings with the prime ministers in accordance with the law. There were times when it was necessary to hold meetings with the relevant minister or ministers and deal with the problems. I presided over the Council of Ministers during the term of certain governments. I exerted efforts to insure the prevelance of democratic laws in the country during my term of office. I now bid farewell to the members of the government, which I last appointed.

Turkey too is suffering from inflationary pressures and from terrorism and anarchy, which are among the crises currently facing the world. This is why you are fulfilling a very difficult task. Under these circumstances it is essential that the country's political parties agree on the lofty interests of the country and cooperate with each other. I wish you success in your work, and I thus bid farewell to the government today. [end recording]

In reply to Koruturk, Demirel said: [Begin Demirel recording] I would like to thank the honorable president on behalf of the Council of Ministers and myself as the prime ministers of the Turkish Republic. The president has concluded an extremely difficult task during Turkey's unstable years--during the years when the 1973 and 1977 elections failed to give a majority to one party. In Ataturk's Turkey, there is a tradition of handing over offices without arguments, in accordance with the Constitution and laws of the Turkish Republic. This constitutes a source of pride for Turkish democracy.

I am the prime minister, who worked the longest with the honorable president during this unstable period. We countered great problems together and we dealt with all the problems of the Turkish Republic during times of major decisions. I would like to express my gratitude to the president for the assistance he has given to us in our work and for his understanding in the efforts to insure that the executive organ better serves the country. The current government of the Turkish Republic has assumed an extremely difficult duty, and the president has accorded us all the support during our 4 and 1/2 months in office, while we struggled to successfully fulfill this duty. I would like to express my gratitude to him for this as well. I wish our honorable president future health and I thank him again for visiting the government [Council of Ministers] of the Turkish Republic. [end recording]

After the speeches, Demirel accompanied the president to his car. Koruturk will bid farewell to the chief of staff and armed forces during the afternoon.

Farewell to Armed Forces

TA041822 Ankara Domestic Service in Turkish 1600 GMT 4 Apr 80 TA

[Excerpt] President Fahri Koruturk, who will leave his office on 6 April, paid a farewell visit to Chief of the General Staff Gen Kenan Evren, as well as other armed forces commanders, the gendarme commander and the deputy chief of staff. President Koruturk, who paid similar visits to Prime Minister Suleyman Demirel and members of the Council of Ministers this morning, visited the Office of the Chief of Staff at 1700. Koruturk was given a military reception. Armed forces commanders as well as the gendarme commander and the deputy chief of staff were also present at the ceremony.

The meeting between the president and the chief of staff lasted half an hour. After the meeting President Koruturk bid farewell to Chief of Staff General Evren, Ground Forces Commander Gen Nurettin Ersin, Navy Commander Adm Bulent Ulusu, Air Force Commander Gen Tahsin Sahinkaya, Gendarme Commander Gen Sedat Celasun and Deputy Chief of Staff Gen Haydar Saltik.

Message to Nation

[Text] President Fahri Koruturk's term of office ends today. He will bid farewell to his staff at 1700 and will leave the Cankaya mansion with a traditional ceremony.

The president issued a farewell message. Here is the farewell message of the sixth president of the Turkish Republic, Fahri Koruturk, in his own voice:

[Begin recording] My dear citizens, the duties I have discharged with great honor as the president of Turkey expire today, 6 April 1980. During my term of office, Turkey was faced with economic and social problems as in the world and in our region, that took it through one of the most difficult and agitated periods of recent history. It has not yet fully emerged from this difficult period. Fortunately, despite all these problems our citizens' and constitutional institutions' belief in and loyalty to the parliamentary system based on human rights and freedom were proven again in the two general National Assembly elections and three Senate partial elections held during the past 7 years. Contrary to the expectations of certain--however small--domestic and foreign circles, democracy became increasingly more inalienable despite its short history in our country compared to its long history in the world.

Eight governments have been established in our country since the day I assumed office. The two that failed to receive a vote of confidence and the six that were endowed with the trust of the National Assembly provided valuable services to the country. Some of these governments were very short-lived. The two longest governments remained in power only about 2 years each. The fact that our governments did not stay in power long made it impossible for us to find a full solution for the problems facing us.

Today, a real and necessary solution is possible if our political cadres try to diagnose the present situation jointly--not separately, as if they will remain in power or in the opposition forever--if they can sacrifice certain things to achieve that; if they jointly find a common ground that will not mean giving up their world views, their political, social or economic views; and if they jointly try to protect the state and system. I believe that it will be easier to find this common ground with the development of intraparty democracy.

My dear citizens, despite the economic difficulties and especially anarchy and terrorism, with its natural resources, geographic location, human, scientific and technological potential, our Turkey, which had one of the highest economic growth rates in the world until recently, is as strong today as it was in the past. The whole issue centers on whether the political forces will unite in a difficult period and direct this strength.

My dear citizens, much criticism, negative and positive, was levelled against me during my 7 years in office. I am convinced that the best assessment will be made in time by history. While bidding farewell to my dear citizens today, the end of a period envisaged by our Constitution, I would like to state sincerely that I have full peace of mind about all the decisions I made according to my oath and my conscience during those long years. My oath was my guide in all my policies, attitudes and decisions.

My thanks to all those who worked with me during my term, to the representatives of all the constitutional institutions who helped me in every way they could in the successful discharge of my duties and, above all, to the millions of citizens at home and abroad and to my kinsmen in Cyprus who gave the greatest moral support. I extend my most sincere wishes for success to the president who will discharge this holy duty after me.

I would like to conclude by recalling the following words--which we should keep in mind all the time--by the founder of our republic and our leader Ataturk: Turks be proud, work and trust!

I wish you all health and happiness. [end recording]

Fahri Koruturk will be sworn into the Senate and become a life senator on Tuesday. In accordance with the Constitution, as of tomorrow, Senate President Ihsan Sabri Caglayangil will become acting president of the republic until a new president is elected.

JUSTICE PARTY BUILDING BOMBING DRAWS DEMIREL CONDEMNATION

[Text] A bomb was thrown at the Justice Party headquarters in Gaziantep this morning. The bomb was placed at the entrance of the building and the explosion caused great damage to the building, but no one was killed or injured. Prime Minister Suleyman Demirel sent a telegraph to the Justice Party Gaziantep Province leader and harshly condemned the incident.

SISMIK I LEAVES FOR MEDITERRANEAN IN SEARCH FOR OIL

[Text] The ship, "MTA Sismik I," formerly known as "Bora," left the port of Istanbul today to conduct oil explorations in the Mediterranean. Ship officials said that the explorations will begin in the Gulf of Iskenderun next Tuesday. The oil exploration ship will then proceed to Mersin to complete work in this region which began last year. The results of seismic research work this ship will conduct in this region for 3 months will be assessed at the MTA [Institute of Mining Research] computer center in Ankara.

"MTA Sismik I" began work 4 years ago after the "Bora," a rescue ship, was renovated by Turkish labor and technical elements and was equipped with the necessary equipment for oil research. This is the fourth time that the "MTA Sismik I" leaves for a research mission in Turkish territorial waters.

DELIVERY OF HELICOPTERS, SPARE PARTS TO IRAN BLOCKED

[By Roland Dallas]

[Text] Rome, April 8, REUTER--Italy has blocked the delivery to Iran of big Boeing helicopters and spare parts for Bell helicopters, produced in Italy under license, officials of the Giovanni Agusta Company said today. They added that they did not think delivery of the American-designed equipment would be approved while the crisis over the detention of hostages in the U.S. Embassy in Tehran continued.

Italy's action is a demonstration of strong opposition here to the detention of hostages and violation of diplomatic immunity by the Iranian authorities but has also resulted from strong U.S. pressure on the Rome government. Agusta officials in Milan said that they would normally deliver the 10-ton Boeing helicopters to Iran by flying them there but the Defense Ministry has not granted the company rights to overfly Italy.

Iran originally ordered 50 helicopters in a complicated deal involving the sale to Italy of Iran oil and renegotiated down to 34 after the fall of the former shah, while retaining an option to buy a remaining 16 later. About 15 helicopters were delivered before the suspension and the remainder are held up, the officials said. Delivery of the spare parts for the Bell helicopters was delayed because Agusta has not received written approval from government ministries to go ahead, the officials added.

Foreign Ministry officials however insisted that the ministry had approved delivery of the spare parts after being told by the Red Cross that they were needed for helicopters engaged in flood relief work in Iran. This provoked private U.S. warnings that Agusta's licenses and a potentially lucrative Italian plan to sell warships to Iraq using U.S.-made engines could be at stake if deliveries of military equipment to Iran went ahead during the crisis, Western diplomatic sources said.

PCI DELEGATION MEETING WITH INDIRA GANDHI DETAILED

[Giuliano Pajetta article: "What Indira Told Me"]

[Excerpt] Though she was alone with us and speaking easily and spontaneously, Indira Gandhi seemed very controlled in what she said. But her remarks did echo in our minds when we heard people telling us so many times during our week in New Delhi: "Remember that not once since 1950 has the United States been on India's side: It has always been on its enemies' side."

We steered the discussion onto the present crisis, Afghanistan, India's role and the nonalined movement. We could not fail to point out how in the past 2 months New Delhi has become the mecca for so many pilgrimages, by Giscard, Gromyko, the Briton Carrington, the American Clifford, the Yugoslav and Algerian foreign ministers, Bruno Kreisky and the Japanese Sonoda.

This great international activity and the equally vast activity carried out by the highly qualified Indian envoys sent to so many nearby and distant countries in recent weeks was not immediately reflected in Indira Gandhi's remarks. [paragraph continues]

Her very concerned fundamental verdict on the international situation, on which the prime minister seemed well informed, was not accompanied by any explicit proposal or reference to a proposal regarding how much can specifically be done or along which paths the Indian Government plans to move. She displayed a great amenability but also great caution, so as to avoid false moves in a situation which presents so many uncertainties and which, from India's vantage point, is determined by so many individual factors: relations with China, Pakistan, Bangladesh and other minor, unassertive neighboring states; the Iranian crisis and the crisis in the Islamic world (and there are about 80 million Muslims in India); special relations with the Soviet Union, which for almost 25 years has been India's main arms supplier, an important trade partner and always at its side in every international crisis that has affected it.

With regard to Afghanistan, she said very little more than we already know: In brief, the Afghan people do not want foreign occupation, but one must understand the Soviets' need to defend themselves, and create the conditions for their withdrawal.

While India does not seem to intend to take advantage of the international tension to bring about a final settlement of accounts with Pakistan or to assert its supremacy over the minor neighboring states, it does seem very aware of its interests and needs. It believes it can already detect a certain diminution of tension and its policy seems aimed, on the one hand, at occupying a position of mediation in the conflict between the superpowers and, on the other, at a solution transcending merely the Afghan problem.

In her conversation with us, Indira Gandhi made a very reserved evaluation of the nonalined movement's present situation and thus its possibilities. According to her, it has been extended too far, to the extent of including--not on India's initiative, she was keen to point out--too many countries which cannot always be considered truly nonalined. She reminded us of the difficulties which emerged in Havana and subsequently. Without issuing a pessimistic verdict, she did not nevertheless seem to foresee any possibility of joint initiatives, at least for the time being.

NAPOLITANO JUSTIFIES PCI QUEST FOR EUROPEAN LEFT UNITY

LD080755 Milan L'UNITA in Italian 1 Apr 80 pp 1, 18 LD

[PCI Secretariat member Giorgio Napolitano article: "Europe and Peace Require More United Left"]

[Text] The interest prompted both in Italy and elsewhere by Enrico Berlinguer's meetings with Willy Brandt and Francois Mitterrand and by our other contacts with European socialist and social democratic parties is consistent with the real importance of these initiatives, though there have been some exaggerations for ulterior motives and some polemics, in one direction or another. It is therefore worth going back over the significance of meetings which are--as far as the PCI is concerned--situated within a much broader context of visits and missions to various parts of the world, to various geographical and political areas (as merged from Gian Carlo Pajetta's report to the recent Central Committee meeting), but which are linked to a specific and particularly important aspect of our international commitment--the quest for greater understanding and agreement among the West European leftwing forces.

Of course we have considered such a quest essential and have striven to advance it for years. But recently we have become even more aware of its necessity--first in connection with the situation created by the direct election of the European Parliament and also in connection with the grave crisis which has emerged in the process of international detente.

Against the Right

The prospect of increasing the European Parliament's political weight and role as a result of its first direct election itself encouraged us to consider in more immediate terms the issue of relations among the leftwing forces represented in Strasbourg, which could--we hoped--together total 50 percent of the assembly. But this issue became a pressing one following the negative result in the 10 June European elections when we were therefore faced with the danger of a rightwing majority--or one dominated by the right--in the new Parliament. An effort at a rapprochement between communists and socialists, aimed at defining points of agreement at least on the most important points of general policy and also at building agreements with other groups which can be made to stand apart from the right, became an essential condition for combating the conservative offensive and pressure within the EC and its member countries.

An equally strong and evident thrust was imparted to the quest for convergences among the European leftwing forces by the aggravation of the international situation. People became directly aware--above all following the Soviet intervention in Afghanistan--of the danger of a return, even in Europe, to the climate of cold war, of rigid opposition between the two blocs and of "monolithic" uniformity within each of them--the danger not only of a stagnation, but of an elimination of the fruits of detente. It is against this danger that it was--and still is--necessary to react, by making use of the fact that the danger has been realized by the socialist and social democratic forces as well and by working, therefore, to bring about a contribution from Western Europe--from within both the EEC and the Atlantic alliance and NATO, not to mention countries not included in these groups--to the defense and reinvigoration of the detailed development of negotiations for arms control and reduction, to a positive change in East-West and North-South relations, instead of a passive alinement with the U.S. administration's stances and pressures if not indeed an extremist-type encouragement of policies of reprisal and rupture and of the arms race.

Great Turmoil

The difference which has emerged in this context between the attitudes of governments such as the Conservative British Government, on the one hand, and the Social Democratic-liberal German Government, on the other, and among the attitudes of various parties in the individual countries--between Strauss and Schmidt, to give the most symbolic example--has been such that it is incomprehensible how it can be denied by anyone who feels the need to tackle the offensive of the forces openly advocating a return to cold war and a tough military "confrontation" between the blocs. Of course, we are not forgetting that when the decision was taken to produce and deploy the new NATO missiles in Europe, the positions of parties such as ours and the positions of not only the Italian Socialist Party, but also other socialist and social democratic parties, proved divergent. Nevertheless, in that same debate on the "Euromissiles" there emerged from the ranks of the Socialist International and from within individual parties a great turmoil which brought about differing positions at the various stages of the debate and from country to country. And it is a fact that, at the 5-6 February Vienna conference of Socialist International leaders, balanced verdicts and--if one looks at the concluding points of the final document--stances clearly inspired by the demands of dialog, negotiation (for arms reduction and for "halting the planned deployment of new nuclear weapons in Europe") and the reinvigoration of detente prevailed.

It is in this light, therefore, that one must view the recent meetings of Berlinguer and other representatives of our party with Brandt, Mitterrand and leaders of various socialist and social democratic partes, including the British Labor Party.

[paragraph continues]

There is nothing more petty than the attempt to interpret these initiatives as domestic political expedients, as "concessions"--it is not clear to whom or to what stances--and cunning maneuvers aimed at opening the doors of government to the PCI. Meanwhile, of course, we reassert our belief that the participation of the Communists--and the left as a whole--in the country's government is consistent with the serious need to consolidate and develop democracy and to remedy and regenerate society and the state and that it must therefore be pursued tenaciously even after the Christian Democratic Party Congress rejected the hypothesis of an emergency government. But we stress that in view of this objective we will do no more than pursue, persistently and boldly and in all fields, the line in which we believe and will do nothing that might imply a renunciation or a dilution for ulterior motives--in any direction--of our beliefs. And as for our foreign policy, in its individual European dimension and all its aspects it is dictated by much more profound concerns--with the fate of peace, above all--and is part of a much broader outlook.

This outlook is certainly not divorced from the shared major options which in recent years have been expressed by the PCI, PCF, PCE and the communist parties of other West European and industrialized countries and which have been summed up in the term "Eurocommunism." One characteristic and fundamental element in the joint declarations signed by these parties has been the commitment to guarantee and develop "all personal and collective freedoms, whether the result of the major democratic-bourgeois revolutions or the result of this century's major popular struggles," that is, a view of the relationship between democracy and socialism, the struggle for socialism and socialist building which marks a clearly critical differentiation with respect to experiences and situations such as the Soviet Union's. In reaching these important definitions, the Eurocommunist parties did not follow in the footsteps of the traditional theses of the socialist and social democratic parties but, partly on the basis of serious historical reflection and of courageously innovative formulations, applied the highest standard of consistency to their effort to create a real synthesis between aspirations for political and civil freedom and aspirations for the effective transformation of the economy, society and the state in a socialist direction. There can be no doubt that this has created new opportunities for understanding with socialist and social democratic forces (and even with other democratic and progressive forces).

We have never deluded ourselves that it would be easy to reach significant and increasingly broad convergences with the parties of the Socialist International. Of course this also depends partly on those parties' capacity for carrying out a critical reflection on their historical experiences and for regenerating their ideas and policies, as objectively demanded by the crisis in capitalist development and, with it, the crisis of democratic life in the West European countries, their increasing "ungovernability." It would be absurd, however, to deny that an upheaval and progress in this direction are taking place. Unless we are aware of, and appreciate the positive new trends as they emerge among the socialist and social democratic forces and the opportunities for greater understanding on the left which stem from them, and if indeed we regress to the plane of the harshest and darkest years of the international communist movement, when every distinction between socialist parties' stances and those of rightwing and reactionary forces was dismissed as "partisan interplay," it is futile to maintain that we are still pursuing leftwing unity.

This unity must be pursued specifically, with an open mind and tenaciously,through the inevitable ups and downs, tensions, moments of convergence and moments of friction which can occur, particularly on the immediate political plane; it must be pursued both in individual countries and on a European scale. [paragraph continues]

We certainly do not claim--and Comrade Marchais must have no doubts in this regard--that Eurocommunism implies adopting " a single model of socialism" or the renunciation by each working class and each people of the right to choose its own path and to decide on the rate of its own advance to socialism to "delegate" decisions to some "supranational supreme assembly." Nor have we ever presumed to create "an organized center," or a Eurocommunist "leadership center" and we have never lacked a clear awareness of the enduring differences and divergences among the "Eurocommunist" parties. But neither must one obscure the importance of the factors of interdependence which have been emerging in every field, in the development of the West European--and first and foremost EEC--societies, which demand diverse forms of interconnection, and of exchanging ideas and experiences among the forces of the left and the working class of all these countries. Nor must one obscure the value of major key idea such as the possibility of opening up a new historical phase in Western Europe, of changes in the ruling classes, innovations in government policies and structural changes in a socialist direction.

This opportunity is no different from the one--as we said in the theses for our 15th Congress--"of surmounting the historical divergences and unitarily rebuilding the West European workers movement." There really is no reason to abandon Eurocommunism for what some people have hastened to dub "the Euroleft"; nor, for that matter, is it possible to maintain that the dividing lines between the desire for real change and the desire for conservatism and for subordinate cooperation with the right are defined by the stances on cooperation extending the EC or on EC agricultural policy, in which context divisions (and convergences) sometimes assume an essentially national and even nationalist character. Instead, proceeding from the major Eurocommunist options, we must undertake a broad unitary guest and thoroughly commit ourselves to the long and difficult path of unity among all the leftwing and progressive forces--the only path that can help surmount the limitations of mere denunciation and propaganda for future defensive struggles and for an opposition which, though vigorous and enriched by proposals [riccamente propositiva], lacks any blueprint. This is the only path which can really lead to the establishment of the working class' leading role in this part of the world.

GUNMEN KNEECAP HEAD OF SOUTHERN MENTAL ASYLUM

AU050902 Rome ANSA in English 0855 GMT 5 Apr 80 AU

[Text] Naples, April 5 (ANSA)--The head of the Sant-Eframo correctional mental asylum, Dr Domenico Longobardi, was shot and injured in the legs last night by an unidentified assailant in his home town of Sant'Antonio Abate. Investigators considered the assault an act of personal revenge rather than a political move.

The 47-year old Longobardi was rushed to the hospital where doctors refrained from disclosing his condition. The gunman made his getaway in an awaiting car with an accomplice at the wheel.

PLO OFFICIAL DELIVERS 'ARAFAT MESSAGE TO EANES

LD061258 Lisbon in Portuguese to Europe 0915 GMT 6 Apr 80 LD

[Text] 'Abdallah Dajjani, head of the PLO delegation in Madrid, is currently in Lisbon where he arrived last Thursday carrying a message from Yasir 'Arafat to President Ramalho Eanes of Portugal. The content of the message, however, has not been disclosed. According to the PORTUGUESE NEWS AGENCY, ANOP, 'Abdallah Dajjani was received last Saturday by a high-ranking official of the Foreign Ministry and also had contacts with prominent figures of the Social Democratic Party, the PSD.

Meanwhile, reliable sources have indicated to ANOP that the PLO representative in Madrid wishes to be received by Portuguese Prime Minister Sa Carneiro, currently away from Lisbon on a brief holiday in Madeira.

Since Yasir 'Arafat's visit to Portugal last November, this is the second time that a leading PLO member has come to Lisbon. According to ANOP his visit has a very specific purpose.

PCF'S MARCHAIS ARRIVES, COMMENTS ON CP 'GATHERING'

LD071456 Lisbon Domestic Service in Portuguese 1200 GMT 7 Apr 80 LD

[Text] After a technical stopover in Congo-Brazzaville PCF Secretary General Georges Marchais arrived in Lisbon from Maputo late last night.

Replying to reporters' questions at the airport, Marchais began by referring to the results of the elections in Zimbabwe Rhodesia, describing Mugabe's victory as an event of marked significance, particularly for southern Africa.

In Maputo, he said, he was informed of the new measures being implemented at government and party level and stressed that an agreement has been established which, in his opinion, will strengthen the already existing solidarity.

After stating that it is still too early to say whether he will be running as presidential candidate in the coming elections, the PCF leader described the talks he is to have with Alvaro Cunhal as coming within the category of the customary contacts maintained between two friendly parties.

Finally, Marchais referred to the announced meeting of European communist parties which he described as being more in the nature of a gathering than of a conference. When our reporter Pedro Cid asked him about the likely absence of the Spanish, Italian and Yugoslav parties, Marchais replied:

[Begin Marchais recording in French with superimposed Portuguese translation] It will indeed be an important gathering, but it will not be a conference in the true meaning of the term. It should, in effect, be regarded as a gathering. [passage indistinct]

It will be nothing like the 1969 conference of communist parties for example, nor the Berlin conference. That is not the idea. The idea is to define a joint attitude of the communist parties in favor of goals like peace and disarmament, as I have just said.

Of course, each party is a free agent. Those who do not wish to participate will not participate. Unlike the social democratic parties, we do not have a communist international. It will be a free meeting; attendance is not compulsory. Obviously I have my specific views on the matter, but these are strictly personal views. [end recording]

Marchais-Cunhal Meeting

LD071457 Lisbon in Portuguese to Europe 1230 GMT 7 Apr 80 LD

[Text] The secretaries general of the Portuguese and French communist parties, Alvaro Cunhal and Georges Marchais, had a meeting this morning at the PCP headquarters. George Marchais is in Lisbon en route from Maputo to Paris. He will be leaving this afternoon.

CULTURAL AGREEMENT WITH INDIA SIGNED IN LISBON

LD071458 Lisbon Domestic Service in Portuguese 1200 GMT 7 Apr 80 LD

[Excerpts] Our colleague Abreu Alves has just arrived from the Foreign Ministry, where a cultural agreement has been signed between Portugal and India. Here is his report:

[Begin Alves recording] The agreement was signed for the Portuguese side by the deputy prime minister and minister of foreign affairs, Prof Freitas do Amaral, and for the Indian side by Minister of Education and Culture Shankaranand.

Prof Freitas do Amaral told me that the agreement will enhance the still very visible Portuguese presence in India and will further our cooperation with the Indian authorities in the preservation of the churches, monuments and other signs of the Portuguese presence in that part of the world.

The agreement also provides for the creation in Goa of a Portuguese cultural institute, a development which Prof Freitas do Amaral stressed is of the utmost importance, historically as well as culturally. Freitas do Amaral said that the agreement envisages various types of cultural cooperation and exchanges between the two countries. [end recording]

BRIEFS

NEW ANOP WIRE SERVICE--The PORTUGUESE NEWS AGENCY, ANOP, has started a new wire service to the Portuguese communities in the United States and Canada, in cooperation with the Emigration Institute. Consisting of two daily news bulletins, the new wire service is transmitted directly to Portuguese-language mass media in 12 cities in the United States and Canada. The new service is designed to provide the Portuguese communities in those countries with coverage of major national events and news of special interest to the Portuguese residing abroad. COMPANY DENIES U.S. SANCTIONS TO DELAY USSR DELIVERIES

LD041648 Helsinki in English to Europe and North Africa 0930 GMT 4 Apr 80 LD

[Text] The Finnish Rauma-Repola concern had denied reports that the economic sanctions against the Soviet Union, introduced by President Carter, would delay the deliveries of oil drilling vessels ordered from Rauma-Repola by the Soviet Union.

According to the deputy managing director of Rauma-Repola, Mr Vaino Lassila, the company has had to transfer some orders from U.S. subcontractors to Europe because of the U.S. sanctions. This has caused some problems and economic losses, but they do not affect the delivery schedule.

The company is to deliver three oil-drilling vessels to the Soviet Union. Their combined value is nearly 1 billion markka, or approximately $250 million.

BROADCASTING COMPANY GIVES VIEWS ON NORDSAT PROJECT

LD041440 Helsinki in English to Europe and North Africa 0930 GMT 4 Apr 80 LD

[Text] The Finnish Broadcasting Company [FBC] has called for securing national program production before realizing the Nordic radio and TV satellite project, the NORDSAT. The board of the Finnish Broadcasting Company is currently finalizing its statement on the satellite plan. In the company's view the state should guarantee that the additional costs of the satellite plan would not weaken national broadcasting operations. The Finnish Broadcasting Company believes that the satellite project should be financed by other means than audience license fees.

The cultural aims of the satellite project would be attained at the moment, according to the Finnish Broadcasting Company, at a much lower cost if program exchange and joint production would be made more efficient. The Finnish Broadcasting Company also wants further clarifications on the extent of translation operations and advertising. The Finnish language is completely different from the rest of the Nordic languages, and translations are necessary for the bulk of the Finnish audience viewing programs from the other Nordic nations.

Finland is the only Nordic country with a commercial television unit. In Finland a commercial TV company buys air time from the Finnish Broadcasting Company on both channels.

Of the other Nordic broadcasting organizations the Swedish Broadcasting Corporation and the Danish Broadcasting Corporation have given rather negative statements about the NORDSAT project. Meanwhile, the Norwegian broadcasting organization has taken a positive attitude toward the plan. According to an FBC spokesman, the positive attitude of the Norwegians could be attributed to the fact that Norway would not have to build a second channel if NORDSAT would be implemented.

In all, 400 Nordic organizations of different sorts will be giving their statements on the NORDSAT plan. The Nordic Council is expected to take a stand on the matter in the spring of 1981.

BAYRAK RADIO: CAGATAY, KLIRIDHIS TO MEET IN APRIL IN NICOSIA

TA081049 [Clandestine] Bayrak Radio in Turkish to Cyprus 1030 GMT 8 Apr 80 TA

[Text] National Unity Party [NUP] leader and Prime Minister Mustafa Cagatay will hold his second meeting with the leader of the Greek Cypriot Democratic Rally, Kliridhis, on Friday. The meeting will be held at the Democratic Rally headquarters in the Greek Cypriot sector of Lefkosa [Nicosia] at 1000 on Friday. The meeting will be held without an agenda and a joint statement will be issued after the meeting. The two party leaders held their first meeting in the Turkish Cypriot sector of Lefkosa on Friday, 28 March.

KHARAVYI URGES RAPPROCHEMENT, MUTUAL TRUST WITH TURKISH CYPRIOTS

NC051424 Nicosia KHARAVYI in Greek 5 Apr 80 p 3 NC

[From the "Views and Comment" column: "A Better Available Method"]

[Excerpt] We agree that a just and permanent solution to the Cyprus problem can only be found with peaceful negotiations. Only the representatives of the two communities, under the auspices and direction of the secretary general, can conclude an acceptable agreement on the domestic aspect. The international side of the problem will need an international procedure within the UN framework.

In the future, the government and people must adopt a positive stand toward the secretary general's efforts. Where he tries to help us, we must also help him in finding a concrete and effective procedure. From now on, by insisting that the intercommunal talks be held "in a substantive, effective and constructive way"--as provided in the General Assembly's 20 November 1979 resolution--we must intensify our efforts for reapprochement and the restoration of a climate of mutual trust. This last duty is perhaps the most effective one for achieving the favorable developments that we have the right to expect in the future.

TA NEA UNSATISFIED WITH WALDHEIM REPORT

NC051425 Nicosia TA NEA in Greek 5 Apr 80 p 5 NC

[From the "Stands" column: "Waldheim's Report"]

[Text] Waldheim's report is a dry text with a dry listing of events from which the only thing that emerges is the Cyprus Government's suspicion that the rejection of the Turkish demand for bizonality is now less categorical. Of course the report does not satisfy us. Listing events is not enough. Mr Waldheim should also have analyzed the events. Moreover, he should also have talked about the issue of the implementation of the UN resolutions.

With legal pretexts and technical excuses Mr Waldheim evades the resolutions and confines himself to the issue of the talks. He neutrally and flatly mentions the refusal of the Turkish side to hold talks even "under the shadow" of Resolution 34/30 that was adopted by the General Assembly last November. The secretary general does not get angry. He is satisfied with the chicanery used by the Turks for the resumption of the talks based on the mission of good offices that the Security Council had entrusted to him based on the 19 May agreement.

Finally, however, Mr Waldheim must tell us: What does the General Assembly mean to him? And how much does he respect its resolutions?

CAGLAYANGIL MAKES STATEMENT BEFORE ASSUMING OFFICE

TA071148 Ankara Domestic Service in Turkish 1000 GMT 7 Apr 80 TA

[Excerpt] In a statement after meeting with his close colleagues at the Cankaya Presidential Mansion today, acting President and Senate President Ihsan Sabri Caglayangil said: [begin Caglayangil recording] The term of office of honorable Koruturk, who fulfilled the duty of president of the Turkish Republic honorably and successfully for 7 years, ended at 2400 last night. The Turkish Republic will live forever. A void in the state and its presidency is out of the question. Our Constitution stipulates that the Senate president fills the office of the presidency when this office is vacated for any reason. Accordingly, I am beginning to fulfill the duty which falls upon me. [end recording]

Caglayangil assumed the office of acting president after this statement.

VOTING AGAIN FAILS; NAP, NSP TO SUPPORT JP NOMINEE

19th Voting Round

TA071514 Ankara Domestic Service in Turkish 1500 GMT 7 Apr 80 TA

[Text] The 19th round of voting to elect a president held by the joint session of the Senate and National Assembly today yielded no results. The National Salvation Party [NSP] senator from Erzurum, Lutfi Dogan, was the only candidate of the 409 legislators who participated in the voting; 146 voted for Dogan. RPP Senator from the Presidential Quota Group Muhsin Batur, who was not a candidate, received 125 votes; 181 ballots were blank; 51 votes were cast for various other members; and 2 votes were declared void. Since no result was reached in the 19th round of voting, the 20th round was being held when this news bulletin was being prepared.

Meanwhile, an NSP proposal was adopted according to which the Senate and the National Assembly will meet jointly from 1500 until 2400 daily beginning tomorrow until a president is elected.

Political Party Discussions

TA071740 Ankara Domestic Service in Turkish 1600 GMT 7 Apr 80 TA

[Text] The 19th and the 20th rounds of voting to elect a president held by the joint session of the Senate and National Assembly today yielded no results. The Senate and the National Assembly decided to meet continuously from 1500 to 2400 daily beginning tomorrow until a president is elected. The proposal in connection with this decision was submitted by the National Salvation Party [NSP] Group. The Senate and Assembly will meet again jointly at 1400 tomorrow and the Senate will meet at 1500 tomorrow. Fahri Koruturk, whose term of office as the president of Turkey ended yesterday, will be sworn in as life senator tomorrow.

The political parties represented in the parliament and the Senate National Unity and Presidential Quota Groups met this morning to discuss the presidential election issue. NSP Assembly Group Deputy Chairman Hasan Aksay, who chaired the meeting, said that the activities which were initiated to speed up the elections were continuing in a positive manner but that no result has yet been achieved.

The Justice Party General Administrative Council met under the leadership of Suleyman Demirel at 1400 and discussed the presidential election issue. Justice Party Deputy Leader Yigit Koker later held a news conference and said that Demirel had briefed the Administrative Council on his contacts with the leaders of the NSP and the Nationalist Action Party [NAP]

Koker said: The Administrative Council has very favorably received the NSP and the NAP promises to vote for a candidate nominated by the Justice Party. Koker added that the Administrative Council decided to formulate various plans for solving the problem within a few days and to hold a second Administrative Council meeting to discuss the issue in the light of these plans. Noting that the issue of whom to nominate was not discussed at the meeting, Koker said that the NAP and the NSP had not submitted any names to the Justice Party. He said: Everything will be clarified within a few days. The issue is on the right path.

COMMERCE MINISTRY OFFICIAL OZTURKMEN ATTACKED IN ANKARA

[Text] Commerce Ministry Deputy Under Secretary Bulent Ozturkmen and Commerce Ministry driver Huseyin Gunaydin were seriously wounded in an armed attack in Ankara today. A TRT correspondent has learned that the attack occurred on Necati Bey Street around 1030 when two or three terrorists fired shots at the car. Ozturkmen and Gunaydin were seriously wounded. The car hit a wall and was damaged. The terrorists fled after the incident. Ozturkmen was taken to the Ankara Medical School Hospital and Gunaydin was taken to the Hacattepe Hospital for treatment.

U.S. SENATORS VISIT ANKARA TO DISCUSS RELATIONS, ISSUES

TA062016 Ankara Domestic Service in Turkish 2000 GMT 6 Apr 80 TA

[Text] Four U.S. senators have arrived in Ankara to hold discussions with government officials on Turkish-U.S. relations and international problems. The U.S. senators will be received by Prime Minister Suleyman Demirel tomorrow. They will also meet with the acting Senate president and the acting chairman of the Senate Foreign Relations Committee. The senators will also meet with RPP leader Bulent Ecevit. The senators will leave Turkey on 8 April.

Demirel on Greece-NATO

[Text] The members of the U.S. Senate Foreign Relations Committee, who arrived in Ankara yesterday to hold talks on Turkish-U.S. relations and international problems, began their discussions today.

The four senators--members of the European subcommittee of the U.S. Senate Foreign Relations Committee--were received by Prime Minister Suleyman Demirel at 1000. U.S. Ambassador to Ankara James Spain also attended the meeting, which was held at the prime minister's office.

In a statement to journalists after the meeting, Demirel said the situation in the region, Turkish-U.S. relations and Turkey's military and economic needs were discussed during the meeting with the U.S. senators. Pointing out that Turkish-U.S. relations are based on mutual interests, Demirel said a shadow should not be cast over these relations. Demirel continued: We are determined to defend our own country in this region of the world under any condition, and we do this without depending on anyone. At the same time, we are a member of an alliance. Our membership in the alliance aims to further strengthen Turkey's defense.

Demirel also noted that Turkey's goal is to become a strong member of the democratic world and that it does not wish to be a burden on anyone. Noting that Turkey is not a sick country but that it has certain problems, Demirel said: Turkey is struggling with all its might to overcome these problems and it will succeed in doing so.

Demirel pointed out that Turkey has shown the world that it wants to continue its good relations with its neighbors and that Turkey has created no problem. Demirel continued: We want the continuation of peace. We want to solve our conflicts with our neighbors cool-headedly, in accordance with commonsense, peacefully, and through negotiations. This is the essence of Turkey's foreign policy. Demirel told reporters that during the meeting the U.S. senators asked for his views regarding Greece's return to NATO's military flank. Pointing out that Turkey is in favor of Greece's return to NATO's military flank, Demirel said: If NATO is necessary, then a strong NATO rather than a weak NATO is necessary. If there is a need for NATO, then a strongly unified NATO rather than a NATO with a damaged unity is needed. Recalling that Greece left the military flank of NATO of its own free will, Demirel said: We are not opposed to its return to NATO. However, new situations have arisen in the past 6 or 7 years. It is not easy to reach a solution without taking these situations into account.

The U.S. senators visited Senate Deputy President Mehmet Unaldi at 1130. They also met the members of the Senate Foreign Relations Committee at 1200. The U.S. senators will leave Ankara this evening.

Ecevit's Comments

TA071806 Ankara Domestic Service in Turkish 1400 GMT 7 Apr 80 TA

[Excerpt] The members of the U.S. Senate Foreign Relations Committee later called on RPP leader Bulent Ecevit. In a statement after the meeting, the leader of the main opposition party said the following: [Begin Ecevit recording] We held a beneficial and friendly meeting with the worthy members of the U.S. Senate. They are closely interested in the problems of our region. They wanted to know our views on the recent developments in our region. I expressed our views and concerns on the issue. Of course, they are also interested in the problems between Turkey and Greece. I pointed out again, as I always do, that, given the opportunity, the two countries are capable of solving their problems but, if others show great interest in these problems, solving them becomes even more difficult. They asked about our views regarding aid to Turkey. I said that, irrespective of the government in power, Turkey's friends should extend and increase aid to Turkey. I reiterated that the discussions concerning the economic measures being taken in Turkey are Turkey's domestic issues. It was a very friendly and beneficial meeting. [end recording]

Conclusion of Senators' Meetings

[Excerpts] The four U.S. Senators who are in Ankara to hold contacts on Turkish-U.S. relations and international problems have completed their meetings. The U.S. delegation, composed of U.S. Senate Foreign Relations Committee members Howard Baker, Joseph Biden, Edward Zorinsky and Thad Cochran, will leave Turkey this evening.

Committee Chairman and Justice Party Senator from Balikesir Sitki Gurcali said that Turkey abides by all international agreements including those connected with NATO and Cyprus. Noting that Turkey had not created the various disputes in the past between the two countries and within the alliance, Gurcali added that Turkey tries to maintain good relations with its neighbors, taking into consideration its geographic position, while at the same time fulfilling its responsibilities within the alliance.

Senator Baker said that the United States felt the need to learn the views of Turkey, a member of NATO, and to hear its advice in the face of an increasing Soviet threat and the recent developments in Persian Gulf countries.

FOREIGN MINISTER ISSUES STATEMENT ON NATO ANNIVERSARY

TA041506 Ankara Domestic Service in Turkish 1000 GMT 4 Apr 80 TA

[Excerpt] The 31st anniversary of NATO is being celebrated today. In a statement issued on the occasion of the anniversary, Foreign Minister Hayrettin Erkmen noted that, through its deterrent role, NATO is effective in maintaining peace and stability in the world as well as in its own region. Pointing out that the governments of the Turkish Republic have always implemented a peaceful and conciliatory foreign policy in accordance with Ataturk's policy of peace at home and peace in the world, Erkmen said: The unaltered aim of our state is to secure economic development in peace and raise the living standards of our people in the economic, social and cultural fields. Erkmen noted that, within the framework of this unaltered aim, Turkey follows a policy which balances efforts to maintain its independence with being a member of NATO.

FOREIGN MINISTER LEAVES FOR COUNCIL OF EUROPE MEETING

[Text] Foreign Minister Hayrettin Erkmen left for Portugal today to attend the 66th round of meetings of the Council of Europe Ministerial Committee to be held in Lisbon on 10 April. In a statement at Ankara's Esenboga Airport, Erkmen said that the work on the implementation of the final (?decisions) of the European Security and Cooperation Conference is on the agenda of the ministerial committee. Erkmen noted that the principles of a balanced economic development and cooperation in Europe will also be reviewed during the meeting. Erkmen added that he will hold bilateral meetings with the foreign ministers from various countries who will arrive in Lisbon for the Council of Europe meeting.

TCP SENDS GREETINGS TO SWEDISH WORKERS' COMMUNIST PARTY CONGRESS

TA050835 (Clandestine) Voice of Turkish Communist Party in Turkish to Europe and Turkey 0600 GMT 5 Apr 80 TA

[Turkish Communist Party Central Committee Secretary General Bilen's message to 26th Congress of the Swedish Workers' Communist Party]

[Text] To the 26th Congress of the Swedish Workers' Communist Party [APK]:

Dear comrades, the Turkish Communist Party [TCP] Central Committee extends its revolutionary struggle greetings to the 26th congress of the brotherly APK.. The APK is waging a struggle for a democratic alternative to emerge from the crisis against imperialism's efforts to create tension in the international situation.

In order to achieve this the APK is trying to unite the activities of all the progressive forces. It is trying to insure that wages are raised, that the standard of living of the people is protected and improved against the monopolies' efforts to place the load of the crisis on the workers' shoulders. The APK is struggling for equal rights to the foreign workers in Sweden, including the Turkish workers. It is trying to insure that they establish a united struggle with the local workers against the exploitation of the monopolies. The TCP wants to develop its brotherly relations with the APK on the basis of the principles of Marxism-Leninism and proletarian internationalism. Our party is struggling for the unity of action of the working class and all the national and democratic forces against imperialism, the collaborationist and monopolist bourgeoisie and against the anti-people policies of the reactionary government and the militarist clique. Dear comrades, we wish you great success in the APK's 26th Congress and in your party's struggle for peace, democracy and socialism. Please accept our communist greetings.

[Signed] TCP Central Committee Secretary General Bilen. 4 April 1980.

BELGIAN COMMUNISTS ONLY TO JOIN APRIL FORUM AS 'OBSERVER'

LD051412 Belgrade TANJUG in English 1317 GMT 5 Apr 80 LD

[Text] Brussels, April 5 (TANJUG)--The Belgian Communist Party leadership "is not convinced that the meeting of communist parties in Paris in the present situation can make a real contribution to the struggle for peace in Europe" and for this reason intends to attend the meeting as an observer. The Belgian Communist Party decision, it has been announced, is the result of the party bureau's "initial analysis" of the invitation of the French Communist Party and the Polish United Workers' Party to participate in the meeting of European communist parties, to be held in Paris on April 28 and 29. The party bureau has also announced that the struggle for peace and disarmament in Europe, which is the main topic of the Paris conference, is being carried out "in various ways, depending on conditions in each country." The Belgian Communist Party leadership states that it will make the final decision "fully independently and on the basis of its own analysis of the general causes of the present deterioration of the international situation." The annoucement also underlines that the Beligan Communist Party's activity in the struggle for peace, the consolidation of detente and against the arms race is based on two principles: "cooperation with the forces of peace and progress of all trends and the refusal to be drawn into the mechanisms of bloc division."

MARCHAIS EXPLAINS PCF VIEW OF COMMUNIST CONFERENCE

[Text] Georges Marchais has returned from his visits to Madagascar and Mozambique. As soon as he left his aircraft last night at Roissy airport, he met journalists and criticized France's policy in Africa. Mr Marchais also spoke about the Paris conference at the end of the month which is to bring together the European communist parties for a discussion of detente and disarmament. The Italian and Spanish communist parties have already announced that they will not attend. Here is Georges Marchais at the microphone of our reporter, Jean-Noel Deleage:

[Begin recording] [Marchais] Taking into account the resurgence of the arms race which has resulted from Carter's policy, in particular with the installation of new missiles in Europe, we have thought it would be good for all European communist and workers parties together--indeed, all together--to present a joint initiative, a joint action for peace and disarmament. [Deleage] Mr Marchais, neither the Yugoslavs, the Italians nor the Spaniards--do you not fear that this conference, this meeting will appear as a meeting of communist parties close to Moscow? [sentence as heard]

[Marchais] Some want to introduce on the occasion of this meeting a division between the communist and workers parties, but the French Communist Party will not follow this path. [end recording]

CABINET TO DISCUSS U.S. MEASURES AGAINST IRAN

LD081804 Hamburg DPA in German 1739 GMT 8 Apr 80 LD

[Text] Bonn-- The Federal Government feels that the American views on sanctions against Iran should be discussed as soon as possible within the framework of EC consultations. A government spokesman said tonight in Bonn that a determining factor in this is the feeling that the effect of such sanctions depends to a large degree on how watertight they are.

Together with its EC partners the Federal Government today commenced without delay to examine the American views on these sanctions which Walter Stoessel, U.S. ambassador in Bonn, this morning conveyed to Federal Foreign Minister Hans-Dietrich Genscher, together with the announcement of the breaking off of relations with Iran. According to the spokesman, Genscher immediately telephoned Federal Chancellor Helmut Schmidt, who is still on his Easter vacation in Hamburg.

Under the chairmanship of Genscher the Cabinet will discuss the U.S. measures against Iran tomorrow. A meeting at state secretary level presided over by State Secretary Guenther van Well from the Foreign Ministry this afternoon discussed the latest consequences of the Tehran hostage affair.

CDU/CSU OFFICIAL VIEWS NEED FOR TALKS WITH U.S. ON IRAN

DW091103 Saarbruecken Saarlaendischer Rundfunk Network in German 0712 GMT 8 Apr 80 DW

[Excerpts from reporter Hahne interview with Dr Werner Marx, foreign policy spokesman of the CDU/CSU Bundestag faction; date, place not given--recorded]

[Text] [Question] President Carter has made a spectacular decision: a break in diplomatic relations between Washington and Tehran. Was that done more for American domestic political reasons?

[Answers] I think there are domestic and, naturally, foreign policy reasons. First of all, this is a grave conflict between both states. I was surprised--frankly speaking--that the American President did not react more sharply at an earlier time. I believe that the failure of the UN secretary general's mission was actually the historic moment when the United States should have expressed itself more clearly. It has now been forced [to act] due to the absolutely unnecessary hassle in which its poor hostages have been involved over the past days.

But naturlly the question must be asked: Which one of these measures will have a lasting effect? That pertains particularly to the Europeans who often use the word "solidarity". But one must consider clearly and calmly what solidarity really means.

[Question] Apropos solidarity: Can this also mean severance of diplomatic relations with Tehran for the FRG, for the EC states and for the states of the Western alliance?

[Answer] Being from the opposition I first would like to wait and see what our venerable government has to say about it and then define my stance. But it is my personal opinion that diplomatic relations should be severed only after very thorough consideration and only if there is no other way. Often it is necessary to utilize these relations, thin as they may be, to benefit a common cause. He who severs relations cannot hold talks any longer.

The U.S. mission has been destroyed. The papers have been scattered all over the area. The personnel have been imprisoned. The American envoy has been kept captive in the Foreign Ministry in Tehran for quite a while. For this reason alone hardly any basis existed for continuing to cultivate diplomatic relations.

The situation is different in the case of other states. So as you can see, I am very reserved, and I think that we, the Germans, but also the French, the British and others ought to get together as soon as possible--if summit conferences are necessary, then it is at such moments--and we should consider jointly with out American ally what each one can best achieve in their particular position at the present time to the benefit of all.

PRESS COMMENTS ON WHITE HOUSE MEASURES AGAINST IRAN

DW080954 Cologne Deutschlandfunk Network in German to East and West Germany 0406 GMT 8 Apr 80 DW

[press review on U.S. sanctions against Iran]

[Text] The KONSTANZ SUEDKURIER writes: President Carter's patience with the continual promises from Iran concerning the fate of the hostages now seems to be exhausted for good. The announcement on the expulsion of the Iranian diplomats from the United States allows this conclusion. But then the President did not have any other choice than the decision he has made. Having time and again in the past few days announced measures against Iran and having let himself be dissuaded from going through with them by hopeful sounding messages from Tehran, Carter had to put a stop to this cat-and-mouse game now. What remains to be hoped is that this will not be done at the expense of the safety of the U.S. hostages.

Freiburg's BADISCHE ZEITUNG stresses the following: Now the point has been reached where it is bound to be hard for President Carter to refrain from taking intensified measures against the Islamic Republic of Ayatollah Khomeyni. He is not only under pressure through the election campaign. The law which, while not at all reasonable is still effective indeed, namely, that a superpower must show its teeth if it wishes to be taken seriously by its challenger, gives him a great deal of trouble. It does Carter credit that he nevertheless wishes to retain a sense of perspective and refrains from risky military operations against Iran as well as from cutting off deliveries of foodstuffs and medicines. But from now on a development is threatening which has only little to do with the hostage affair anymore--an automatic process.

KOELNISCHE RUNDSCHAU writes: U.S. President Jimmy Carter has so far shown a great deal of understanding for Iran. He made fine differentiations between the people, the leftists and rightist occupiers of the U.S. Embassy, the Revolution Council, Ayatollah Khomeyni and President Bani-Sadr. Carter always tried to see the positive side of every one of the groups, but the Iranians did not show any gratitude. They deliberately ignored the domestic political difficulties of the U.S. President, acting like political greenhorns. Therefore, Carter cannot tolerate anything more after the recent unworthy game with the hostages. The U.S. primaries show in the meantime what the Americans think. Most of all the President must now realize that it is no longer possible to negotiate with Iran following the practice of the current policy.

BREMER NACHRICHTEN stresses: Ayatollah Khomeyni has spoken powerful words and his Tehran governor, President Bani-Sadr, again cannot do anything but obey. Whenever the fate of the U.S. hostages in the occupied embassy is involved, the limits of the elected leadership of the country become clear over and over again.

Tehran's promise that it will be up the parliament, which will assemble in the near future, to decide on the fate of the Americans, is becoming less and less credible. Who will guarantee that the old religious leader will not again wipe out the decision of parliament with one powerful word?

MANNHEIMER MORGEN makes the following consideration: In mid-December at the latest, after the unsuccessful Waldheim mission in Tehran, Carter should have embarked on a tougher policy vis-a-vis Khomeyni. If Carter continues to be unable to find a way to quickly bring Khomeyni to his knees, he can only expect that the United States will also fail to master crises in other fields as well. However, it was the duty of the West Europeans to point out the wrong priorities set by Washington and to have offered their help at a much earlier time.

Further Review

DW091048 Cologne Deutschlandfunk Network in German to East and West Germany 0505 GMT 9 Apr 80 DW

[Press Review on U.S.-Iranian Conflict]

[Excerpts] BERLINER MORGENPOST writes: The golden bridges President Carter built for the Tehran rulers have collapsed. Five months of patience, of a sense of proportions and self-denial have been in vain. Hopes have turned out to be vain. The bad old man Khomeyni is stronger than state President Bani-Sadr. The admissions of guilt uttered by Carter have paid off as little as the belief that the nonexistent Iranian Parliament could end the hostage drama. Now the United States has had to impose far-reaching sanctions against Tehran. Nobody can expect this to bring about a quick change in the Iranian-American conflict. There are steps that do not get you anywhere because they have been taken too late and too hesitantly.

GENERAL-ANZEIGER of Bonn maintains: Carter's punitive measures against Iran have not touched off enthusiasm anywhere. To starve out a fanatic people is a cure that does not promise quick success. Many say that Carter ought to face the music that he himself has written. There might have been something to that if the timing for such popular advice had not been the worst possible. Neither does it help very much to recall once more that German and American interests are not identical. A clear refusal by the West Europeans to assist the Americans in their struggle for the hostages would make a deep impression on the other side of the Atlantic, coming close to turning the NATO pact into a slip of paper. An answer to Carter must be considered--but not for too long.

HESSISCH-NIEDERSAECHSISCHE ALLGEMEINE of Kassel notes: Carter holds a two-edged sword. First, the trade embargo will be effective only if it is fully supported by America's allies. Second, whether it would really help the hostages is uncertain. At any rate, Khomeyni will use the pressure to confirm and mobilize his regime. Despite all understanding for the motives, Carter's policy will therefore meet with reservation in Europe. Not merely dependence on oil, but also doubts as to the success of global confrontation will probably move the governments of the European Community to be careful. The Americans can count on solidarity wherever no torpedoing of their sanctions is be involved. But they should not expect all their allies to apply the same methods against Tehran.

KOELNER STADT-ANZEIGER discusses the Moscow reaction: Nobody can be surprised anymore that in this situation the Soviets will not let any chance pass to find some fault with the United States.

Yet the statement with which TASS, the mouthpiece of the Moscow leadership, reacts to Carter's announcement of sanctions against Iran clearly exceeds the limits of what is customary. The paper then continues: Nobody will expect the Kremlin to muster understanding for Jimmy Carter. Still, this attack shows how little Moscow is interested at this time in avoiding at least those provocations which are superfluous because they do not even serve its own interests.

Freiburg's BADISCHE ZEITUNG spans a bridge between Iran and the Near East: Ever since the hostages were taken in Tehran Carter has been forced into impotence quite often. The Iranian crisis is now beginning to intensify dangerously. But perhaps the time bomb ticking here is the sharpest weapon in the hands of the President. It could help him convince As-Sadat and Begin that the Western world just cannot afford another Near East crisis in addition to the Middle East crisis.

Duesseldorf's RHEINISCHE POST voices the following conviction: It is the consequence of the drastic aggravation of the U.S.-Iranian crisis that President Carter can only half-heartedly play his role as mediator between Egypt and Israel. On the other hand, following the brutal act of terror against the Misgav Kibbutz, the Begin government's inclination to make the necessary concessions on the question concerning Palestinian autonomy will probably be less than ever. Meanwhile, the two events of Easter Monday ultimately just make it clear how urgent it is particularly now to continue the Middle East policy consistently.

DIE WELT COMMENTATOR: ALLIES MUST BACK U.S. SANCTIONS

DW091120 Bonn DIE WELT in German 9 Apr 80 p 6 DW

[W. Hertz-Eichenrode article: "Smudging the Persian Glass"]

[Text] You can charge President Carter with many things but not with this: that he has attached the prestige of the United States to the weapon of sanctions against Iran hastily and rashly. On the contrary, Carter even put up with the fact that U.S. prestige suffered harm because he went along with Khomeyni's humilating cat-and-mouse game for 156 days after the taking of the hostages in the Tehran embassy, time and again yielded to vague rays of hope, until even the cautious NEUE ZUERCHER ZEITUNG wrote of a performance by the theater of the absurd.

It is not up to us to chide Carter for a measure of patience which probably no other U.S. president before him could have mustered. Yet information from Washington to the effect that the allies had advised the President against an intensification of the sanctions even after Khomeyni's cynical utterance that there is "no longer any room for an honorable solution," sounds strange. Reportedly it was one of their arguments that Iran might ask the Soviet Union for help. Such an attitude by the allies would be strange for two reasons:

1. The warning that the Soviet Union might put in an appearance says in effect that the Atlantic leadership power must tolerate the impairment of the lives of U.S. citizens and a continuous humilation of their government above all because the West must not under any circumstances risk a direct intervention by Moscow in the Iran crisis. Have we reached that point already?

2. In any event, Carter chose a catalog of measures whose political purpose is public demonstration, because in objective terms the state of affairs which is just being affirmed was already in existence.

Nevertheless, President Carter has crossed the Rubicon between passive tolerance and active liberation of the hostages. If only for the election campaign at home, he can no longer depart from this course before he has reached his objective. Secretary of Defense Brown leaves the option of military measures open. What he probably means by that is a naval blockade, and this is probably what is meant when Washington hints that the United States might be forced to take steps of great risks in the event the allies do not join in the economic sanctions with the necessary emphasis. This means that this time the allies will not get away with verbal solidarity, as expressed in the letter-writing action for the release of the hostages, welcome though it must be.

To the Europeans and to Japan the situation presents itself this way: Since in Washington, too, hardly anybody assumes that the United States could accomplish the release of the hostages solely through economic pressure without the support of the allies, the United States would have to resort to military means--for instance the naval blockade--all the earlier the more half-heartedly the allies go along with the economic sanctions. Thus, the threshold of the risk of a Soviet intervention in the Iranian crisis would be crossed earlier, and the situation against which the Europeans warn President Carter from the viewpoint of their own interest would ensue all the earlier.

It goes without saying that Moscow has made preparations for such an event. The intelligence services report military installations on Afghan territory on the border with Iran. A propaganda wave against the "armed fist of Washington" at the entrance to the Persian Gulf is in full swing. The deployment of U.S. warships is being represented as a real threat to Iran. Chancellor Schmidt is cited as king's evidence for a legitimate right of the Soviet Union to buy oil in the Middle East. In this way parallel interests are suggested to the Europeans.

Not for one moment can the Europeans and Japan forget that this political war of entrenchment is intended for the very region which constitutes their lifeline. For this very reason they must not again succumb to the temptation to hesitate, to the transparent game of playing for time, as in the case of Afghanistan. For the Europeans as well as for Carter, the time for equivocation is over.

First: It is not enough to brand the occupation of the U.S. Embassy in Tehran and the taking of hostages as a violation of international law. This violation of law especially must not be tolerated because this barbarism in Tehran constitutes a precedent as to whether the methods of terror introduced by 'Arafat's PLO will prevail as a sort of ersatz war or not. What has happened to the United States in Tehran may happen to any other civilized country anywhere in this world--the FRG already has relevant experience with its embassy in Stockholm.

Second: Especially because President Carter showed nearly boundless patience in the hostage affair the allies cannot leave him all to himself now. Suppose he failed to wrap up the hostage drama in the foreseeable future. Then the United States would be standing there a broken world power incapable of defending the lives of its citizens against a country like Iran. Then the Europeans would have lost their nuclear protective power as well. They would be exposed to any Soviet pressure--if not to worse things--on their own continent, and they would be incapable of insuring their vital interests in the Middle East.

PAPER URGES CAUTION IN IRAN, AFGHAN CRISES

DW081615 Frankfurt FRANKFURTER RUNDSCHAU in German 5 Apr 80 p 3 DW

[Hans-Herbert Gaebel editorial: "Spring of Discontent"]

[Text] After a winter of discontent the two world crises creep on into a spring which, unfortunately, does not promise to be any brighter; rather even more gloomy.

Iranian Revolution leader Khomeyni is not fighting against an enemy who is of this world, but against the devil personally. So the prospects of attaining an acceptable compromise are not particularly good. The sad farce over the transfer of the hostages from one detention to another is not a good omen in any event. Leaving all the rhetoric aside, the U.S. President stands there emptyhanded and is increasingly subjected to the pressure of public opinion in his country. The Iranian debacle, which already seemed cooled down, thus may well heat up again quickly.

Thereby the two geographically adjacent crises, which had been separated, would again undergo a fusion into a critical mass. Any U.S. action against Iran would be bound to affect Afghanistan.

But for this country, too, no reasonable solution is taking shape. The opposite is more probable at the moment. This spring the Soviets will probably try to cope with the "bandits," as they are calling the anti-Soviet guerrillas. Moscow must prevent from becoming obvious how much the resistance in Afghanistan is a national affair. In their view it was not they but they United States, Pakistan and others who intruded into the Asian mountain country.

The quarrel over Afghanistan, a conflict which the Soviets would like to restrict to the region, has meanwhile burdened the relationship of the two world powers--even before no longer the best--to a point where the pillars of detente implanted in the past 20 years threaten to break. The one considers the other a liar and a fraud. Both believe that the other power has premeditatedly deviated from the course of detente hitherto pursued and changed to a complete reverse course. It has already become less important whether this assessment will stand up to reality. The fact that the politically responsible people on both sides are obviously convinced of it has long gained its own weight: distrust, even fear, of additional crusades of conquest by the Soviets in the West or encirclement nightmares in Moscow, thoughts of prestige, rivalry raised to the status of a holy duty. More and more both sides are in a position to push each other into something.

How this proliferates is shown, for example, by threats against the Federal Government that are to be heard more frequently. Moscow commentators are charging the Federal Government with doing nearly the opposite now after a period in which it had kept somewhat aloof from the "adventurous course of the Carter government toward the return to cold war." This is the usual attempt to separate the Federal Republic, which is decisive for the European course in the conflict, from the United States; presumably no more than this for the time being. As long as the GDR, with the big brother's permission, is allowed to be as friendly toward the Federal Republic as it is at the moment, nothing fundamental has changed at this point. It is only that here, too, this propaganda can soon get out of control and force its inventors into a confrontation which they originally had not wanted at all.

Similarly, this applies to those Western advisers who demand that the Soviets pay a painful price for Afghanistan, but who cannot propose more than needle pricks and an accelerated arms race. From the Western viewpoint it is indeed necessary to make it perfectly clear to the Soviets that they themselves will do their part if East and West wage cold war again. But it seems as though even this, too, is already the discussion of yesterday.

In the next few months it will probably much rather be necessary, since nobody wants the hot clash anyway, to cushion the collision in such a way that the big bang will not occur. [paragraph continues]

But then: two crises interlocking in a fatal way; an election campaign in the United States; an erratic U.S. Government; the transition period in the Soviet Union from Brezhnev to his successors, a period of dangerous insecurity for a system like the Soviet system; the predictable failures in the efforts toward disarmament; intensified armament--quite a lot all at once. It is enough, anyway, for urging at least the responsible politicians (and journalists) to exercise extreme caution. All told these are not bright prospects for the most beautiful period of the year meteorologically. But it is better not to harbor any illusions.

In Bonn one gets the impression that the Federal Government may be prepared to do something, but that quite a bit of time is needed. But with each passing day the chance of convincing Khomeyni with less risky means than military means that he must release the hostages becomes smaller. If the Europeans wish to avoid incalculable risks, then they have every reason to help the U.S. sanctions attain success without delay and effectively through economic and political pressure of their own, political pressure meaning in this case that they should exploit rather than sever diplomatic relations as the United States has understandably done. This ought to apply to the entire EC, but it particularly holds true for the FRG, France, Great Britain and also for Japan.

DEFENSE MINISTRY EXPLAINS INDIAN OCEAN EXERCISES

[Text] Bonn--The Federal Republic will not hold a naval demonstration for the oil-producing countries of the Indian Ocean. This assurance was given by the Federal Defense Ministry today thereby denying reports to the contrary. The ministry confirmed that a German naval formation, consisting of the destroyers Lostjens and Bayern and the auxiliaries Spessart and Coburg would carry out a training exercise in foreign waters, including the Indian Ocean, from 29 April to 8 August, but the purpose of this is to train crews and to make them used to prolonged absences from home ports and also to deepen relations between the Federal Republic and those states to be visited and to expand ties with other navies.

The ministry emphasized that "there is no operative connection between this exercise and the presence of other navies in the Indian Ocean." This is meant to counter speculation connected with this voyage that the German formation will (?join) [word indistinct] American and French warships at present operating off the shores of the oil-producing countries in the Persian Gulf, together with Soviet fleet formations.

GENSCHER INTERVIEWED ON DETENTE, AFGHANISTAN

DW081140 Munich Bayerischer Rundfunk Network in German 1600 GMT 5 Apr 80 DW

[Paul Trunk interview with Federal Foreign Minister Hans-Dietrich Genscher in Bonn; date not given--recorded]

[Text] [Question] Have you, Mr Genscher, not begun to doubt the correctness of the detente policy pursued up to now as a result of the Soviet Union's assault on Afghanistan?

[Answer] I think nobody in our country can be interested in pursuing a policy of tension. Rather, it can be and must be our goal--and we have had this goal since the establishment of the FRG--to contribute toward a mitigation of tensions. This is particularly true, of course, for people forced against their will to live in two states. But, at the same time, such a policy of mitigating tensions requires that everything be done that is necessary to insure a balance of forces.

In the long run a predominance by one side means susceptibility to influence on the part of the other and, ultimately, submission. For this reason it has been inalienable to the policy of the Federal Government to base its efforts for detente and conciliation of interests [ausgleich] in Europe on a policy of balance to which we contribute a considerable share through our defense efforts in the Western alliance.

[Question] The governments of the West, naturally, have always stressed that balance constitutes the precondition for detente policy. Yet, at the same time, they have allowed a power shift to the advantage of the Soviet Union to occur. Is it not this policy which has led to Afghanistan?

[Answer] What we observe is that the Soviet Union is using its political and, above all, its military potentials wherever it considers the risk negligible. In doing so it has made use of the options resulting from the decolonization phase in the Third World. In that phase it supported the liberation movements in many cases, especially through arms deliveries, thereby creating a good political position for itself.

We are now in a phase in which the decolonization process is nearing its end, and it turns out that the Western concept of cooperation with the states of the Third World in partnership and on an equal basis alone has a future. On the other hand, the Soviet Union has always linked its support for states of the Third World with the expectation,not to say the demand, that these states submit to the will of the Soviet Union, meaning that they join the Soviet Union's sphere of influence. This is quite understandable, too, if we keep in mind that it is the central goal of the nonalined movement, that is, of those in this movement who pursue true nonalinement, not only to preserve but also to enhance their independence and sovereignty.

However, after a long time of colonial rule it becomes plain that the Soviet policy of setting up spheres of influence in the Third World, the Soviet policy of expansion, is fundamentally at odds with these goals of the Third World states, whereas the Western policy of strengthening independence and sovereignty through cooperation in partnership does have a future. Hence, contributing toward the stability of the Third World states through economic and social development, thereby also contributing toward political stability, is a highly essential component of the West's concept of safeguarding peace in the world.

[Question] But is the whole thing not a question of power anyway? After all, it has turned out that the Soviet Union immediately fills any power policy vacuum which the West leaves anywhere in the world.

[Answer] Or which emerges from various causes as well. This is why our concept of strengthening the stability of the states of the Third World is a very important instrument for making a worldwide contribution toward safeguarding peace. This means that the great moral task of assistance to the developing countries is at the same time peace policy, because stability in the Third World means safeguarding peace in those regions of the Third World as well. So, viewed from this angle, our policy is a policy of safeguarding peace on a worldwide basis.

Perhaps it is necessary to add that in this phase it is decisive for us to face the challenges of this area with a policy of firmness, clarity of purpose and, as I keep saying, predictability, as well as prudence. This includes our contributing to the Western defense alliance for the purpose of insuring the balance and our making a considerable contribution toward strengthening the independence and sovereignty of the Third World states, and that, third, we consistently and very energetically pursue our disarmament proposals which we have repeatedly advanced to the Soviet Union.

When we say we want balance, this means that we want balance on as low a level of armaments as possible. For this reason we call on the Soviet Union time and again, and I do so here and now, to take the specific disarmament proposals of the West seriously and to talk about them. We must not allow the Soviet Union to force another arms race on the world. What we want is not another arms race but negotiations on disarmament in order to insure the balance on as low a level as possible.

[Question] It is a fact, however, that the Soviet Union today has an overwhelming nuclear preponderance in Europe. What will happen if Moscow is not prepared to renounce that preponderance?

[Answer] NATO's decision to close the arms gap is the answer to the Soviet lead in the medium-range field. But our will to have disarmament is illustrated by the fact that the decision to close the arms gap was passed along with a negotiating offer. It is our wish that the 3 years ahead of us until the first stationing of an American medium-range missile in Western Europe be exploited to get negotiations on medium-range weapons going and, it is to be hoped, to bring them to a conclusion. We are determined to do that.

I believe, however, that in order to reestablish confidence in the world it is most important to give security to the Third World states so that other states will not infringe upon their independence. For this purpose it is important that the Soviet Union be prepared to talk to all interested states about the suggestion of the European Community foreign ministers on an independent and nonalined Afghanistan.

We do not want to make Afghanistan a Western base. We do not seek to derive any advantage from a withdrawal of the Soviet troops from Afghanistan. We just want this small nation to be able to carry out its right to self-determination, in other words, to organize its state as it wants. We want Afghanistan to be nonalined, we want it to be politically independent so that its sovereignty will not be curtailed and so that nobody will interfere in its internal affairs.

This ought to be guaranteed by all states in question, and I see with great satisfaction that more and more countries of the Third World are granting Afghanistan nonalined status. That is also the way to implement the decision of the United Nations in which it urges the Soviet Union to withdraw its troops from Afghanistan. It is now up to the Soviet Union to react positively to this constructive proposal, which is part of Western peace policy and part of the peace policy of the states of the Third World.

[Question] So far the Red Army has never withdrawn from a country it has occupied. Could Afghanistan initiate a change?

[Answer] It is most important that the West make it clear to the Soviet Union through the aforementioned firmness, predictability and considered stand that we do not accept the occupation of Afghanistan any more than do the Third World states for whom the occupation of Afghanistan has become a problem of principle with regard to their relations with the Soviet Union. I would like to say again that a basic contradiction exists here between the aims of the Third World states and the Soviet Union.

I think it is our task to make it clear to the Soviet Union that we want cooperation in the interest of safeguarding peace in the world. The Third World states want the same. I am convinced that a policy aimed at respect for the independence of all states would also serve the interests of the Soviet Union, in its very own interest and in the interest of the people in the Soviet Union themselves.

It is now a matter of making the Soviet Union understand through the firmness and clearness of our policy and cooperation with the Third World states, that long-term interests are of common concern to mankind in a world growing closer and closer together--a common concern in the interest of safeguarding peace.

I believe that our generation which experienced the horrors of World War II has the almost historic task of sparing our children and grandchildren a repeat of the horrible events. Therefore, we consider peace policy our generation's historic mission independent of the country and of the political prerequisites of our policy.

We also want to convince others of this and it is so important for peace policy that our country, the Federal Republic of Germany, be firmly linked to the European Community, a community of states which want to form the future together and not in opposition to each other. We pursue our balanced policy on the basis of a firm alliance with the United States, on the basis of similar interests and similar values.

MINISTER APEL REVIEWS TRIP TO PACIFIC REGION

DW081303 Cologne Westdeutscher Rundfunk Network in German 1210 GMT 5 Apr 80 DW

[Klaus-Juergen Haller interview with Federal Defense Minister Hans Apel, date, place not given--recorded]

[Text] [Question] Would you say that a trip of, say, some 50,000 kilometers changes the assessment of some problems that we in Europe consider important or which give us a headache perhaps every day?

[Answer] Very much so. We in Europe, for example, run the great risk in the next several months of entering into a new, political contemplation of our navel which all of us surely take very seriously but which, in the world perspective, has rather a comical effect. What I mean is the quarrel over the mutton market order and, linked with it, other quarrels over fishing rights. The quarrel over financing the Common Market is important, but seen from afar, it also looks strange when you consider how attentively the countries of this region are watching Europe and expecting political actions from Europe. If we banish the New Zealanders from the European agricultural market--and surely there are temptations to this effect since we produce adequate amounts of butter and meat, albeit more expensively--then this country will be plunged into difficulty. But what is even worse, the country will no longer be able to live up to its tasks in the region itself, namely, supporting the multitude of small, independent insular states of the region, including former German colonies, and keeping them in shape. In other words, we may well, through a wrong import policy, open for the communists the entry into a region which has so far been barred to them. Hence we would, as a result of shortsightedness, pay long-term political prices which we then might come to feel very painfully.

[Question] Just for the sake of explaining the story about the mutton a bit: The British have plenty of that and would like to export it to France. The French do not want to but have to go along, yet they demand a market order, a Common Market order, for mutton. What will happen, as experience shows, is an excess production in the European region, whereupon the New Zealanders with their mutton would be standing outside the European door again, as it were, just as they have with their butter. Actually, it is only down here that one can learn that this might also have a security policy aspect, among others, is this really the case? Is this not a bit exaggerated?

[Answer] I believe that in this region much more than at home you come to realize that security policy is more than just defense, more than just the continuation of detente policy on the basis of military balance, that security means the security of the sales markets, security of the raw materials, security for one's own people to develop further.

Consequently, this European market with a population of far more than 200 million is naturally an important factor. In this region the people are perfectly aware that their own future also depends on the United States. But they are just as aware that it largely depends on Europe's unity, Europe's sales markets. This is what we must understand. In Germany every fourth job depends on exports. Essentially our energy supply is attributable to the Gulf region. This makes it evident how vulnerable we are, what worldwide responsibility we bear, whether we like it or not.

[Question] Reverting to the other point once more: Have you tried to visualize, for instance, how Mr Ertl will react in the Bonn Cabinet when you demand mutton from New Zealand in Europe under aspects of security policy?

[Answer] Well, I believe that Josef Ertl and I are agreed upon this point. To begin with, we have no national interest involved here. What is much more important, however, is the fact that the wrong course on agricultural policy could be continued. Then nine industrial nations would continue increasingly to spend all that nice money in Brussels on agricultural policy and have no funds left for the development of alternative energy sources or new technologies, for example, meaning for our industrial future. All heads of government have said that there will be no more money for the Common Market than the Common Market has right now. If the agricultural policy continues as it is now it will be necessary to either earmark more funds in 1981 or make drastic cuts. For this reason alone, a certain correction must be made with regard to internal European considerations. In other words, this means discontinuation of the policy pursued up to now and the practice of a policy which will help the countries of Asia which depend on European sales markets for their products.

[Question] You have repeated several times, with good reason, that the Bundeswehr will act only within NATO territory. A similar situation applies to the comparatively small voluntary armies of New Zealand, Japan and Australia. But does that not also mean simultaneously expecting a presence from the United States, a military presence, the geographic dimensions of which become terrifyingly clear on a tour like yours which covers many thousands of kilometers?

[Answer] Most of all we must become accustomed to understanding that security policy in this decade and in the next decades means economic support to countries which want to strike out on their own, to gain self-determination, if I can put it that way. Everything else is a dangerous policy--as demonstrated by the example of Iran, by the way--which can be successful only within limits. We all agree on that problem. We, all the wealthy countries of the West, are involved here. The FRG will make its contribution.

Moreover, this will naturally not work without a military presence. We must take care of our regional tasks in this matter; we--that is NATO, Australia, New Zealand and Japan in their respective regions. In addition, the superpower United States must indeed play a special role. If this is too much for the superpower United States, it ought to be discussed in the NATO alliance, for example. We are gladly prepared to do that. Demands must be put on the table, for example: We can no longer do some things in the NATO area, such as with regard to the navy. You will have to talk that over.

This must be discussed and a decision must be made with one main condition--that additional actions which must be taken, must be done by all NATO partners. There is no special responsibility on the part of the FRG, and the whole matter must be financially possible. It does not make sense to set up short-winded plans which will cease to exist in a few months. In past months we have often heard plans in some fields that have been too grandiose and which have been followed up with too little action. I consider this an incorrect policy.

[Question] Did you find a feeling of direct threat, be it in Japan, Australia or New Zealand, with regard to the Soviet invasion of Afghanistan?

[Answer] It is hard to know what is going on in the heads of one's discussion partners. But we can probably say and be agreed that no great strategic planning exists in Moscow along the lines of: How do we conquer and rule the world? The Soviets will grab the chance when it is offered to them, when they believe that the risks are small; in other words, when there is a political vacuum for which the West is partially responsible. It is therefore important to fill political and economic vacuums, mostly with economic aid, to demonstrate to the Soviets that we are present. I think that we will then be able to handle the problems. If we are frightened, however--I have not found that fear anywhere--we will be unable to master the future.

[Question] Does that not mean temporarily freezing the arms control and arms limitation problems?

[Answer] Regional differences must be taken into consideration here also. There are regions in the world where there is a military imbalance, where there is hardly a basis for arms control and arms limitation on the basis of equality. The situation in Europe is completely different. Our arms control and arms limitation offers remain valid as before. The Soviet Union can discuss with us every day arms control and arms limitation with regard to Eurostrategic arms and nuclear medium-range arms in Europe, and it can achieve results if it wants.

This arms control and arms limitation policy for Europe has been fully accepted by my discussion partners, because naturally we live in a most endangered region. Peace must have top priority for us. Any war would destroy the European civilization. My discussion partners agree completely.

BRIEFS

TEPPER SENTENCED FOR SPYING--Duesseldorf--The Duesseldorf Higher Regional Court today sentenced Peter Johann Tepper (43), a former senior government secretary in Cologne, to 4 1/2 years of imprisonment for serving as an intelligence agent for the East Berlin Ministry for State Security. The court regarded it as fact that, at the time of his arrest in December 1978, Tepper had been spying for the GDR secret service for almost 15 years "in a particularly serious case" and had passed on a series of documents from Bundeswehr offices to the East, as a result of which important public interests of the Federal Republic were jeopardized. LATE REPORT: CABINET EXPRESSES SUPPORT FOR U.S.

LD091350 Hamburg DPA in German 1305 GMT 9 Apr 80 LD

[Text] Bonn: In the view of the Federal Government, developments in the international situation give cause for "great concern." According to Government Spokesman Armin Gruenewald, following a meeting of the Federal Cabinet today on the latest U.S.-(?Iranian) development, the Federal Government again underlined its view that the Washington administration with its responsible attitude has tried from the very first day of the hostage affair in Tehran to avoid the situation which has now come about.

The Federal Government, stressed Gruenewald, had at no time left any doubt that it would act as "friend and (?partner)" of the United States. In this context, it will discuss the present situation with the EEC members and other friendly countries. It is important "to make a contribution together with our partners towards overcoming the crisis." The Federal Government will (?continue) its efforts in the interests of the U.S. Embassy hostages in Tehran.

GISCARD CONDEMNS PALESTINIAN ATTACK ON ISRAELI KIBBUTZ

LD081320 Paris Domestic Service in French 1100 GMT 8 Apr 80 LD

[Text] The president of the republic condemns the Palestinian raid on the kibbutz in Israel, which as you know claimed victims yesterday morning. President Giscard d'Estaing shares the emotion created by this terrorist action, which he regards as particularly odious. This was stated by Elysee spokesman (Jean-Marie) Poirier, who was answering questions on France's reaction to the attack yesterday on this kibbutz. Poirier added that the head of state firmly condemns actions of this sort and expresses his deep sympathy with relatives of the victims.

CAR'S DACKO ASSURED OF SUPPORT IN PARIS

[J.-C.P. report: "Paris Reaffirms Its 'Exceptional Support' for the New Authorities in Bangui"]

[Text] Central African President Dacko returns to Bangui this Friday, 28 March, after a 3-day "official working visit" to Paris. At the Elysee meeting on Thursday afternoon between the two heads of state and several of their advisers, a joint communique was issued reaffirming the French Government's "exceptional support" for the new Central African authorities and stating that this visit by Bokassa I's successor "symbolized the Central African Republic's new-found freedom and dignity."

The "unprecedented effort" launched by Paris since the beginning of the year, especially in the transport sphere, will be extended to projects considered urgent in the spheres of rural development, telecommunications and health. France, the communique also states, will give support in the relevant international organizations to Central African development projects likely to benefit from international funding, notably the plan for reviving cotton production.

Mr David Dacko, who had been received at the Matignon by Mr Raymond Barre on Thursday morning, paid tribute to the action taken by France and Mr Giscard d'Estaing which made it possible to restore a "humane and liberal republic" in Central Africa and to start the process of "rebuilding democratic institutions."

Mr Dacko's visit, which took place 6 months after the overthrow of the Central African Empire by French soldiers and 5 months after the "diamonds affair," bore the stamp of discretion. The Central African president cautiously avoided meeting the press. The emphasis has been constantly placed on the problems of rebuilding a country ruined by "a regime which had become brutal and contemptuous," to cite Mr Giscard d'Estaing. Aside from his contacts with French officials and business circles, President Dacko did not attend any public function. This was probably why his visit was described as an "official working visit" and not a state visit.

Even if they were not mentioned in the speeches and the final communique, security questions must have been raised since the French contingent stationed in Central Africa is helping to guarantee the regime's security. The aim of completing the "rebuilding of democratic institutions" which figures in the final communique suggests that the French and Central Africans are aware that the exclusion of some Central African leaders, the detention of Mr Ange Patasse and a small group of his supporters and the recent formation of a single party do not necessarily help boost the prestige of a regime which claims to have put an end to authoritarianism and to the cruelties of the former emperor, to whom Mr Dacko was adviser from 1976 through 1978.

GEORGES MARCHAIS REJECTS 'EUROLEFT' CONCEPT

LD081027 Paris L'HUMANITE in French 28 Mar 80 pp 5-6 LD

[Unattributed report on speech delivered by PCF Secretary General Georges Marchais at PCF rally in Paris on 27 March: "Georges Marchais' Speech"]

[Excerpt] We want to progress toward a society which the workers and the country need--toward a democratic, self-managing socialism--a French brand of socialism. How can we bring about this change? What can be done?

We Do Not Want Any "Euroleft"

The Socialist Party [PS] has recently put forward an answer to this. Some newspapers close to the PS have given this answer a name: the "Euroleft". A "Euroleft" which would replace Eurocommunism which, they claim, is moribund.

Let us make ourselves quite clear because the future of the struggle waged by the workers and people of our country is at stake: We French Communists want absolutely nothing to do with this so-called "Euroleft."

You just have to recall the positions adopted by the "inventors" of this "Euroleft" to understand why. The supporters of the so-called "Euroleft" are for austerity. They accept that the redeployment of multinational corporations should be carried out at the expense of the manual and intellectual workers and of peasants with small and medium-sized holdings.

The advocates of the so-called "Euroleft" support the dismantling of our industry and our agricutulture. At the Brussels Commission the social democrats, together with the conservative right, are behind the Davignon plans to liquidate the iron and steel industry, the textile industry, shipyards, the automobile industry and many others. At present they are calling into question what we have gained under the Common Agricultural Policy.

The advocates of the so-called "Euroleft" are strongly in favor of expanding the EEC to Greece, Portugal, and Spain. They are calling for the supranationality which would totally destroy our national independence.

The advocates of the so-called "Euroleft" talk about human rights. However only a few days ago they sided with those in the European Parliament who prevented an examination of the file on human rights violations in the nine EC countries.

The advocates of the so-called "Euroleft" are also supporters of "Euromissiles" and hence of an escalation in the arms race. They advocate a common European defense system and at the same time the strengthening of NATO. In these conditions their so-called "independent Europe" will never be anything but a U.S. satellite.

The advocates of the so-called "Euroleft" claim that the workers should abandon the attempt to solve their problems in the national context and should refer the matter to the European plane. This means that to obtain the changes they want the French workers would have to wait until the Bonn Social Democrats were willing and until Washington gave its blessing.

Furthermore, the advocates of the so-called "Euroleft" are actually advocating the international status quo. In their view peaceful coexistence should be accompanied by preventing peoples from choosing their social system. They even go further than that: According to them we should withdraw solidarity for all struggling peoples, including those who are victims of imperialism's interference. This would leave imperialism free to export counterrevolution at will.

It is clear that replacing Eurocommunism by this so-called "Euroleft" would amount to abandoning the struggle for real political change and pushing the workers' and democratic movement into the quagmire of social democratic collaboration with the bourgeoisie. That is why we firmly reject this blind alley.

The PCF remains resolutely attached to Eurocommunism--in other words, to the struggle against capital for social, economic and political changes capable of finding a positive solution to the crisis, to the struggle for progress toward a democratic socialism by democratic means.

We Are Still Attached to Eurocommunism

We welcomed the agreement which has emerged in this connection between the analyses and policies defined by a number of communist parties including ours. We are pleased to see that this number is still growing throughout the world. We are more favourable than ever to cooperation with these parties and with all communist parties. We are also still prepared to take action with all forces who want to struggle for progress, cooperation, disarmament, friendship among peoples and peace.

However, Eurocommunism has never meant adopting a single model for socialism. Moreover, it has never implied abandoning the right--I would even say the duty--of every working class and every people to choose their own path toward socialism and to define the rate of progress and the means of achieving it. It has never implied that our people should place their fate in the hands of a supranational Areopagus dominated by West Germany and under U.S. protection. On the contrary, being faithful to Eurocommunism--and we are--also means working as we do to preserve and create the right conditions for democratic change in France.

It is because this is our aim that we are just as resolutely attached to the union of people's forces--to the leftwing union in the struggle for such change. That is the right way, the only way of steering our country out of the crisis, of imposing a new policy, a new government in which the Communists would finally have the position they deserve and which we demand.

TERRORIST GROUP CLAIMS THEFT OF INTELLIGENCE DATA

OW081115 Paris AFP in English 1102 GMT 8 Apr 80 OW

[Text] Paris, April 8 (AFP)--The terrorist group "Action Directe" today claimed it had stolen French military and intelligence data in a raid on data processing offices in Toulouse. In a phone call to AGENCE FRANCE-PRESSE it claimed responsibility for last weekend's sabotage and data snatch at the Toulouse premises of Philips Informatique. It further said: "What we discovered will be publicly divulged in the next few days."

Action Directe said the attack on the computer bureau was in retaliation for a police swoop on March 28 when 19 presumed members of the organisation were held for questioning. Later 15 were charged for attacks using explosives, attempted murder and other activities. On that occasion four Italians were also charged in France for similar offenses. They included a man sought for the killing of former Italian Premier Aldo Moro.

In its phone call to AFP today, Action Directe additionally claimed responsibility for a bomb attack on March 30 against a police station in Toulouse. It asserted that the Toulouse attacks showed the police that its members were still able to engage in actions in spite of the detentions on March 28. It concluded with a threat of more attacks to come.

U.S. SEEN AS PRESSING FOR BOOST IN DEFENSE EFFORT

LD081509 Stockholm SVENSKA DAGBLADET in Swedish 28 Mar 80 pp 1, 6 LD

[Ingmar Lindmarker report: "U.S. Presses: Denmark Ought To Increase Defense"]

[Text] U.S. Defense Secretary Harold Brown has exhorted the Danish Government to increase its defense budget and has linked his demand to U.S. preparedness to create contingency stockpiles of military equipment in Denmark, American spokesmen have told SVENSKA DAG - BLADET.

In a confidential letter, Brown has demanded that Denmark fulfill the NATO commitment to increase its defense budget by 3 percent per year.

Highly placed sources in the Defense Department in Washington told SVENSKA DAGBLADET on Thursday that there is a great deal of dissatisfaction about Denmark "dragging its feet" in defense matters. The letter from Brown was an attempt to exert pressure on the Danish Government.

Agreement With Norway

In his letter Brown linked the 3 percent demand with the United States' political preparedness to create contingency stockpiles of military equipment in Denmark, it was said. Such contingency stockpiling is considered a prerequisite for NATO reinforcements to be able to relieve Denmark in time of a crisis situation.

"It is correct that there has been confidential correspondence about defense spending," Jorgen Wahl of the Danish Defense Ministry said. "But it is somewhat pointed to say that there is a direct connection with negotiations for contingency stockpiling."

SVENSKA DAGBLADET's informants in Washington also said that there is "broad general agreement" between the Americans and Norwegians on contingency stockpiling in Norway for the U.S. Marine Corps.

Under Secretary of State in the Norwegian Defense Ministry Hans Jorgen Holst begins talks in Washington on Friday on the question of contingency stockpiling, among other things. Formally, however, these are not seen as negotiations.

According to some unconfirmed reports, negotiations could start as early as April. However, in Washington, Defense Department spokesmen will only say that the matter is progressing, but not dramatically.

America is well aware of the pressures that Norway is being subjected to by the Soviet press, it is stated. The Americans therefore want to show the greatest possible consideration for Norwegian wishes and not force any decisions.

DEFENSE OFFICIALS CONCERNED ABOUT AIR FORCE MANNING PROBLEMS

LD041403 Copenhagen BERLINGSKE TIDENDE in Danish 31 Mar 80 Part I p 2 LD

[RITZAUS bureau report: "The Most Able Leave the Air Force"]

[Text] Servicemen in the defense forces must be given better pay and conditions. Otherwise, Jutland's air force divisions will perhaps be grounded as they were last year, JYDSKE TIDENDE wrote on Sunday.

The air force has difficulty in retaining its technicians and, in recent months, the exodus to the private sector has grown.

Worst hit is Skrydstrup Airbase where the staff fears the arrival of the new F-16's.

"So sophisticated a plane, each costing 40 million kroner, needs highly trained technical staff and, in the present situation, I am afraid that we do not have the capacity to cope with it," Private Karl Lindahl said.

The airbase has a staff of only 10 men who can be employed on a long-term basis during the year; this just does not meet the base's needs. Karl Lindahl emphasizes that joint responsibility for the F-16 project cannot and will not be taken--certainly not before the air force is given a promise by the politicians that pay and conditions will be improved in step with technological developments.

Air Force Chief Niels Holst Sorensen is in broad agreement with the servicemen's representatives and he points out how absurd it is for the defense forces to function as an educational institution after which the most able disappear to civilian jobs.

Defense Minister Poul Sogaard has announced that he wants to review conditions at Skrydstrup Airbase.

SED DELEGATE GREETS WORKERS COMMUNIST PARTY CONGRESS

AU090733 East Berlin NEUES DEUTSCHLAND in German 7 Apr 80 p 1 AU

["SED Greetings to the Workers Communist Party"]

[Text] Stockholm (ADN report)--The party congress of the Workers Communist Party of Sweden continued its deliberations on Sunday [6 April]. On Saturday Ernst Timm, member of the SED Central Committee and first secretary of the Rostock Bezirk leadership, had conveyed militant greetings of the SED Central Committee. Before the delegates at Stockholm's "Folkets Hus" he underscored the firm solidarity of the GDR's communists with the struggle of the Workers Communist Party for the social and national interests of the Swedish working people. He pointed out that what the GDR needs first and foremost is peace and security for the further fashioning of its developed socialist society.

IRA LEADER DISCUSSES ATTACKS IN FRG, 'HIT LIST' TARGETS

DW081635 Hamburg DER SPIEGEL in German 8 Apr 80 pp 145-151 DW

[Interview by unidentified reporter with "Patrick," member of the IRA Supreme Command, the "first authorized interview" with a member of the new leadership staff of the IRA--date, place not given]

[Text] SPIEGEL: The new year has begun with a series of IRA assaults on members of the British Army in the Federal Republic. Is the IRA now waging its war in Germany as well?

Patrick: The attacks in Germany began as early as in 1978. They merely represent a change in strategy, but not in our policy. This policy is to combat the British Army wherever we find it.

SPIEGEL: Why in the Federal Republic, of all places?

Patrick: There certainly is a special reason for this--nearly all of the soldiers assigned to Northern Ireland who are oppressing our people have been stationed in Germany with the British Rhine Army. Under a rotational system they are stationed in Ulster for a certain period and then return to Germany.

But, above all, they are being purposely being trained there for their dirty work in the streets of our cities and villages. This has gone so far that, in the British garrison of Munster in Germany, several street blocks of Belfast have been simulated in their actual dimensions; here the "Brits" are trained in street fighting and even for quelling demonstrations of Republicans.

SPIEGEL: Do you have proof of that?

Patrick: Naturally--the best you can imagine. In the semiofficial book "The British Army in Ulster," Volume 3, you will even find pictures which demonstrate this shameful violation of German hospitality.

SPIEGEL: Does this mean that you will set off bombs in Germany in the future?

Patrick: Sure.

SPIEGEL: Do you have German helpers? Allegedly remnants of the RAF [Red Army Faction] are supporting your commandos.

Patrick: If you mean to imply that we are receiving material or physical aid from RAF or similar organizations, then the answer is a categorical no. We are a liberation army which is solely supported by the oppressed people of Ireland. On principle we have nothing in common with such movements which pursue goals different from ours. But we are allied with such groups which want to liberate their own people from foreign rule by another nation just as we do.

SPIEGEL: With the Basque ETA [Fatherland and Liberty], for example?

Patrick: Yes, and with several others.

SPIEGEL: What will happen if the Germans arrest one or several of your people? Will you then make German installations the targets of your assaults as well?

Patrick: Under no circumstances. None of our assaults is aimed at the Germans. We are aware that the sympathies of the Germans are with the Irish liberation struggle. [paragraph continues]

But we hope at the same time that our attacks on the British will make your compatriots see through the shabbiness of the British propaganda: It is a foolish joke for Margaret Thatcher to complain about the presence of Russian tanks in Afghanistan while British armor is clamoring through the streets of Belfast and Derry day and night, our fellow citizens being abruptly awakened at 0500 in the morning and staring into the muzzles of British submachine guns, when the occupiers in their colony torment my compatriots.

SPIEGEL: Are your raids in Germany not rather an indication of weakness? Do you no longer have the nerve to hit in the lion's den--in England?

Patrick: Weakness? You must be joking. On a single day in August last year we killed 18 British soldiers in Warrenpoint; we executed Lord Mountbatten....

SPIEGEL: ...and killed innocent civilians in the process.

Patrick: Our campaign has become much more efficient--we can detonate landmines by radio over a distance of several kilometers. Our snipers no longer waste ammunition--one shot is enough, and a Britisher is dead.

SPIEGEL: What now? Do you no longer have the nerve to attack in England proper?

Patrick: Yes, though we did make mistakes in the past. We told the Britons beforehand what we would be doing; we warned them. Now they are provoking us in order to force us to indicate what we plan to do. We also said earlier that we would win our struggle in a year or 2....

SPIEGEL: And you no longer say that?

Patrick: No, we do not say any more that the fight will be over soon, but we will win it. I teach my children even now to hate the British. Even if we have to fight for generations we will free Ireland from foreign rule.

SPIEGEL: Last spring Airey Neave, Margaret Thatcher's expert on Ireland, was murdered in the House of Commons, but not by you....

Patrick: No, that was the Irish National Liberation Army (INLA).

SPIEGEL: Do you cooperate with INLA since you pursue the same goal?

Patrick: No, but we know their people and coordinate to some extent. INLA split from the Marxist IRA wing, the "Official," which has not fought against the British since 1971. In the first year after 1971 the same people who are in the INLA today fought against us. We have not yet forgotten it. Some time will have to pass before these wounds are healed. It is possible that we will merge later on.

SPIEGEL: How great are the losses suffered by the IRA so far?

Patrick: Since the beginning of the present 1970 campaign about 180 of our volunteers have died. But we mourn for all the dead in this fight, considering them a loss.

SPIEGEL: The British soldiers too?

Patrick: Later, when the struggle is over, we may mourn for them also.

SPIEGEL: Since the "execution" of Lord Mountbatten, as you call it, the question has arisen as to whether you will kill prominent Britons in the future.

Patrick: Every politician or prominent person who publicly approves of the suppression of Ireland and opposes its reunification must reckon with death.

SPIEGEL: Who, for example?

Patrick: Peter Jay, the son-in-law of James Callaghan, who was ambassador to Washington until a year ago. In Washington he organized the propaganda campaign of the British against the IRA and he has, like his father-in-law, a weekend house in Ireland, in the County of Cork. He was there when we executed Mountbatten, but he disappeared like lightning and has not returned since. We wait for him.

SPIEGEL: Who else?

Patrick: Since 29 March in particular the former Labor chancellor of the Exchequer, Denis Healey. He had abstained from saying a word against Ireland, but a week ago he objected to reunification in Dublin. He will pay for that.

SPIEGEL: For how long will you have enough of an influx to continue your war at the present level?

Patrick: We cannot even accept all the many people coming to us. The high level of our military actions alone is evidence of the fact that we find considerable support among the people. Otherwise, it would not have been possible to continue the fight for more than 10 years against such a powerful enemy.

We are not a small group of individual fighters. Some 1,500 of our people are at present in prisons. More than 2,000 have been put into detention camps; many of them have been tortured, as has been confirmed by the Strasbourg court for human rights.

It is obvious that I cannot tell you how strong we really are. Only this much: A document of the British intelligence service that fell into our hands last year estimates that our strength in Belfast alone is 900 men. Go ahead and believe it because we will demonstrate it: Our fighting strength is as great as ever, if not greater.

SPIEGEL: How do you justify the death of so many people, the suffering you have caused?

Patrick: Many more people have died here, have been tortured here and exploited--for centuries and long before we fired our first shot. Our people suffer from the foreign British rule. For many people the IRA is the last hope since the peaceful resistance of the civil rights movement was brutally crushed in the late sixties. There will be just one result: The British must go and the Irish people must be permitted to determine their future themselves, alone and in freedom.

KLIRIDHIS REJECTS PRESIDENT'S CALL FOR UNITY

NC090657 Nicosia CYPRUS MAIL in English 9 Apr 80 p 1 NC

[Text] The opposition Rally Party of Mr Kliridhis has turned down the call of President Kiprianou to join hands in meeting the delicate situation facing the country.

President Kiprianou made the appeal in his Easter Day message to the people when he called for submerging of all personal and party pursuit for the sake of physical and national survival. In a strongly worded statement attacking the government policies, both in the economic and political fields, the Rally replies:

"Is it possible to have unity with tolerance of errors that lead to catastrophe? Is it possible to have unity without a concrete programme and targets?"

The Rally will not offer its silence or tolerance on the downhill road to catastrophe. The Rally will not turn a blind eye to the precipice where government ineptitude leads and will strive for change and salvation, it says.

The Rally had rejected a similar appeal for a political truce made in a public speech, by the House President Mr Alekos Mikhailidhis.

SPOKESMAN REAFFIRMS SUPPORT FOR WALDHEIM EFFORTS

NC081804 Nicosia Domestic Service in Greek 1630 GMT 8 Apr 80 NC

[Text] The government spokesman stated today that the Greek Cypriot side will continue to assist the UN secretary general in his efforts toward the resumption of the intercommunal talks with the aim of finding a solution to the Cyprus problem. In answer to a relevant question, however, the spokesman said he was not aware of any new instructions having been given to the UN secretary general's special representative in Cyprus for any further consultations concerning the attempt to resume the talks.

The spokesman also said that it is natural for consultations to be started with the aim of implementing the UN General Assembly resolution, which provides for the appointment of an Assembly committee that will assist the secretary general in his efforts to hold substantive talks and will suggest measures for the implementation of the UN resolutions on a solution. The spokesman added that the Cyprus Government has not abandoned this resolution.

He added: We support both the form and the implementation of this resolution. As for when it will be implemented, however, that depends on the consultations. He also said that the question of appointing a UN General Assembly committee has never been placed in contrast to the secretary general's efforts for the resumption of talks; the one does not rule out but strengthens the other, and the committee is not going to replace the dialog.

The spokesman also said that, as is evident in the government's activities and the contents of the resolution, priority and preference have always been and are still being given to the holding of talks; this is also reflected in the foreign minister's latest statement.

In answer to another relevant question, the government spokesman said that all press reports about a meeting between Foreign Minister Rolandhis and Turkish Foreign Minister Erkmen as well as about a British initiative in the Cyprus issue are mere conjectures.

ROLANDHIS LEAVES FOR LISBON MINISTERS' CONFERENCE

NC080915 Nicosia Domestic Service in Greek 0900 GMT 8 Apr 80 NC

[Text] Foreign Minister Rolandhis left this morning for Lisbon, where he will attend the 66th session of the ministerial committee of the Council of Europe. On the way Mr Rolandhis made a stopover in Athens where he met Greek Foreign Minister Rallis.

In a statement at Athens airport, Mr Rolandhis said that the session of the Council of Europe ministerial committee will not discuss the Cyprus problem as such, but there will be discussion on matters concerning Cyprus because many principles of the Conference on Security and Cooperation in Europe have been violated in the case of the Cyprus problem.

Mr Rolandhis added that during private meetings with European foreign ministers he expects to discuss the Cyprus problem particularly in light of the fact that the deadline set by the UN General Assembly for the appointment of a special committee on the question of Cyprus has just expired.

DENKTAS LEAVES ISTABUL FOR LONDON MUSLIM CONFERENCE

TA041830 Ankara Domestic Service in Turkish 1800 GMT 4 Apr 80 TA

[Text] President of the Turkish Federated State of Cyprus Rauf Denktas left Istanbul for London by air today to participate in a conference on the prophet Muhammad and his lifetime. The conference is being organized by the European Muslim Council. Denktas will deliver the opening speech to the conference, which will meet from 9 to 12 April.

GREEK PAPER: U.S.-TURKISH AGREEMENT REQUIRES POLICY REAPPRAISAL

NC090806 Nicosia ELEVTHERI KIPROS in Greek 9 Apr 80 p 1 NC

[From the "Positions and Views: column]

[Excerpts] A new state of affairs has been created in the eastern Mediterranean because of the signing of the U.S.-Turkish military agreement.

The signing of the agreement took place on the eve of the U.S. elections. Turkey does not undertake any commitments; there is no reference to the Cyprus problem in the agreement. And while all this is happening, President Carter, who is seeking reelections, is trying to win over the Greek-American voters. But how is the American President going to satisfy the injured Greek sentiment? Could it be that after his reelection he will--for a second time--attempt to deceive the Greek-Americans, Greece and Cyprus?

Turkey has succeeded in lifting the embargo without committing itself to a Cyprus solution. It has now guaranteed for itself massive unconditional military and economic aid without undertaking any obligations. What will be the result? Will Turkey not be encouraged in its intransigent stand? Will it not be encouraged to proceed with new adventures in Cyprus and the Aegean in general?

What can we expect from the United States? How could it reasonably persuade Turkey to be conciliatory? Since the United States has offered Turkey everything unconditionally, how can it later assert its authority over the Turks? The embargo was allegedly lifted in order to create favorable prerequisites for the Cyprus problem. [paragraph continues]

However, the results have been the exact opposite. Instead of reappraising its position, the United States has continued to caress Turkey.

What the Cypriot people, as well as all Greeks in general, have to do is to calmly study the situation that has developed. Sufficient time has been granted for the solution of the Cyprus and the Aegean issues. What has happened during this period of time? The facts and conclusions must be studied and, based on this, a new national course should be charted, a course that would fully secure the national interests and satisfy the prestige of the nation. Let us proceed with such a reappraisal without illusions. Now it is imperative that we should be more realistic than ever!

GUNAYDIN: TFSC LEADDRS CRITICIZE TURKISH ECONOMIC MEASURES

NC091054 Istanbul GUNAYDIN in Turkish 7 Apr 80 p 5 NC

[Special report from Nicosia]

[Excerpts] Nejak Konuk, former prime minister of the Turkish Federated State of Cyprus [TFSC], has strongly criticized the new foreign trade regime which was announced the other day. Konuk said: "Is this a state or a province [of Turkey]? This should be definitely stated."

Saying that the new foreign trade regime openly served the interests of smugglers, profiteers and government supporters, Konuk maintained that the steps taken were bound to lead local industry into catastrophe and to the squandering of foreign exchange secured by the producers.

Nejat Konuk, the leader of the Democratic People's Party and TFSC's first prime minister, said it was high time to see the flow of goods and services between Turkey and the TFSC in their right perspective. Konuk added: "Changing the rules in the TFSC to suit Ankara each time they have a new government is causing extensive damage. We should not cater to the interests of only a few firms in Cyprus or Turkey.

The leader of the Communal Liberation Party, the main opposition, Alpay Durduran stated that the new economic regime is formulated in a way that does not serve the TFSC economy but protects the market in Turkey. Durduran added: "This regime will completely kill local production; foreign exchange profiteering will increase and partisanship will spread beyond control."

U.S. SENATORS ARRIVE FOR TALKS WITH LEADERS

AT081320 Athens I VRADHINI in Greek 8 Apr 80 pp 1, 5 AT [Text] The five U.S. senators--members of the Senate Foreign Relations Committee--who arrived last evening in Athens from Ankara will meet with Prime Minister Konstandinos Karamanlis, possibly tomorrow. Tomorrow at noon, Foreign Minister Yeoryios Rallis will give a luncheon at the Foreign Ministry in honor of Senators H. Baker, J. Biden, E. Zorinsky, M. Wallop and Thad Cochran which will be attended by ministry officials as well. During their 3-day stay the senators will also meet Minister of Coordination K. Mitsotakis and National Defense Minister E. Averof.

As is obvious, Greek-U.S. relations, relations between Greece and NATO, Greek-Turkish relations, the Cyprus problem, our country's defense situation and the upcoming signing of the agreement in principle between the two countries [Greece and the United States] for economic, technical and educational cooperation will be examined during the 3-day talks of the U.S. senators with the prime minister and the three principal ministers of the government. The U.S. senators' talks in Athens, Ankara and, later, Rome coincide with two other related events: the signing of the U.S. defense agreement [with Turkey] and the expected submission of General Rogers' report to NATO Secretary General Luns in connection with Roger's rejected plan for Greece's return to NATO. The final text of the U.S.-Turkish agreement will be submitted by the U.S. Government to the Greek side for discussion. The most important point concerning our country is whether the balance of forces between Greece and Turkey has been disturbed by the new agreement. If so, the Greek side will examine its proposals to Washington on ways for immediately and effectively dealing with the new "situation."

Furthermore, there is much interest in the next act of the Supreme Commander of Allied Forces General Rogers, because it will clarify whether he will surrender to the NATO secretary general the mandate for Greece's return or continue his exploratory mission to eliminate the deadlock.

I KATHIMERINI REPORTS GOVERNMENT'S 'SILENT WATCH' POLICY

[Text] A series of meetings planned after Easter under the leadership of Prime Minister K. Karamanlis should resolve a "number of solutions" to NATO issues and the Greek-U.S. defense cooperation agreement in order that the government may have alternate options at its disposal. This would allow a (final) decision based on the conditions at any given moment. For the time being at least, the government appears to favor the policy of a "silent watch" by insisting upon the preservation of the status quo. These tactics give the Greek Government time to calmly hold discussions and reach decisions which best protect Greek interests without the urgency that places one at a disadvantage in negotiations. At the same time, because the government will wait for an initiative from the U.S.-NATO side, the responsibility for a final decision by the Greek side (in accordance with the decisions to be made at the post-Easter meetings) is now upon "the other bank."

In reference to this, we must stress the recent (22 February) government statement that "it is up to the alliance to consider its priorities and to examine whether the unfounded reactions of only one member of the alliance should take precedence over the need to restore the unity and effectiveness of the alliance, particularly under the current conditions." In this light, the burden of proof regarding the sincerity of intent about the restoration of cohesion to the southeast wing of the alliance is born by NATO and not by the Greek Government.

At the same time, the excerpt of the government's reply to the chairman of PASOK is sufficiently voluble and it reveals the Greek Government's intentions if the U.S. side continues to be influenced by Turkish views. The message by the chairman of PASOK on 25 March touched upon these uncertain foreign relations of our country:

Irrespective of developments regarding the country's return to NATO, the government statement stressed that the government has always stated that it will remain within the political wing of NATO. Without question this will hinder any expansionist plans by anyone else against our country. Everything indicates that the alliance's military command does not appear to be free from the "Turkish syndrome." This has a negative effect on periodic talks between NATO and Greece with the result that uncertainty is perpetuated. It is indicatively stressed that the briefing of NATO Secretary General Luns earlier this week by General Rogers was the sequel to repeated meetings held earlier in Brussels between the supreme NATO military commander and Turkey's military strongman, armed forces General (Satlik). Therefore, there is no exaggeration of Luns' briefing when there is the precedent that the Rogers proposals, which were rejected by the Greek Government, were virtually dictated by the Turkish side.

The meetings led by the prime minister will be attended by Foreign Minister Rallis, National Defense Minister Averof-Tositsas, Deputy National Defense Minister Davos, the Director of the Prime Minister's Political Office Ambassador Moliviatis, and the Acting Secretary General of the Foreign Ministry S. Roussos, who is responsible for issues affecting Greek-U.S. and NATO relations.

EXORMISI INTERVIEWS PAPANDREOU ON EEC ACCESSION

[Excerpts] EXORMISI asked the PASOK chairman the following question:

Question: PASOK has declared its opposition to the country's accession to the EEC which it describes as detrimental and also as increasing the country's dependence on foreign decisionmaking centers. What alternative solution do you propose?

A. Papandreou: Our opposition to the EEC is dictated by the PASOK assessment that the accession will harm the Greek economy in many ways in both the short term and the long term and will increase the country's dependence on decisionmaking centers outside Greece. However, this does not mean that PASOK has selected the route of isolation and self-sufficiency in its foreign economic policy. On the contrary, as we have repeatedly declared, we want relations with all countries, but we want relations of equality, not of dependence, which will best serve our national interests and the goal of independent economic development that PASOK has decided upon. With regard to our relations with the EEC, during the formulation of a special economic agreement--as other countries have also done--we shall seek national programming of the country's social and economic development.

Question: Since your positions are so clear and final, why does PASOK participate in the EEC organs?

A. Papandreou: Our participation in these organs is necessary so that we may defend the national interests as much as possible and minimize the dangers that may emerge from the accession. PASOK has declared that it does not consider the issue of the accession closed and it will ask the people to state their final opinion on this issue through an irreproachable referendum.

GRAND NATIONAL ASSEMBLY AGAIN FAILS TO ELECT PRESIDENT

[Text] The 21st and 22d rounds of voting to elect a president held today by the joint session of the Senate and the National Assembly yielded no results. The session was adjourned after the 22d round of voting for lack of a quorum. A motion that the Senate and the National Assembly not meet jointly on Tuesdays and Thursdays to allow the discussion of bills by the National Assembly was rejected in the joint session today. The motion was tabled by the Nationalist Action Party [NAP] National Assembly Group deputy chairmen. The Senate and the National Assembly will meet jointly at 1500 tomorrow to continue the voting to elect a president.

Meanwhile, National Salvation Party [NSP] leader Necmettin Erbakan has said that he has given the RPP and the Justice Party 48 hours to nominate their presidential candidates. He said that after the deadline the NSP will fulfill its duty regarding the speedy election of a president. At a news conference at the parliament, Erbakan said that he did not find it suitable to announce what the NSP proposes to do if the two big parties failed to nominate their candidates within 48 hours and that one had to wait and see on Thursday. Erbakan said: You have to be patient for 48 hours. My aim is not to keep secrets. However, some people might try to take counteraction to render unfruitful our good will. I do not wish to give them this opportunity. In reply to a question, Erbakan said that a promise that the NSP would support any Justice Party candidate was out of the question. NAP National Assembly Group Deputy Chairmen Faruk Demirtola and Ihsan Kabadayi made a joint statement saying that RPP members had voted against their motion proposing legislative work at the National Assembly on Tuesdays and Thursdays. They claimed that the RPP members had caused the much awaited social bills to remain pending.

PUBLIC PROSECUTOR KILLED IN TOKAT ATTACK

[Excerpt] The public prosecutor of Tokat's Niksar District, Nihat Gercek, was killed in an armed attack. According to information obtained from Niksar District Deputy Official and district Gendarmerie Commander, Captain Yalcin Serce, Gercek was attacked on his way to work around 1330. He died at the scene of the incident. The murderer escaped after the incident. Tokat Governor Adil Kerimoglu said that a person who fit the description of eyewitnesses and who is believed to have murdered Gercek was captured in his house shortly after the incident. He added that the person has been taken into custody.

AYDINLIK CRITICIZES CONSTITUTIONAL COURT DECREE

NC081118 Istanbul AYDINLIK in Turkish 4 Apr 80 p 2 NC

[Article by Mehmet Tekin: "The 89th Article of the Ostrich Policy"]

[Excerpts] On 30 January 1980 papers reported that, following the appeal of the Turkish Workers Party [TEP], the constitutional court decreed that the 89th article of the political parties law is in accordance with the Constitution. The article in question reads as follows: "Political parties must not advocate the recognition of different national and religious minorities in the territory of the Turkish Republic. Political parties must not damage the nation's integrity by creating minority groups within the Turkish Republic by protecting or promoting their languages and cultures."

Newspapers also reported that this article is to be added to the associations law as well, and the government is engaged in efforts in that direction. Article 89 is neither compatible with the realities of our region nor with the vital interests of Turkey. Laws should be based on realities; article 89 is in contrast with realities and runs counter to the interests of Turkey. Above all, we must refer to the existence of 10 million Kurds in Turkey. It is impossible to overcome difficulties in Turkey without recognizing this fact.

The ever increasing Soviet activities in Turkey are aimed at using the Kurds to create subversion in Turkey. With this objective in mind, the Soviet Union is exploiting the justified demands of the Kurdish people. The duty of the Turkish nation is to frustrate and resist the Russian plans in unity with the Kurds. This is the harsh reality prevailing in Turkey today. What does article 89 stipulate? First of all, it assumes that there are no national minorities in Turkey and, secondly, that political parties cannot create minorities in Turkey.

Who has ever heard of a law declaring a nation nonexistent? The Kurdish nation cannot be considered nonexistent merely on the basis of article 89 of the political parties law. As a matter of fact, it is because of its existence that the Soviet Union is exploiting it. Those who think that they can alter the truth by means of articles of law, instead of admitting it, are grossly mistaken. This self-deception is dangerous as it serves the interests of the Russians all the more.

Why then do the laws of Turkey embrace such a provision? Because there is an oppressed nationality group in Turkey whose existence is denied. The rights of this oppressed nationality are the objective of a struggle today.

The integrity of our realm cannot be defended by closing our eyes to the realities of our country. As the danger assumes greater proportions, the need to base our arguments on the truth becomes greater.

Turkey was confronted with serious problems during the war of independence. These serious problems could only be resolved by uniting great forces. This necessity forced Mustafa Kemal and Inonu to recognize the existence and the rights of the Kurds.

Despite the fact that this colonialist threat over Turkey has increased, neither the government nor any other group has thought of taking appropriate steps against such a threat. They continue to close their eyes to the realities. A Turkey where inequality and oppression reign cannot establish a united front against Soviet Russia.

The Soviet threat has increased since 1975 and has led many people to see the truth in connection with the Soviet activities directed at the Kurdish circles.

It is a fact that Russia has temporarily turned its attention to areas other than Turkey. But as long as the straits belong to Turkey and as long as Turkey is situated on important crossroads, Russia will sooner or later concentrate its attention on Turkey. Those who think that they can protect the national integrity of our country by continuing to exert national pressure on the Kurds and by continuing to deny their existence are displaying serious shortsightedness, for such a mentality provides Russia with material for separatist propaganda.

The basis of Soviet separatist activities is the inequality of national minorities, which is national oppression. The Soviet policy of sowing discord among national minorities and setting them against one another finds fertile soil in Turkey as well as in Iran and Pakistan where national inequality is prevalent. We do not see this in countries such as Switzerland where national oppression is nonexistent and where there is a definite equality among the national minorities. The policies formulated in connection with the existence and rights of the Kurds in Turkey cannot survive. Those who wish to protect Turkey against Russian threats will have to defend the freedom and equality of all the forces which can protect Turkey.

VOTCP REPORTS TRT WORKERS DETERMINED TO CONTINUE STRUGGLE

TA041106 (Clandestine) Voice of Turkish Communist Party in Turkish to Europe and Turkey 0600 GMT 4 Apr 80 TA

[Text] The pressures and firings within the TRT are being protested. In its meeting in Ankara on 29 and 30 March, the TRT-DER [comprehensive radio and television workers organization] First Consultative Council confirmed that the workers employed by the TRT are determined to wage their struggle for an autonomous and democratic TRT despite all the pressures and firings. A press statement issued at the end of the meeting says that the TRT has been turned into Demirel's mouthpiece, that reactionaries from outside the TRT are preparing broadcasts but that the TRT-DER, the economic [as heard] and the democratic organization of the TRT workers is determined to continue to wage its struggle despite all the pressures and antidemocratic actions.

VOTCP REPORTS PROTESTS AGAINST NATO IN ISTANBUL, PROVINCES

TA090741 (Clandestine) Voice of Turkish Communist Party in Turkish to Europe and Turkey 0600 GMT 9 Apr 80 TA

[Text] There have been protests in Istanbul and other provinces against NATO--the aggressive force of imperialism and the hotbed of tension and cold war--on the 31st anniversary of its founding. Some 3,000 youths, women, civil servants, workers and teachers staged a march in Istanbul's Taksim Square to protest aggressive NATO, the U.S. bases and the slavery agreements. Cards denouncing the new slavery agreements were mailed to the Turkish Grand National Assembly Presidency on 5 April. Slogans such as "let the bases be occupied," "let the Americans be expelled," "no to NATO," "damn American imperialism" and "an end to the defense cooperation agreement" were chanted during the march. Speeches denouncing NATO, American imperialism and bilateral slavery agreements were delivered near Aga Mosque [in Istanbul's Beyoglu District].

Progressive youths protested against NATO at the Kadikoy Quay and in the Aksaray District of Istanbul on 4 April. There were also protests against NATO, the bases and American imperialism, which threaten the security and existence of our country and our people, in other provinces in Turkey. Our people and Turkish peace and progress forces are saying no to NATO and American imperialism.

COOPERATIVES UNION SIGNS AGREEMENT WITH SOVIET COUNTERPART

[Text] KOY-KOOP [Union of Cooperatives for Village Development and Other Agricultural Goals] leader Nedim Tarhan and the deputy chairman of the Soviet Tsentrosoyuz [Central Union of Consumer Societies], Dimitri Illarionovich Gudkov, signed an agreement in Ankara today. The following statements were made during the signing of the agreement:

[Begin Nedim recording] The talks with the Tsentrosoyuz representatives developed in a positive manner. Our colleagues also had the opportunity to follow the work of Turkish cooperatives and were informed about the development of the cooperative movement in Turkey by conversing with cooperative members. Our talks on the economic and cultural aspects of cooperatives reached their final stage today. We were able to sign concrete agreements on imports and exports as a result of our talks with our friends. KOY-KOOP will export 1,200 tons of lemons and 1,500 tons of oranges to the Soviet Union during 1980. We will import sunflower oil and fertilizer from the Soviet Union. The Soviet cooperative will also consider our offers in towels, sheets, olives and leguminous seeds and we will try to cooperate in these fields during 1980. Payments will be made in accordance with the trade and payments agreement between the two countries. [end recording]

[Begin Gudkov recording in Russian--fading into Turkish translation] The talks we held here are very important for us. The outcome of the talks will be very useful both for Tsentrosoyuz and for KOY-KOOP. [end recording]

TERCUMAN WARNS OF USSR INTENTIONS FOLLOWING U.S. DEFENSE ACCORD

NC081021 Istanbul TERCUMAN in Turkish 3 Apr 80 p 1, 10 NC

[Article by Nazli Ilicak: "Turkish-U.S. Agreement and the Soviet Union"]

[Excerpts] According to the official Soviet news agency TASS "the joint defense installations are intended to facilitate U.S. military intervention in Iran."

We are fortunate because had such an agreement been signed with the Soviet Union, our fatherland would have been in jeopardy: Look what has befallen Hungary and Czechoslovakia, to say nothing of Afghanistan. Look at the great anxiety felt by Iraq and Syria.

The Red Army has refused to leave the occupied territories since liberating them at the end of World War II. By means of the Helsinki conference, the Soviet Union had its borders in Europe made official and reinforced its domination over the satellite states. All the principles of "detente" such as "respect for territorial integrity, nonintervention in internal affairs" and "nonaggression" were embodied in the Helsinki declaration. But all this did not prevent the Soviet Union from invading Afghanistan. This was done on the strength of a Soviet-Afghanistan cooperation agreement and the Soviet Army was invited to save the so-called Afghan socialism. The Soviet troops in Syria and Iraq are giving Hafiz al-Asad and Saddam Husayn horrifying dreams of an invasion. The removal of these two leaders and their replacement by others with greater affinity for the Soviet Union will help to establish the long hoped for Iraqi-Syrian unity as well as lead to the formation of a powerful communist state with a powerful army and vast resources, almost at Turkey's doorstep. Hardening between blocs is harmful to our country situated as it is in a dangerous and sensitive region. But the current conditions must be carefully evaluated and the fact that Turkey is gradually being surrounded must be kept in mind. The occupation of Afghanistan has clearly exposed the fiasco of the nonalined movement.

Following the signing of the Turkish-U.S. defense agreement, PRAVDA quoted 51 Republican People's Party deputies who had said: "The bases will turn Turkey into a nuclear cemetery." So, PRAVDA made these deputies say exactly what it had meant to say itself. This was followed by the argument that the bases would be used against Iran, whereas the agreement signed with the United States stipulated that activities by the bases were limited to the objectives of NATO. But the Soviet Union still insists that these bases will be used for an attack on Iran. The winds blowing from the north are getting colder day by day, have once again proved how justified Turkey is in seeking assurances against Russia.

VOTCP REPORTS KISSINGER TO VISIT TURKEY SOON

TA090715 (Clandestine) Voice of Turkish Communist Party in Turkish to Europe and Turkey 0600 GMT 9 Apr 80 TA

[Text] Former U.S. Secretary of State Kissinger is expected to visit Ankara. According to a special report we have received, former U.S. Secretary of State Henry Kissinger will arrive in Ankara within the next few days and will hold meetings with various government officials, monopolist capital circles and politicians. Kissinger, who is known as a Middle East expert in the United States, is expected to seek the support of collaborationist capital circles and of those in favor of holding companies which support the U.S. expansionist policy in the Middle East and the aggressive plans of NATO. Kissinger's visit to Turkey is no coincidence, coming at a time when the United States has severed all diplomatic relations with Iran and is threatening Iran with military intervention.

ENVOY TO SEOUL--The president's private secretary, Erbil Akay, has been appointed ambassador to Seoul. Melih Ercen has been the Turkish ambassador to Seoul since 1972. Ambassador Ercin will continue to serve in Ankara. [Text] [Ankara Domestic Service in Turkish 1000 GMT 5 Apr 80 TA]

ISTANBUL MARTIAL LAW ARRESTS--The Istanbul Martial Law Command has announced that 45 members of the "Front Path" faction of the illegal terrorist organization, the Turkish People's Liberation Party Front, have been apprehended. According to preliminary interrogations the 45 persons are involved in five murders, various incidents where people were wounded, shootings at banks, arson attacks on cars and robberies. The 45 persons were apprehended with 10 pistols and 195 rounds of ammunition, printing presses, jewelry, fake identity cards and drivers' licences and 5,000 pamphlets. Six of the 45 persons are students, 11 are self-employed, 5 are civil servants, 12 are workers, 1 is a housewife and 10 are unemployed. [Ankara Domestic Service in Turkish 1600 GMT 4 Apr 80 TA]

ADDITIONAL MARTIAL LAW OPERATIONS--The 1st Army and the Istanbul Martial Law Command have issued a statement in connection with the persons captured in operations which the command has carried out since 21 March 1980. According to the statement, 16 members of the "Revolutionary Liberation" faction of the illegal terrorist organization, the Turkish People's Liberation Party Front, 13 members of the emergency group and 8 members of the Revolutionary Path Organization have been captured. Nineteen members of the "partisan" faction of the Turkish Communist Party Marxist-Leninist Organization, 4 members of the People's Path Organization, 28 members of the Turkish Revolutionary Communist Party and 8 members of the Turkish Revolutionary Communists Union have been captured. According to a preliminary interrogation these 96 persons have been involved in various incidents resulting in either the deaths and injuries of citizens, in armed clashes with the security forces, in setting up committees to build shanty towns, in throwing explosives at several banks and in raiding coffee shops and business premises. Seven of them are university students, 16 are high school students, 25 are workers, 2 are teachers, 3 are civil servants, 14 are self-employed and 28 are unemployed. ALLIES REJECT USSR PROTEST OVER WEST BERLIN ATTACK

[Text] Berlin--In connection with the bomb attack on the Soviet Consulate General in West Berlin on 7 March, the three Western allies have strongly rejected the Soviet Union's claim that they neglected their duties. On behalf of the governments of the United States, France and Great Britain, the U.S. Embassy in Moscow handed yesterday a corresponding reply to the Soviet protest note of 11 March. A statement by the allies released in Berlin today expresses "unqualified condemnation" of the attack. Such deeds can under no circumstances be justified. The facts, however, have made it clear "that the responsible allied authorities fulfilled all obligations due to the Soviet Consulate General in the Western sector of Berlin." They therefore also do not consider themselves liable for the resultant damage, as has been demanded by the Soviet Union.

The three powers reject as "clearly false" the Soviet Union's claim that they "encouraged hostile machinations against the Soviet Union in Berlin." They express their concern about charges made by Moscow that tensions have deliberately been created in Berlin. The three governments emphasize that they are continuing their endeavours to remove tensions and prevent complications in Berlin.

The Moscow Foreign Ministry had charged the Western allies with "inadmissible disregard of their direct obligations by the authorities of the three Western powers," and spoken of a violation of the Quadripartite Agreement. The statement by the Western allies now emphasizes that the allied authorities in the month preceding the attack acted with special care in order to insure the necessary protection of the consulate general and of its staff. For instance, U.S. officials had on several occasions discussed the security measures with members of the consulate. Shortly before the incident they expressed "full satisfaction" and emphasized that further security measures were not necessary. The statement assures the Soviet Government that, in future, all necessary steps will continue to be taken to protect Soviet installations and their staffs in the western sector of Berlin.

The attack, which allegedly was carried out by an Afghan rebel organization the "mojahedin," caused considerable damage in the consulate. Nobody was injured in the attack.

CANADA

ALLIES CONSULTED ON 'POSSIBLE ACTION AGAINST IRAN'

WA090032 London REUTER in English 0001 GMT 9 Apr 80 WA

[Excerpts] Ottawa, April 8, REUTER--Prime Minister Pierre Trudeau said today Canada was consulting its principal allies on possible further action against Iran and commended President Carter for his restraint over the American hostage situation. A three-paragraph statement released by Mr Trudeau's office said: "Active consideration is being given, in consultation with our principal allies, to the possibility of further action against Iran if that country continues to defy international law and custom by holding the American hostages." He did not say whether Canada would join an American trade boycott of Iran nor give any other details. He applauded Mr Carter's statesmanship and restraint in handling the hostage issue and expressed sympathy with his outrage.

AUSTRIAN, GDR TRADE UNIONS ISSUE JOINT COMMUNIQUE

LD032154 East Berlin ADN International Service in German 1554 GMT 3 Apr 80 LD

[Text] Vienna (ADN correspondent)--The trade unions of the GDR and Austria will intensify their commitment to the struggle to safeguard peace and achieve effective measures for arms control and disarmament. This is stated in a joint communique published in Vienna on Thursday at the end of the visit of a delegation of the FDGB Central Executive to Vienna. The delegation was headed by Harry Tisch, chairman of the FDGB Central Executive and a member of the SED Central Committee Politburo.

Both organizations attach great importance to the early ratification of the SALT II agreement and emphasize the importance of the Helsinki Final Act for Security and Cooperation in Europe. Both sides reject any attempt to reverse the results of the process of detente. They call for a businesslike and constructive preparation for the Madrid conference of representatives of the CSCE states.

FOREIGN MINISTER TO VISIT POLAND IN MID-APRIL

LD081345 Brussels LE SOIR in French 4 Apr 80 p 3 LD

[Unattributed report: "Mr Simonet in Poland Soon"]

[Text] Foreign Minister Henri Simonet will make an official visit to Poland from 15 through 17 April.

Mr Simonet will be the first foreign minister from a Western country to visit a socialist country since the Soviet intervention in Afghanistan.

His discussions with his interlocutors will be concerned mainly with East-West relations within the framework of the Madrid Conference on Security and Cooperation in Europe and on strategic arms limitation in Europe.

It is worth recalling that the Belgian Government is to make a definite decision at the NATO spring session on its participation in the program of deploying medium-range nuclear missiles.

IRANIAN EMBASSY OPENS SPECIAL TRADE BUREAU

LD091818 Hamburg DPA in German 1744 GMT 9 Apr 80 LD

[Text] Vienna--A special bureau has been set up at the Iranian Embassy in Vienna to deal with the purchase of foodstuffs and spare parts from West Europe. An embassy spokesman told the Austrian APA news agency today that the bureau would concentrate on purchases from neutral and nonalined states and would cooperate closely with the trade missions of Iranian embassies in Europe.

Tehran apparently wishes to sidestep the American trade embargo through this office. The spokesman added that Vienna was chosen on the basis of Iran's "good relations" with Austria. It was learned from the Austrian Foreign Ministry that the establishment of the bureau was a purely Iranian measure and that Austria maintained normal trade relations with Iran.

[Special DIE PRESSE report: "Iranian Purchasing Bureau Set Up in Vienna"]

[Text] Vienna--A special bureau was set up at the Iranian Embassy in Vienna early this week. It is to study the possibilities for the purchase of raw materials and finished goods. As the Iranian Embassy told the AUSTRIA PRESS AGENCY, Iran is also interested in the delivery of Austrian goods in view of Austria's neutrality. A Foreign Ministry spokesman told DIE PRESSE in this context that this was an internal measure of the embassy about which the Foreign Ministry had not been officially informed. However, he added, it is the task of any trade attache or trade delegate to pave the way for new business connections.

GROMYKO TO ATTEND STATE TREATY ANNIVERSARY

AU091211 Vienna DIE PRESSE in German 9 Apr 80 p 1 AU

[Andreas Unterberger report: "Gromyko's Acceptance: Four-Power Meeting at State Treaty"]

[Text] With Soviet Foreign Minister Andrey Gromyko's acceptance in principle of the Austrian invitation to attend the State Treaty anniversary celebrations, a meeting of all four signatory states in Vienna now seems possible after all. Of course Gromyko--as well as the foreign ministers of the United States, Great Britain and France--may call off his visit at any time if anything unexpected turns up, it is stated in Vienna.

The four ministers' meeting in Vienna around 15 May would be their first meeting since the outbreak of the Afghanistan crisis. Since on this occasion there might be direct talks among the ministers, the exact details of their Vienna program have not yet been fixed. At any rate, their participation in the Hofburg official anniversary ceremony and their attendance at the unveiling of a memorial plaque at Belvedere Palace is envisaged.

In addition to the four ministers, all State Treaty signatories who are still alive (foreign ministers and ambassadors of 1955) have been invited to Vienna. Moreover, the anniversary events will be attended by UN Secretary General Waldheim, UN General Assembly Chairman Salim (Tanzania), and Council of Europe Secretary General Karasek.

NO PLAN TO SEVER RELATIONS WITH IRAN 'AT PRESENT'

LD091430 Hamburg DPA in German 1401 GMT 9 Apr 80 LD

[Excerpts] Bonn--Bonn is not considering following the example of the United States in breaking off diplomatic relations with Iran "at present." This was stressed today by Government Spokesman Armin Gruenewald following a meeting of the Federal Cabinet which was chaired by Foreign Minister Hans-Dietrich Genscher in place of Federal Chancellor Helmut Schmidt who is still on holiday in northern Germany. According to Gruenewald, the Federal Government [words indistinct] will discuss with its EEC partners what economic boycott measures could be agreed upon.

According to Gruenewald, the Federal Government feels that the failure to date of the intensive efforts surrounding the U.S. hostages in Tehran had given rise to a "very critical" situation.

Gruenewald did not respond to a question by a U.S. correspondent as to whether the Federal Republic would approve of or even join in a U.S. naval blockade in the Persian Gulf. With regard to the German destroyers' planned visit to the Indian Ocean he stated that it is a completely normal visit and the ships would "naturally not" enter the crisis area. According to a Defense Ministry spokesman, at present there are 155 Iranian soldiers undergoing training in the Federal Republic.

State Secretary Guenther van Well of the Foreign Ministry briefed CDU Deputies Alois Mertes and Gerhard Kunz today on the U.S. measures against Iran. Mertes afterwards told DPA that the CDU/CSU expects the Federal Government to make rapid and considerable efforts in the EC so that the sanctions recommended even before the Soviet aggression in Afghanistan could be implemented. The deluded Iranian revolutionary leadership, after the abortive efforts of the last few weeks, will interpret any further "waiting by the humiliated U.S. superpower" and hence by the free West, as weakness and perplexity. In the view of the chairman of Bonn's CSU group, Friedrich Zimmermann, the Federal Government is trying to avoid solidarity action with the United States by hiding behind well-sounding words.

With regard to Afghanistan, the Federal Government's view was expressed at the Cabinet meeting that so far there has been no readiness on the part of the Soviet Union to begin serious talks on the modalities of a withdrawal by Soviet troops. On the contrary, the Soviet Union has increased its military activities in Afghanistan and is trying to "lend an aura of legality" to its occupation of Afghanistan by its agreement on troop deployment.

GOVERNMENT SPOKESMAN VIEWS POSSIBLE LOSS OF IRANIAN OIL

DW100741 Mainz ZDF Television Network in German 1700 GMT 9 Apr 80 DW

[Excerpt from 9 April press conference by Deputy Government Spokesman Armin Gruenewald in Bonn--recorded]

[Text] [Question] Iran has threatened those states which might support the U.S. measures with an oil boycott. In this context, how much oil do we currently buy from Iran and what would the loss of this oil mean to us?

[Answer] The amount went up slightly in January and February to a level of 10 percent of our imports, albeit not of our consumption. That was slightly higher. In all of 1979 it was about 10 percent of our imports, although not of our consumption.

[Question] What would the loss mean?

[Answer] Well, the 10 percent would be gone, would it not?

[Question] Could this possibly mean gasoline rationing, meaning, ration tickets?

[Answer] I do not want to indicate today that this is how it will be, but no question about it, this is no Easter stroll.

CDU'S MERTES SEES NEED FOR SOLIDARITY WITH U.S.

DW091312 Cologne DEUTSCHE WELLE in German to Europe 1430 GMT 8 Apr 80 DW

[Reporter Dieter Jepsen-Foege interview with CDU foreign policy spokesman Dr Alois Mertes in Bonn; date not given--recorded]

[Text] [Question] Dr Mertes, U.S. President Carter has announced immediate sanctions against Iran, particularly the breaking off diplomatic relations but also a ban on all exports from the United States to Iran. How do you assess this hard reaction?

[Answer] I fully understand this reaction. Iran has gravely violated a sacred right of international relations, namely, the inviolability of diplomats. The whole community of nations agrees on that. Out of responsibility for the hostages and also for peace, the United States has accepted with admirable patience unprecedented humiliation for more than 5 months. I therefore understand President Carter's having taken these measures in order to maintain the dignity, honor and international credibility of America and to preserve international law.

[Question] Dr Mertes, you say understanding. President Carter expects support from the Western allies in the conflict with Iran and the efforts to free the hostages. How do you think the Federal Republic should act? Should we also break diplomatic relations? Should we also take part in an economic boycott?

[Answer] This problem was the subject of talks and also agreement between the United States and its allies, including the FRG, once before. That was in early December when Secretary of State Vance was in Bonn to discuss this problem. The opposition fully supported the stance of the Federal Republic at that time; we were informed about it by the government. We expect that actions and not words will now continue to support the credibility of our most powerful ally through solidarity on our part. The power and determination of the United States is a prerequisite for peace and for the preservation of our security.

[Question] You say solidarity, but what does that mean in this situation following Carter's speech, following the announcement of sanctions?

[Answer] This may possibly mean complete identity of our measures. But it may also mean a variant in the U.S. measures. This has to be agreed on between the Federal Government and the U.S. Government in a dialog full of trust. What might ensue here is a division of labor similar to that on the issue of the reaction to the Soviet invasion of Afghanistan. We expect full and unbroken conformity in the agreement of the measures to be taken in this respect.

[Question] Being the opposition party, you would not at this time make any specific recommendations to the Federal Government in the way of, say, severance of diplomatic relations or the imposition of economic sanctions?

[Answer] You can give such advice responsibly only when you are familiar with the details. All we are familiar with is the speech by President Carter. We are familiar with the case history over the past 5 months, since the taking of the hostages. In December we declared our solidarity with the alliance and with the Federal Government in this question once we had been informed. Such information is not yet available. I think it would be careless to advance specific proposals to the Federal Government here.

[Question] Dr Mertes, how do you judge the prospects that Iran will now release the hostages under the pressure brought to bear by the United States? After all, this is what the President hopes to achieve.

[Answer] Iran, its government leadership, will now be facing very serious problems. In the north of Iran the Soviet Union is standing by, ready to invade. Iran will have to realize and to decide whether it will give priority to its irrational, uncontrolled hatred for the United States or to the preservation of the Iranian people which they believed they have liberated from a burden and on which they are now imposing heavy internal and external burdens whose outcome nobody can yet predict. Ultimately the unity of Iran is in jeopardy. All of us know that the Soviet Union wanted to seize part of Iran after 1945. The problems which Iran faces today go far beyond the destiny of Iran itself. We shall see whether the men who rely so much on Allah and Muhammad will in fact act in responsibility to God and peace.

CDU DEPUTY VIEWS OPTIONS IN TRADE CUTS WITH IRAN

DW100943 Cologne Deutschlandfunk Network in German to East and West Germany 0519 GMT 9 Apr 80 DW

[Correspondent Christian Berg interview with CDU Bundestag Deputy Karl-Heinz Narjes in Bonn; date not given--recorded]

[Text] [Question] Does the German economy or the Federal Government have any options for bringing pressure to bear on Iran, on its Islamic government, in the form of economic sanctions?

[Answer] Germany alone would wield only limited influence in this respect, because the question can only be whether we can contribute toward the objective of the political and economic isolation of Iran jointly with our partners in the European Community, in NATO, with the United States and, beyond that, with as many states of the United Nations as possible.

[Question] What form would this take in the case of the Federal Republic in the event the German economy or the Federal Government decided to go through with it?

[Answer] President Carter's decision to cut off negotiations because of their futility is but 36 hours old. We are not yet familiar with the precise contents of his idea about instituting an economic boycott. We are aware of an earlier decision by the UN Security Council which has already dealt with such a trade ban against Iran but which failed due to the Soviet Union's veto in early January. If we take this decision as a basis for our considerations, for example, then I believe that despite the protestations of the incumbent economics minister of this revolutionary government in Iran--and what else could he say indeed--the implementation of such a universally observed boycott is bound to mean tangible disadvantages for Iran.

[Question] Trade with Iran has decreased considerably from the German side anyway, but obviously the members of the European Community still have a considerable share in supplying commodities which are vital to Iran in the true sense of the word. What I mean is foodstuffs and commodities needed daily. Is it conceivable at all that trade in these goods would be discontinued altogether?

[Answer] Naturally you can answer the question of whether this is conceivable in the affirmative in abstract terms. Whether it is feasible in practical terms or whether it is expedient to go up to this point is a different question.

It is now a matter of stating in cooperation with our partners of the European Community--and this is a classic case of cooperation among the Nine--to what extent we can and want to take part in the American wishes. I repeat that at the moment, as far as I know, they have not been definitely outlined. But what we will do thereafter ought to be quickly decided, without hesitation and delays or halfhearted action and unclear statements which would spoil the effect.

[Question] I hear in your answer a certain skepticism as to whether such a total economic boycott vis-a-vis Iran would make sense.

[Answer] At the United Nations all Western partners voted for such a decision. I do not know exactly whether they will still abide by it today. I care very much about cohesion. Therefore, first of all, I want to see what can be done in agreement, aside from details such as whether pharmaceutical products will be exempted, for example, and what kind of foodstuffs will be exempted and a few other things. Aside from such details I still believe that just the ban on spare parts, for example, and that similar measures could inflict considerable disadvantages on the Iranian economy.

[Question] Suppose the Western allies decide to take such a measure. Don't we need to fear that what will happen is that Iranian Economics Minister Salimi has declared, namely, that the countries of the East bloc will declare their readiness to fill the gap? Salimi has said that the GDR would be receptive to increased economic cooperation with Iran.

[Answer] This has to be expected because it was the GDR and the Soviet Union, after all, which foiled the UN resolution in January. But then we would have to assess the problems in a broader interrelation. After all, what matters here is not just the question of solidarity with the United States in a conflict, in a bilateral conflict between Tehran and Washington, but the community under international law at large, the manner and mode of how all civilized nations endeavor in solidarity to make the institutions of international law prevail whenever they are threatened. If we allow the law of foreign missions, which is the most primitive and oldest in international law, to be trampled and the blackmailer to utter threats to boot, then nobody can speak of peace policy any longer without experiencing a bitter taste. Then this also means that the hour of truth will have come for the Soviet Union in the East bloc as to whether it wants to actively support and adopt this trampling on this elementary international law by the Iranian Government.

[Question] You said the most important prerequisite would be cohesion in the Western camp with regard to measures. If such boycott measures are to be applied, they must to be sure in effect contain the principle of success. In other words, you must certainly assume that--if Iran should be boycotted--there really should be no trade. Do you believe that this can be achieved? Isn't the history of boycott measures so far actually evidence for the fact that they have not been adhered to at all?

[Answer] It is true that a boycott will be effective only if it is implemented effectively and if as many parties as possible take part in it. We can find that out only by looking at every product. I do not fully agree with your assessment of earlier boycott measures. Decisive political effects have been achieved by boycott measures in history.

We always forget, for example, that Japan's entering the war against the United States in 1941 to a great extent was the result of the American boycott on shipping strategic goods to Japan. This is just an example showing that a boycott can actually be effective.

Whether an effective boycott will take place this time can be determined only--and this is why I made my introductory remarks--by viewing the structure and composition of trade individually, and particularly once one has found out which products needed by Iran can come only from the West, so that they cannot be replaced by shipments from the GDR, the East bloc or the Soviet Union.

Moreover, we should not forget that the Iranians are not particularly enthusiastic about being exposed only to the Soviet Union and to being dependent on it. The Afghanistan conflict has clearly demonstrated the great reservations the Revolutionary Government of Iran has about the policy of the Soviet Union. If Iran were now to turn toward the Soviet Union, it would become dependent on a most unloved and overly powerful northern neighbor. That cannot be Iran's aim. It is, therefore, in a greater dilemma than it admits externally.

U.S. ALLIES SHOULD HELP AVOID THE WORST OVER IRAN

DW091207 Frankfurt FRANKFURTER RUNDSCHAU in German 9 Apr 80 p 3 DW

[Hans-Herbert Gaebel editorial: "Before the Open Conflict"]

[Text] Trade between the United States and Iran in past months has shrunk to insignificance anyway. Iranian assets have been frozen and the disruption of diplomatic relations has only ended an unprecedentedly absurd relationship where one end of the diplomatic line was lost in an Iranian people's prison. So far President Carter's sanctions against Iran are rather moderate, even though they seem wild at first glance.

He had to do something effective in public since, in actuality, he was not dealing with the well-meaning though terribly weak representatives of the Iranian governmental apparatus who nevertheless spoke as if they had something to say, but rather with the militant clergy and the occupiers of the embassy who represent all different colors, and because of the fact that this has now definitely become clear. The American President was no longer able to accept the endless humiliations. Until this Easter weekend he had withstood the changes from hope to maliciousness with a good and finally almost devout attitude; but he is a politician who is also the President of the hostages in Tehran. He wants to be reelected and he must take the growing unrest of his compatriots into consideration.

But he is facing adversaries who see the world through bunker slits. They want to keep the crisis boiling. They still believe they can get their hands on the shah in this way and at the same time be able to continue the revolution, whatever that may mean in that contradictory country. Carter is now supplying them with the image of an enemy which they urgently need. Khomeyni almost thanked the Americans for it.

These comparatively mild sanctions may not be all. Early this year the U.S. Government considered taking tougher action. The arguments of friends and probably also their own insight were stronger at that time. But since the newest sanctions will most likely help the hostages as little as all the earlier countermoves, the temptation can become overly powerful to apply violence, such as blocking access to Iranian ports.

The prophets who predicted that the great conflict was still in the offing seem to be right. Khomeyni and his believers are not concerned by the fact that they might force the center of the Mideastern quake from Afghanistan back to their country again, thus, in a certain way, almost justifying the invasion of the Red Army. The American President can be as careful as he wants to now, but it will be hard for him to retreat and any forward move will lead him directly into an open conflict.

Khomeyni and his people have demonstrated in the past weeks, and not merely to the archenemy United States, how little they are of this world and how inaccessible to normal reasoning. They have rebuffed much good will. The UN secretary general, the European Community, influential countries such as the Federal Republic have tried to help the hostages and avoid the open conflict that was coming closer and closer. It was an effort made in vain because the official Iranian representatives abroad have so little to say at home. Just one person is in possession of the truth against the stupid and evil rest of the world. That cannot work.

This will make it more and more difficult for the allies of America to dodge Washington's expectation of clear solidarity. A blockade of Iranian ports, for example, if it is supposed to be effective at all, must be supported by the most important trade nations, or else it must be implemented against them. The attempt to contain the twin crises in the Middle East, which has been pursued so far with some success, would then probably have to be disrupted.

Because of the great inflammability of Iranian oil, and also because of the Soviets, who would be the winners, America's allies, at least the reasonable among them, still have good reason to do their share to avoid the worst. But for America's friends there are limits which are becoming tighter and tighter due to loyalty to the alliance, on the one hand, and stupidity on the other. President Carter in his Monday speech announced that his government will coordinate further steps with the allies. But the law of action has so far been clearly on the side of Tehran. Washington's intention to turn that around can change more than just the relations between the United States and Iran.

SCHMIDT WILL HAVE TO 'MAKE UNPLEASANT DECISIONS' OVER IRAN

DW091255 Frankfurt FRANKFURTER ALLGEMEINE in German 9 Apr 80 p 1 DW

[Article signed VCK.: "Bonn Is Challenged"]

[Text] Will the Europeans join the American sanctions against Iran? It will depend particularly on Bonn and Paris as to how the heavily battered confidence between Europe and the United States develops in the future. How England could take part in the American measures against the dictatorship of the mullahs was examined on Tuesday in London. In Bonn, however, there is still an embarrassing silence. In Bonn, America is primarily considered the one responsible for protecting Western oil interests on the Persian Gulf. French President Giscard d'Estaing objected in a vague way to the American Mideast policy while in several Arab countries on the Persian Gulf recently. Giscard d'Estaing and Schmidt have agreed so far on the comfortable opinion that Europe could limit itself to verbal protests in the political struggle for the fate of the American diplomats in Tehran.

The American policy toward the East may not always have been very fortunate. Some Europeans would have sometimes wished that the American President had a more secure and firm hand on the Iranian crisis. But if one compares him with the Europeans, Carter in his Iranian policy has almost the courage of a lion. [paragraph continues]

America does not depend as fully on the oil of the Arab countries on the Persian Gulf as Western Europe. These countries will tailor their future policy vis-a-vis the West according to the determination and unity with which the leading Western states act in the Iranian crisis.

Iraq is certainly not a friend of the Western democracies. But the Iraqis have an almost traditional enmity with the Iranians. Fearful weakness by the West vis-a-vis Tehran does not impress them. The oil monarchs of the Arabian Peninsula have an even worse opinion of Ayatollah Khomeyni. In the coming weeks all these countries will look not only at Paris, but most of all at Bonn. Schmidt will have to make up his mind to make unpleasant decisions, although it will probably not fit into his political plans.

FRANKFURTER ALLGEMEINE NOTES MARXIST INFLUENCE IN IRAN

DW100757 Frankfurt FRANKFURTER ALLGEMEINE in German 10 Apr 80 p 1 DW

[Commentary signed VCK.: "What Will Europe Do"]

[Text] For the time being the effect of the U.S. sanctions on the daily life of the Iranians may be slight. Yet the decision by President Carter not to trust further excuses and protestations from Tehran any longer has changed the situation. The political leadership team in Iran will be viewed with more critical eyes in the future, not only in the United States but also in Europe. The fairy tale promoted by smart specialists of the Soviet services for deceptive information that the Iranian Revolution is determined solely by the spiritual values of the Islamic religion is gradually losing its convincing force for naive minds in the West. The men surrounding the old Ayatollah Khomeyni maintain excellent relations with the communist Tudeh Party. The information about influential Marxists in the inner circle around Khomeyni, about whom the military correspondent of this newspaper reports from Brussels citing an often well-informed source, appears to be credible indeed.

It is inevitable that the community of the Iranian and Soviet interests will gain even greater significance in the future as a result of the intensification of the U.S. sanctions even if both Moscow and Tehran seek to camouflage that as they have in the past. For the Europeans this makes the compulsion all the more embarrassing to decide either for Washington or for Tehran. The Americans are right when they remind the European allies that a refusal of solidarity with the United States in the Iranian crisis will jeopardize the future oil supply of Western Europe. Europe can do without the Iranian oil, but not without the energy policy community with the United States.

The Iranian crisis has been plunged into the most dangerous phase only up to this point through the cooperation of Ayatollah Khomeyni with the kidnappers, a cooperation hardly camouflaged anymore. Terrorists have attacked embassies and declared diplomatic hostages in many states of the world. But the fact that the most influential man in the state--and this is why Khomeyni still is in Iran--publicly approves such an act of terror and covers the hostage-taking criminals is unique. President Carter is being forced by the Iranians into harsher and harsher reactions, whether he likes it or not. And how will Europe behave?

CARTER'S OTHER MEASURES HAVE IMPLICATIONS FOR EUROPE

DW091225 Munich SUEDDEUTSCHE ZEITUNG in German 9 Apr 80 p 4 DW

[Klaus Arnsperger Washington dispatch: "Carter's Limited Options"]

[Text] With the severance of diplomatic relations with Tehran the U.S. President has introduced another phase in the Iran crisis which has now been dragging on for 5 months. [paragraph continues]

Meanwhile, nobody in the United States believes this step will lead to an early release of the 50 hostages who have been held captive in Tehran since last November. A close look will show that the other sanctions imposed on Iran by Jimmy Carter are more of symbolic character than of practical value. The cutoff of trade with the United States will not hit the rulers in Tehran as long as Iranian oil continues to find buyers in Western Europe and Japan. The fact that Carter now wants to use the estimated $8 billion in Iranian assets, which have been frozen in U.S. banks since November 1979, to cover the claims of domestic companies and citizens on Tehran will not free the hostages any earlier. But the President has tightened the screws a few turns.

The Iranian crisis, which from the outset moved the Americans in a deeper and stronger manner than the Russian invasion of Afghanistan, now stands revealed in all its dangerousness for the world. Carter's measures, which at first glance appear to be comparably harmless, serve no other goal than to make it clear to the Iranian rulers that the U.S. reserves of peaceful means for liberating the hostages are gradually running out. Granted, Carter was careful not to make outright threats of military force. Since the beginning of the hostages' captivity nothing has changed in the fundamental consideration that any attempt to liberate them by a coup would seriously jeopardize their lives. But this time Carter ventured farther ahead than he has ever done before: In the event the actions now decided upon do not lead to the "speedy" release of the hostages, the President plans to resort to "other measures."

To leave no option for the liberation of his 50 compatriots untried, Carter, in the past several months, has endured impatient criticism from his own country and degrading humiliations from Iran. In a way Carter is carrying the cross for 200 million Americans from whose midst not a single reasonable proposal has been forthcoming to this day for a different course of action in this situation without endangering the lives of the hostages. In part the President's changing attitude was the result of a changing situation in Iran, but it was also a result of the compulsion to have political regard for the vital interests of the Japanese and West European allies who would be plunged into economic chaos by a sudden exhaustion of the Iranian oilwells as a consequence of an airtight U.S. blockade or punitive military action. Again America's public would have shown little understanding if the President had not exploited all chances for coming to terms with the new head of state, Bani-Sadr, who has been in office since January and who appears to be receptive to understanding.

But considering the latest developments, the impotence of Bani-Sadr and the stubborn inflexibility of Ayatollah Khomeyni cannot be doubted any longer. The hostages' situation is deteriorating due to the fact that they not only represent pawns in the internal Iranian power struggle, but they are more often also becoming objects of the U.S. election campaign--even though nearly all U.S. politicians, with extraordinary self-restraint, have so far refrained from turning the topic into a domestic weapon against Carter. Meanwhile, however, there are many indications that the U.S. public is threatening to lose patience with its President. It wants to see action, even if it does not know what kind of action. As a result, the compulsion to act becomes stronger every day the elections draw nearer. His political destiny would probably be sealed if the prisoners of Tehran are still not free by August, at the time of the Democratic nominating convention.

Which "other measures" Carter has available today is a real question of fate for the entire Western alliance. The answer to this question is no less important for Western Europe than it is for the United States. If we set aside the fate of the hostages for a moment, it turns out that the Russian invasion of Afghanistan has narrowed down the military options of the Americans considerably: The occupation of even a part of Iran, even if it were expressly limited in duration, is no longer conceivable without immediate Russian counteraction. Hence, the fanatic Ayatollah Khomeyni has succeeded in turning Iran into a new, world political powder keg. [paragraph continues]

Conceivably the mining of Iranian oil ports or a selective sea blockade which would make allowances for Western Europe's and Japan's dependency is the ultimate U.S. step short of military confrontation with the Soviet Union. At their forthcoming conference the EC governments will be facing serious decisions: Should the United States take up arms because of the hostages, the lights would first go out in Europe.

GDR, WEST BERLIN OFFICIALS MEET FOR TALKS

LD081700 East Berlin ADN International Service in German 1437 GMT 8 Apr 80 LD

[Text] West Berlin--The head of department in the GDR Ministry for Foreign Affairs, Ambassador Dr Walter Mueller, and Senator Gerhard Junze, delegate of the West Berlin Senat, met for a discussion on Tuesday in West Berlin's Schoeneberg Town Hall. The discussion involved issues relating to relations between the GDR and West Berlin. The meeting took place in a businesslike atmosphere.

GENSCHER TO ATTEND ZIMBABWE INDEPENDENCE CEREMONY

LD091044 Hamburg DPA in German 0943 GMT 9 Apr 80 LD

[Text] Bonn--Federal Foreign Minister Hans-Dietrich Genscher will attend Zimbabwe Rhodesia's independence ceremonies in Salisbury on 18 April. This was confirmed by the Bonn Foreign Ministry today.

The Foreign Ministry statement stresses that in this way the Federal Government is expressing its will to cooperate with the new state. It believes that Zimbabwe will play an important political and economic role in southern Africa. The settlement of the Rhodesian problem by means of negotiations and implementation of the Zimbabwe people's right to self-determination in free and fair elections are encouraging signs of peace and stability being brought to the region.

PLO OFFICIAL ASKS FOR CURTAILMENT OF MOSAAD IN FRG

[Excerpt from statement of 'Abdullah al-Franji, PLO representative in Bonn; date not given--recorded]

[Text] I appeal to the Federal Republic of Germany to do all it can to prevent the activity of the Israeli intelligence service. The Israelis are trying to recruit the Palestinians who have sought asylum and who are living here so as to send them back to Beirut or back to Arab countries, probably with the intention of torpedoing the improved relations between Germany and the Arab world and also with the Palestinians, probably also in order to bring the fighting back to German territory again.

FEAR OF IRANIAN 'CASTROISM' PROMPTS EUROPEAN CAUTION

LD1011355 Paris LE MONDE in French 10 Apr 80 p 1 LD

[Editorial: "Understandable Reservations"]

[Text] Washington clearly needs its allies in order to bring Iran to a settlement: Indeed, the sanctions taken against Tehran would remain largely symbolic if Europe did not back them. In a way Washington is pointing out that, without the Soviet veto, the UN Security Council would have voted for retaliatory measures in mid-January and these have been rendered even more mustified by the development of the crisis.

The United States is suggesting in particular reducing to a minimum the staffs in the Islamic Republic's diplomatic missions, imposing an almost total trade embargo (the only exceptions being food and pharmaceutical products), canceling all forms of credit and boycotting aircraft and ships registered in Iran. President Carter had taken the precaution of sending a letter to his main allies informing them of what he intended to do if negotiations with Tehran were to fail. The U.S. ambassadors in Bonn and London notably reminded their interlocutors on Tuesday of Washington's desire to see its special allies show a little more cooperation in the Iranian affair. Paris and Tokyo have not been forgotten, even though the State Department does not have too many illusions about them.

Initial reactions are not very encouraging for Mr Carter. Britain which, with Canada, is prepared to go furthest in supporting U.S. action, is one of the European countries most dependent on Iranian oil which, despite the relative autonomy provided by North Sea production, somewhat limits its field of action.

The FRG, which is still Iran's main Western economic partner, also has interests to preserve, while Japan alone imports almost as much Iranian oil as all the nine EEC countries do together.

Moreover, Paris is emphasizing the fact that the Nine had already envisaged diplomatic action against Iran last November but that these measures were rejected in order not to close all channels of communication with Tehran and to protect European nationals staying in the country.

The Americans are prepared to make the best of things for a few days at least and give their partners time to think and consult with each other.

There is, moreover, still some hope that the Nine might manage to reach a joint position which would go a little further than the soothing words dispensed so far. Consultation within the EEC should be fairly quick. Despite its wish not to give the impression of rushing its allies, the United States is nonetheless leaking some remarks which look very much like pressure. Washington is making it known that the Europeans have no interest in weighing their oil supplies against Western solidarity since they have no guarantee that these supplies will definitely be maintained.

In addition to considering their own interests, the U.S. allies could point out that, for reasons connected largely to public opinion pressure, the U.S. leaders are taking a dangerous path.

Some 20 years ago President Eisenhower helped to throw Cuba into the USSR's arms by taking very severe economic sanctions. Arousing an Iranian form of Castroism would have such serious consequences for the United States and the entire West that it is easy to understand the reservations felt by allies who certainly feel solidarity but are forced to be cautious.

LE MONDE: CARTER'S SANCTIONS ON IRAN 'LARGELY SYMBOLIC'

LD091209 Paris LE MONDE in French 9 Apr 80 p 1 LD

[Editorial: "A Dangerous Maneuver"]

[Text] The retaliatory measures against Iran solemnly announced by President Carter Monday evening are largely symbolic since they affect spheres in which relations between the two countries have been virtually nonexistent for several months. For instance, breaking off diplomatic relations has a powerful emotional impact but does not fundamentally change relations between Washington and Tehran which obviously no longer follow conventional diplomacy.

The same remark holds true for trade relations. U.S. exports to Iran had fallen to $1.8 million in March--an insignificant figure compared with the monthly average of $500 million in 1978. The decision to draw up a list of all Iranian public assets in the United States, and of private assets which are now exposed to claims by ordinary citizens or companies which have suffered losses in Iran, is also more an interim measure than a real sanction. Only the refusal to renew current visas could have specific serious consequences for the tens of thousands of Iranian students in the United States, at least if it is applied as "strictly" as Mr Carter wishes.

President Carter, who is criticized on his right by Ronald Reagan, his most credible Republican rival in the White House race, and even attacked on his left by a liberal "dove" like Mr McGovern, had to "do something." Nobody in the upper echelons of the U.S. administration seriously believe that the sanctions announced Monday will make a positive contribution to the hostages' release. However, there is no doubt that as a presidential candidate Mr Carter could not easily wait much longer.

The U.S. President was also shocked by the casual way in which the official Iranian leaders passed their responsibilities onto the Revolution Council and Imam Khomeyni.

Nonetheless, the new Iranian-U.S. crisis will help to strengthen the radical wing of the Tehran regime and hence the supporters of a "permanent revolution" in that country. The tension developing with Iraq also serves this wing, especially since the threat of a military confrontation seems real.

President Bani-Sadr undoubtedly came off worst in Tehran Monday, since he has clearly staked his authority on obtaining the hostages' transfer to government control in exchange for a promise of noninterference from the United States. The president's plan was thwarted by a clever campaign waged by the "hard-line" elements in the Revolution Council led by Ayatollah Beheshti of the Islamic Republican Party, which will probably dominate the Iranian Parliament and limit the president's freedom of action.

The economic measures taken by Washington are regarded as beneficial by the most intransigent Iranian leaders since, according to them, they will enable the country to build a more independent economy. They would only be really damaging if West Europe were to aline with the United States. The Iranians would then have no other choice than to turn to the industrialized states in the socialist camp, above all, the USSR.

Despite his hostility to "international communism," which he denounced a few days ago, Imam Khomeyni, like An-Nasir before him, could lower the tone of his ideological and political hostility and make a pact with all those who would help Iran resist the American "big Satan."

LEGISLATORS TO DEBATE U.S.-IRAN SITUATION

AU100925 Rome ANSA in English 0825 GMT 10 Apr 80 AU

[Excerpt] Rome, April 10 (ANSA)--The Social Democrats (PSDI) (Cossiga's erstwhile government partners in the preceding government, which also included the Liberal Party--PLI) filed a question in Parliament yesterday calling on the new government to commit itself to "publicly demonstrating" its solidarity with the United States in the U.S.-Iran hostage crisis.

Observers here view the tone of the PSDI document as such that it may spark reservations within the PSI [Italian Socialist Party] and the parliamentary debate on this problem could trigger a rift within the government coalition.

DC [Christian Democrat] Flaminio Piccoli wrote an article appearing in today's issue of the party mouthpiece IL POPOLO dealing with these issues and the speedy solution of the government crisis. Piccoli observed that the problems facing the new government "are many and urgent and do not leave room for uncertainty...because the international situation does not leave time". The DC secretary appealed to the parties of the new majority to base government management not only on paperwork but also on political willingness.

Meanwhile the rightwing faction of former DC Minister Vito Scalia issued a statement yesterday criticizing the new government lineup and said that the two traditional allies of the party of the relative majority, the PSDI and PLI have been "lacerated".

The editor-in-chief of the Communist Party weekly RINASCITA Luciano Barca wrote in the latest issue that the second Cossiga cabinet is "ambiguous, ambivalently clever and uncertain". The Communist Party's criticism of the new government was also underscored by Aldo Tortorella in a televised debate last night with DC member Gian Aldo Arnaud. Tortorella spoke of "malgovernment" and "multiplication of ministries and undersecretaries", while Arnaud replied that the new government is not considered satisfactory even by the DC which would have preferred "a wider ranging solidarity of democratic parties".

ITALIAN DEPENDENCE ON IRANIAN OIL DECREASING

[Text] Rome, April 10 (ANSA)--Iran's importance in Italian oil supplies decreased considerably in 1979, dropping to 2.2 million tons compared to 14 million in 1978. This essential factor has attenuated alarm in Italian economic circles over the scope of a possible suspension of Iranian crude exports in the wake of the growing tension between Iran and the United States.

The break in diplomatic relations between the United States and Iran had sparked concern for potential disruption of the Italian economy. Iran has threatened to cut off oil from any country which takes part in economic sanctions. The problem, which is of a political nature, will probably be discussed within European Economic Community (EEC) forums.

While modest, Iran's oil supplies to Italy (two percent in 1979 compared to 13 percent in 1978), are nevertheless a slice of the country's vital energy needs.

The Libyan Jamahiriyah has recently decided to cut back its production of oil by twenty percent, meaning Italy will receive annually three million tons of crude less from the north African country. Current forecasts pin Italy's oil deficit for 1980 at about five million 250 thousand tons of crude.

PCI'S PAJETTA JUSTIFIES DECISION TO FOREGO PARIS MEETING

LD091345 Rome L'UNITA in Italian 4 Apr 80 p 8 LD

[Apparent text of PCI Directorate member Gian Carlo Pajetta 2 April speech at PCI National Council meeting in Rome: "New Dimension of Our Internationalism"]

[Text] Our party's leadership bodies have taken--and certainly not lightly--an important decision whose significance will be felt by all our comrades and which must be discussed further in all our organizations and with the workers. We believe that it too can form part of the debate and mobilization for the election campaign and must remind us of our responsibility and commitment.

Comrade Cossutta has already announced the decision taken jointly by our party Directorate and regional secretaries. I feel that what has been said has been clear and that it must become increasingly clear in the weeks ahead to all our party's leaders and members. Though this work has already been started, we would like, nevertheless, to further clarify our stance to all workers' parties, liberation movements and forces with which we have worked and fought for so many years and with which--we wish to stress this forcefully--we intend to continue working and fighting for peace, socialism, detente and international cooperation, for peace throughout the world.

First, it must be said that we consider that the decision taken is consistent with the policy which we have been pursuing for years and which we have not been alone in pursuing. In this connection, it seems to us legitimate to invoke the experience of the workers movement, the decisions taken explicitly together with other revolutionary parties and movements and--looking even further back, as far as the communist parties are concerned--the essential decisions taken unanimously, such as the decision to dissolve the Third International. Of course we are not disowning that experience. Comintern was a vanguard, an organization of combatants within which there developed leadership cadres such as Palmiro Togliatti, Dolores Ibarruri, Tito, Ho Chi Minh--men and women, international revolutionaries and patriots who made an original and enthusiastic contribution to political formulation and struggle. And this is why they left a living mark in their countries and throughout the world. The dissolution of Comintern was certainly no announcement of a failure. I believe it was in fact perhaps the highest point reached by a movement which was performing, through the harshest and most glorious struggle (the antifascist war), its role as a unitary vanguard and which, for that very reason, could believe that the time had come to break away from an obsolete system so as to exert a greater and better influence together with other forces on a very harsh situation--open, nevertheless, to prospects of peace, liberation and the advance to socialism.

Of course I do not now want to recount the history of the workers and communist movement, but we must not forget the difficulties and frictions--which sometimes became splits, conflicts and even tragedies--of that process. We know what delays and damage occurred when people forgot or failed fully to understand the lesson of an internationalism which should reject the single model and the single leadership, which should admit a dialectic composed of joint work and orginal contributions--an internationalism which should reflect a not merely respectful solidarity, but one enriched by every country's real independence and every party's real autonomy. This led to conflicts which seemed irreparable--let us recall 1948--and to still persisting antagonisms which others, excluding ourselves, perhaps believe cannot end. We would point out here that the imminent visit to China by a delegation from our party bears witness both to our tenacity and to our hope. [paragraph continues]

It bears witness to what we have learned through very harsh experiences--namely, that the ever broader unity of the workers' and revolutionary movement is an essential element which must be safeguarded and revived when it lapses. As far as we are concerned, this unity does not imply absolute sameness, just as joint action does not imply monolithism to us. We have always regarded this unity as a previous asset, just as we have devoted increasing attention to these issues.

The antifascist uprising of the partisan war and the liberation, to which so many different forces contributed, would have been impossible without unity. The unity of the socialists and communists--when this has been properly achieved--has been one of the essential factors enabling the united workers movement to rally new alliances. And again now unity with the liberation movements has a profound significance and importance for us--not only because of the relations which bind us to them, but also because of the repercussions caused by the unity, this solidarity, in every country. Let everyone in Italy note the example of our fraternal relations with the PLO, the positive results which our work has achieved in the convergence among our country's democratic forces on a platform of solidarity with the Palestinian people's inalienable rights, in a joint struggle to eliminate a now intolerable scourge from the heart of the Mediterranean.

Of course unity is not easy. History has taught us this. Let us merely consider the war in Algeria, when communists and socialists were alined with opposite camps--those who were with the government, ministers and administrators and those who expressed solidarity with the Algerian people. These were such complex processes that not even the Communist Party fully managed to gain acknowledgement of its solidarity with the FLN [National Liberation Front], which represented the Algerian revolution and led it to victory.

Acting Together With Other Forces

Let us consider, as a positive example, the unity built around Vietnam. We welcomed it as an effective point of convergence for the entire workers movement, for communist parties all over the world--and this is how it was for many years. At one time this unity also embraced the vast majority of Italian citizens. It was achieved partly because we saw a sign from the Vietnamese comrades that they wanted not only to reunify the country but also to gather around themselves a broad alinement of different political and social forces.

As far as we are concerned, the role of the communist parties--even which still represent only limited forces--is to be constantly a unitary vanguard. This does not imply obscuring one's own specific quality as communists. What it does mean is rejecting delay, smashing isolation, exerting an autonomous role, acting together with other forces and regenerating oneself. Let us recall the experience of Cuba, where a vanguard of communists who did, after all, prove their capacity for struggle and sacrifice, realized that others, despite their different ideological framework and tradition, could not only cooperate, but could even constitute a decisive force and become the leading force for a revolutionary transformation.

And is it not perhaps extraordinary what has been achieved in the direction of once unforeseeable innovation by movements which have developed outside Comintern--I am thinking about Mozambique, Zimbabwe and Nicaragua? These experiences strengthen our hope but, conversely, also create a need for criticism and self-criticism where results have been negative, where people believed that internationalism could wait and that somebody else would essentially perform the task which everyone must perform in their own country by establishing deep roots among the working classes. [paragraph continues]

This is why even today we reassert--in the quest for new world balances based on detente--the value of the October Revolution and the existence of the Soviet Union, though there are secondary aspects or actions with which we disagree and toward which we are explicitly critical, as therefore seems right. We are pointing all this out, while bearing in mind that everyone has his own tasks and can have an original function. This applies to the great Soviet Union; it applies also, for instance, to the much smaller Yugoslavia which has succeeded, proceeding from its own experience and the originality of its research, in pursuing a policy capable of stretching across all continents--the option of non-alinement as a hypothesis not only for preventing an empire, imperialism, from being able to dominate the world, but also for rejecting the illusion that bipolarism is the ultimate possible goal, ruling out conflict.

As far as we are concerned, we have always done our internationalist duty, working with all our strength with a desire to make an autonomous, positive contribution, without ignoring the existence of diversities. We can certainly not be accused of lacking modesty if we recall once again Togliatti's work and the Yalta memorandum, if we recall party Chairman Luigi Longo's life and his leadership. And we would here like to recall how Comrade Enrico Berlinguer, on instructions from our party Directorate and after lengthy discussions, signed among the documents at the 1969 world conference in Moscow only that part which the Italian Communists considered it right to approve.

Our thoughts on the present situation are linked to all this and we must proceed from this to explain our decisions to the comrades. And we must make all this part of our constant struggle for disarmament and peace and against the danger of nuclear disaster and mankind's annihilation. We can claim to have achieved some results in this struggle. Among these we must not forget what has always been our stance--even when the harshest polemic raged--with respect to the Chinese Communists. At that time--and indeed now, on many issues--our stances differed. But always--at every international meeting--we have rejected the policy of issuing anathematization and excommunication and even of taking joint decisions affecting a party unable or unwilling to attend those meetings. We did this in the belief that China's isolation could not constitute a valid point of departure for a longer-term foreign policy.

We feel it is important now to recall the Berlin conference, the initiation and realization of which was precisely carried out by the Polish comrades, with our participation. It is important to remember Berlin, which was not composed merely of speeches by party secretaries general and not only of the final resolution. We wish to point out the value of the lengthy preparations and the manner in which preparations were carried out. The long 2 year's work which preceded it was not futile. I remember when representatives of all the European communist parties (including the Yugoslav comrades, for the first time after so many years) met in Warsaw. First of all we began to discuss whether a European conference was opportune, whether it would be useful and what form it should take. We subsequently proceeded from that discussion and achieved the unanimous approval (though not everyone expressed it with equal enthusiasm) of the principle that, since there is no international organization of communist parties, no documents would be approved and no decisions would be taken by a majority. This was called the principle of consensus. And we also agreed unanimously on another principle--that the documents approved (it being obvious that none of them could contain everything that any one party would have liked) should contain everything which--and only that which--the communist parties could express jointly. And this proved to be considerable.

Neither Masters Nor Pupils

This is what we remember about the Berlin conference, which we consider as much of a success now as we did then. Just as we consider a success--for ourselves and for other communist parties--the fact that new and distant countries, once far from the minds of ordinary people and perhaps even from the minds of those who used to leaf through an atlas at school, have managed to become active members of the world community and participants in international solidarity. When we took the decision which Comrade Cossutta has announced to you, our intention was certainly not to do less in an internationalist direction, but more. We have always wanted--and still want--communist parties to be able to communicate with each other, to understand each other, when possible, and to work together, when necessary. Until very recently we said (and this became almost a ritual): "We have relations with all communist parties, apart from the Chinese and Albanians." I take this opportunity to express a hope regarding Albania also. But it is certain that we are now witnessing a step forward in relations with a major country and a major communist party such as the CCP.

The new dimension of our internationalism embraces the entire workers' movement--communists, socialists, social democrats and all national liberation movements. Is this a less real or less effective form of internationalism than the kind that existed long ago? Not at all. The old kind was in fact more narrow, often fed by illusions and even, to a great extent, by sectarianism. We must now look further afield, without believing that it is our task or the task of anyone else to issue stamps of approval, membership cards or rule books around the world. Every progressive movement and every force wanting to change society and to advance mankind can make its own contribution. And it can also learn, of course, because in this school of internationalism nobody is merely a master and nobody wants to or can be considered merely a pupil.

Right here and now the problem that has been posed is the proposal made by the French and Polish comrades. It is a new factor, which we have examined first from the viewpoint of method. We do not regard it as a formal issue. Indeed, the way in which it has been posed implies the danger of a regression. We do not want any returns to centralism. We do not want an international organization of communist parties with a leader, a center. We do not want a proposal which admits only the answers "yes" or "no" and which has not been discussed jointly. Such a method rules out the principle of consensus which I mentioned earlier; it would make us regress with respect to the very results of the Berlin conference. When we have had different opinions from other communist parties, including the CPSU, we have said so openly. This happened over Czechoslovakia. It has happened over Afghanistan. We have never awaited approval from outside our party's leadership bodies. But neither have we ever used international issues for the purpose of petty maneuvering in our country's territorial waters, in the quest for presumed legitimizations.

How have matters proceeded with regard to the new conference and how did we reach our decision? The comrades, and especially the members of the Central Committee, might perhaps accuse us of excessive reserve. The Directorate has followed the situation very attentively--day by day, one could say. But we believed that this reserve was opportune, inasmuch as until the last moment we hoped that the initiative would not be taken. We believed that a public stance on our party might have made it more difficult to reach a positive solution--namely, that the conference not be convened in this way or on this single topic. The proposal--which was put to us initially by the French comrades as a possibility--was rejected by us. Our party Directorate examined the issue on 3 January and took that decision. On 5 January, before leaving for Moscow, Comrade Marchais came to Rome for a meeting at which he raised the issue again during an exchange of opinions. In view of the Italian side's objections--to which I will return--he said that the proposal depended on our support as a precondition and finally dropped the matter. [paragraph continues]

Then we discussed the proposal with all the communist parties, explaining that our stance was not dictated by the quest for differentiation and that our concerns were not connected with temporary national political considerations. We spoke with Zhivkov and Ceausescu, Cunhal and Kadar and today Comrade Cervetti met with Kirilenko in Moscow. We asked everyone to reconsider the issue and posed the following question: What could be the nature and the real use of a conference of communist parties alone? We did not feel that the answers in any way went beyond the proposal of a propaganda document which seemed unlikely to receive unanimous approval. We judged the proposal restrictive and, to a large extent, also counterproductive.

To enter into the merits of the matter, we based our stance on the missiles here in Italy on the issue of the balance of forces, without formulating any a priori stances which rejected an exchange of ideas with others. This is why our stance carried some weight. It was not an opportunist stance--so much so, in fact, that we voted alone in Parliament. The fact that it did carry some weight, however, was shown immediately by the reaction prompted at the Italian Socialist Party [PSI] Central Committee meeting, following which the PSI dropped the so-called "cancellation clause." The majority of the Socialist Central Committee basically did not approve the parliamentary group's position on the decision to start the Euromissiles construction program and ordered it to press the government to seek negotiations. We hope that the Socialists will not forget this, now that they are in the government.

Communist Parties' Autonomy

As far as we are concerned, we have waged a steadfast struggle against Carter's bellicose hysterias, against the policy of economic reprisals and against the Olympic boycott and have also achieved some results in our own country. However, the issue is not connected solely to the question of whether a conference of communist parties alone would jeopardize broader alliances in this or that country. The problem is that such a conference--comprising governing communist parties, which have missiles and which act partly through diplomatic channels between states, and other communist parties in entirely different situations--would be difficult even to explain to the very interlocutors whom we intend to address. When, at the recent Polish United Workers Party Congress, Comrade Gierek put forward the proposal of an interstate disarmament conference, we supported the proposal and maintained that Italy should accept it. But everyone can understand that the reality was quite different. It is quite another matter to propose convening the communist parties of both Western Europe and the Warsaw Pact countries to express concern only with regard to the missiles being introduced on one side. At such a forum our proposal--which proceeds from the unprejudiced acceptance of data supplied by both sides--might have seemed strange and even offensive to the parties of countries which have already announced that there is no imbalance and therefore no need for control. The issue of the missiles in Western Europe is one which we believe cannot be tackled without at the same time considering the much broader issue of balance and controls and therefore without examining it with the other political forces, and that it must not be regarded as already resolved by the communists.

Furthermore, one cannot believe that at a meeting of communist parties an issue such as Afghanistan--which is causing turmoil throughout the world and on which the verdict of the communist parties themselves is certainly not unanimous--would not be discussed simply because the promoters of the conference have decided that there must be no other topics on the agenda.

One must be extremely clear on an issue such as the autonomy of every communist party. At present this means being able to answer "no" to this initiative, due to both its form and its content. Only an unequivocal answer can enable us to progress.

A negative reply to this proposal does not, of course, imply a rejection of every international initiative or our isolation. On the other hand, we certainly do not want to contribute to isolating other parties whose stance on this issue is similar to ours. The PCE and League of Communists of Yugoslavia have announced that they do not intend to attend the conference.

There is a polemic underway with the PCF--one which we will certainly not be the ones to exacerbate; it is connected to the fact that we have consistently implemented our foreign policy line. As is known, Comrade Berlinguer has met with Brandt and Mitterrand; Comrade Napolitano with the British Laborites; and we are expecting Olof Palme in Rome. We are not seeking new travelling companions so as to abandon our old ones. We do note, however, that there are new opportunities for conversation and dialog. Of course this poses new discussion and work problems both for us and for the others, far beyond any publicity or propaganda effects. As far as we are concerned, this means behaving as consistent internationalists.

I would like to point to an example in this connection. We are studying an initiative from the Belgian and Danish communist parties for a meeting of West European communist parties on the problems of the economic crisis. We have already said that we believe the initiative is worth examining. There will soon be a meeting, similar to the one in Warsaw which I mentioned. This also shows that we are not isolating ourselves at all. But we do want our positions to be clear to all our interlocutors. We will never be motivated either by spite or false considerations of prestige.

With regard to Eurocommunism, we have nothing to repudiate and no funerals to hold. As far as we are concerned, Eurocommunism has never been a new scheme, and still less a cage for imprisoning reality. Its essential characteristics must include the communists' capacity to take on a vanguard role in reuniting the European workers movement.

Though some people might find this strange, we are and remain communists. In conclusion, allow me to quote a few lines from a booklet which I have brought with me: "Communists everywhere support every revolutionary movement against existing social and political conditions." "The communists at last are working on unity and understanding among the democratic parties in all countries." This was written when socialism, which was striving to become a science, was still laden with utopias. It was asserted against splittism and conspiracies, when the young revolutionaries writing this booklet shortened the time scale of history in their enthusiasm.

It is the Communist Manifesto left to us by Marx and Engels and which you have all read. It ends with words which we have not forgotten: "Workers of the world unite!"

PCI OFFICIAL DENIES CONVEYING MESSAGE TO BREZHNEV

[Unattributed report: "Letter to Brezhnev Denied"]

[Text] Rome--Following an AP dispatch according to which Gianni Cervetti allegedly conveyed a message from Berlinguer to Brezhnev while in Moscow, Cervetti himself has denied the report in a statement in which he says: "As is known, I went to Moscow a few days ago, where I met with Andrey Kirilenko and other CPSU leaders. I did not deliver any letter or written message."

FRG'S GENSCHER, SA CARNEIRO DISCUSS WORLD SITUATION

LD091824 Hamburg DPA in German 1721 GMT 9 Apr 80 LD

[Text] Lisbon--In their talks this evening, Federal Foreign Minister Hans-Dietrich Genscher and Portuguese Prime Minister Francisco Sa Carneiro agreed that close cooperation with the United States was imperative.

Genscher arrived in Lisbon today for the meeting of the committee of ministers of the Council of Europe. Immediately on his arrival he met Sa Carneiro and conferred with him for 90 minutes on the world situation. The main topics were developments in the Middle East in the wake of the Soviet invasion of Afghanistan, the conflict between Iran and the United States and the situation in the Near East and Africa. Both men said that the challenge of the Soviet intervention in Afghanistan could be met only with united action by Europeans and Americans. This requirement flowed from their common interests.

Both men stressed the happy state of German-Portuguese relations. The federal foreign minister said that the Federal Republic was watching events in Portugal with great interest and sympathy and wholeheartedly supported its accession to the European Community. The Federal Government regarded it as an important step in strengthening the policy of European unity.

LISBON TO EXCHANGE AMBASSADORS WITH ARAB COUNTRIES

LD091505 Lisbon Domestic Service in Portuguese 1400 GMT 9 Apr 80 LD

[Text] Deputy Prime Minister and Foreign Minister Freitas do Amaral told the parliamentary committee on foreign affairs this morning that Portugal will soon be exchanging ambassadors with eight Arab countries and will work toward establishing diplomatic relations with Saudi Arabia. Freitas do Amaral was speaking at a meeting with the parliamentary committee held to brief it on the country's foreign policy. As to the PLO, he said that the government will look into the question of recognizing the PLO (?after) it completed the present process of diplomatic relations with other Arab countries.

Further Details

LD092227 Lisbon in Portuguese to Europe 1930 GMT 9 Apr 80 LD

[Text] Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Foreign Affairs Freitas do Amaral met today with the parliamentary committee on foreign affairs, which he briefed on Portuguese foreign policy. Freitas do Amaral told the parliamentarians that the government will seek to exchange ambassadors with eight Arab countries with which our country already has diplomatic relations. He added that when this process has been completed it will look into the question of establishing relations with the PLO.

With regard to Portuguese-speaking African countries, Freitas do Amaral announced a series of diplomatic initiatives to take place shortly through the appointment of ambassadors to Angola, Mozambique and Guinea-Bissau, with only a few appointments still pending on final consulations with the president of the republic.

Freitas do Amaral also said that he will be accompanying General Ramalho Eanes in his forthcoming presidential trips to Cape Verde, Italy and Norway, as well as joining Dr Sa Carneiro in his tour of EEC member countries.

At another stage of his briefing to the parliamentary committee on foreign affairs, Freitas do Amaral described the Camp David agreements as positive, although insufficient, and said that the Madrid Conference on Security and Cooperation in Europe should assess the implementation of the Helsinki agreement.

RESPONSIBILITY FOR SAHARA CONFLICT DISCLAIMED

LD091414 Madrid Domestic Service in Spanish 1300 GMT 9 Apr 80 LD

[Text] The Office of Diplomatic Information at the Foreign Ministry released the following note at midday today:

In connection with the statement of King Hassan of Morocco on Spain's alleged responsibility for the Sahara conflict, the Office of Diplomatic Information states that the government rejects any responsibility on the part of our country. What Spain did not do was to yield to any claim contrary to the principles of the OAU which call for the decolonization of the Sahara. Spain is at all times ready to help with any peaceful solution of the issue.

VISIT OF ITALIAN PRESIDENT PERTINI POSTPONED

LD091522 Madrid Domestic Service in Spanish 1200 GMT 9 Apr 80 LD

[Rafael Ortega dispatch from Rome]

[Text] Alessandro Pertini, the president of Italy, will not visit Spain next week. The official visit, the first of an Italian head of state to our country since 1923, has been postponed for the moment. This postponement does not mean that there are difficulties in our bilateral relations, which are blossoming now more than ever, but is due to domestic political considerations such as the recent government crisis here, a crisis which had been forecast to last a long time and which has forced the Italian Foreign Ministry to feel it opportune to postpone Pertini's visit.

Now, although the crisis has been resolved, the international commitments of the two countries make the visit impossible. There is talk of it taking place in May or after the summer. In any case, we repeat, the postponement is due to the classic and often unforeseeable domestic political problems in Italy, and not to problems in bilateral relations.

TEXT OF PCE REFUSAL TO ATTEND EUROPEAN CP MEETING

LD041119 Madrid MUNDO OBRERO in Spanish 1 Apr 80 p 9 LD

[Unattributed report: "PCE Will Not Attend"]

[Text] On behalf of the PCE Executive Committee's Standing Committee, Santiago Carrillo has sent the following letter, dated 29 March, to the PCF and Polish United Workers Party Central Committee:

Dear comrades,

In reply to your letter of 24 March in which you invited our party to a meeting of European communist parties "for peace and disarmament," we have decided that the PCE will not take part in this meeting for the reasons which we set out below:

In view of the grave deterioration in the international situation over the last few months, the PCE, together with other communist parties, is conducting intensive activity on the international level to contribute to a broad grouping of the progressive forces on our continent in light of imperialism's attempts to return to the cold war, in order to strengthen the struggle in support of détente and peace and against the arms race, and to open up new paths of negotiation and dialog.

The resolution approved at our Central Committee's latest meeting states: "The PCE believes that its fundamental task on the international level is to contribute to a broad grouping of the communist, socialist, Christian and progressive forces which are prepared to struggle to prevent a return to cold war, against all attempts at military confrontation, against the measures which the United States and, in particular, the Carter administration, is striving to impose--that is, of severing economic, cultural and sporting relations--and, at the same time, for the withdrawal of Soviet troops from Afghanistan."

We do not believe that a meeting of East and West European communist parties such as that planned for next month in Paris will contribute to the aim defined by our Central Committee; we believe that it could even be detrimental to our aims of an effective and broad struggle for peace, security and disarmament.

Because of its very nature, a joint stance with the communist parties which form the governments belonging to the Warsaw Pact will emerge from this meeting. The meeting would therefore entail to some extent an alinement with the stances on European security upheld by that pact.

We deem it essential to state as vigorously and clearly as possible that we uphold totally independent stances, outside the blocs, on security and disarmament, which could be effective and secure very broad support precisely because they represent a third path, capable of opposing imperialism's odious maneuvers and also of condemning an action so contrary to the cause of peace as the USSR's intervention in Afghanistan.

The envisaged meeting in Paris could at most give a superficial and inaccurate impression of unity and agreement on international problems among the communist parties taking part, but it would not allow a Marxist debate, with the necessary conditions of time, preparation, depth and mutual respect, on an analysis of the principal international problems and the grave differences on a number of matters existing among some communist parties.

Although believing that the path toward strengthening the cause of peace does not lie in a meeting such as that planned in Paris, the PCE reaffirms its desire to continue to make the utmost efforts, together with other communist parties, and also socialist and social democratic parties, Christian and progressive forces and other democratic and peaceloving sectors, against the imperialist policy aimed at a return to cold war, for detente, for negotiations and measures which will make it possible to create an atmosphere of confidence, against the deployment of the Euromissiles, for arms control and reduction and for cooperation among the peoples and states of our continent.

Kindly accept, dear comrades, our communist greetings.

GARAICOECHEA ASSUMES BASQUE PRESIDENCY

LD092316 Madrid Domestic Service in Spanish 2215 GMT 9 Apr 80 LD

[Excerpt] Here is a dispatch from Bilbao:

Euzkadi now has a president. Carlos Garaicoechea has been elected the third lendakari [president] of the Basque Government. Carlos Garaicoechea took the oath of office under the tree of Guernica, using the same words used 44 years ago by the first lendakari, Jose Antonio Aquirre. In the first vote, Carlos Garaicoechea got 23 votes in favor, 23 against, 11 abstentions and 3 null votes. An absolute majority was required and therefore this was not enough. However, in the second vote he got the simple majority necessary--25 votes in favor, 24 against and 11 abstentions. Garaicoechea has a month to form the second Basque Government, the first since the civil war.

FINLAND

PLO SPOKESMAN: GOVERNMENT INVITATION NEEDED FOR 'ARAFAT VISIT

LD081313 Helsinki HELSINGIN SANOMAT in Finnish 1 Apr 80 p 9 LD

[Timo Vuorela report: "'Arafat Will Only Come to Finland With a Government Invitation"]

[Text] The discussions on an invitation to PLO leader Yasir 'Arafat to visit Finland entered a new phase when the PLO representative in Helsinki stated that 'Arafat would only accept an official invitation.

The authorities have not had the opportunity to study the new situation since yesterday evening when PLO Central Committee member Zamil Shihadah made his announcement to representatives of the Foreign Ministry and the media.

'Arafat himself said Monday in an interview published by the Swedish press agency, TIDNINGARNAS TELEGRAMBYRA, that he expects to be invited to Finland shortly.

A visit to Finland has in fact been planned for a long time. The Society for Friendship With Arab Countries, whose chairman is Social Democratic Member of Parliament Tellervo M. Koivisto, took the initiative.

Foreign Ministry officials have been aware of the society's plans, but the government has not had anything to do with the matter.

When Zamil Shihadah announced that 'Arafat is not interested in coming to Finland at the invitation of private individuals or national organizations, a swift total reevaluation of the situation became necessary.

In Shihadah's opinion, a government decision is urgently required. He points to the PLO's successes in winning international recognition in the last year, particularly in the last month. 'Arafat has been invited to visit several Mediterranean countries, even Turkey which belongs to NATO.

Austria has granted diplomatic recognition to the PLO representative in Vienna, France is considering whether to extend an official invitation to 'Arafat, and the EEC plans to reach a decision on recognition of the PLO in the near future.

In Shihadah's opinion, Finland would gain new respect in the Arab world by getting in first before a joint decision by the West European powers because extending an invitation after the others had done so would not be so remarkable. He explained this point of view to representatives of the Foreign Ministry, the Finnish People's Democratic League, the Finnish Social-Democratic Party, the Center Party and the Central Federation of Finnish Trade Unions.

However, Finland does not consider it important to steal a march on Western Europe. If the government extends an invitation to 'Arafat, it could be taken as de facto recognition. That would be enough for the PLO which would consider it extremely important for the advancement of its campaign.

Such an invitation is not impossible, but it is not a matter of urgency either.

IRAQI EMBASSY SEEKS DATA ON COMPANIES' LINKS WITH ISRAEL

LD091537 Stockholm DAGENS NYHETER in Swedish 28 Mar 80 p 28 LD

[Tor Hogn s report: "Iraqi 'Jew-Questionnaire' for Finnish Companies"]

[Text] Helsinki, Thursday--Iraq's embassy in Helsinki has sent a letter and questionnaire to a number of companies in Finland. The embassy's trade department wants in particular to know if the companies in question have "Zionists or Jews" in leading posts or as shareholders. The letter is signed by Iraq's ambassador in Finland, Salih Mahdi 'Ammash.

The ambassador also wants the companies to state, "in strictest confidence," whether they have dealings with seven named companies in Finland which trade with Israel. The letter mentions large wholesale firms such as Kesko and Tuko, the cooperative OTK and its daughter company, Renlund, as well as Fazer.

The letter says that these companies sell products which can be obtained in Iraq such as dates, carpets, licorice root and blankets. But the companies import them from Israel, something which conflicts with our foreign policy, the ambassador points out in the letter. He wants an answer before March 24 [date as published].

The Foreign Ministry is aware of the letter but has not taken any steps. It has indicated that it would be best to pass over the incident in silence.

It is a matter for the companies to answer if they have any interest in the matter, and some of them might have, Foreign Ministry sources believe.

Finns are now wondering if the letter is an attempt to exert pressure on large Finnish firms which have interests to protect in connection with building projects that are being planned in Iraq.

Negotiations on the building of three garrison establishments in Iraq are taking place at present.

Finnish companies are at present building a large congress palace in Baghdad and, in various parts of the country, vocational schools, housing developments and waterworks.

In the questionnaire the embassy asks for a detailed description of the ownership of the companies, their economic setup and so forth. Question No 7 reads: Are any of the members of the board of management or any shareowners Zionists or Jews?

A further question asks whether the company has connections with any Israeli company.

Foreign Trade Minister Esko Rekola says that the letter is extraordinary. He stresses that relations between Finland and Iraq are good and that the letter does not affect this fact.

Rekola does not know if this is an expression of the new policies of the Iraqi Government or if it is an initiative made by a single ambassador.

The companies which have received the letter do not know if they will answer it or not. Minister Rekola says that it is the companies which must decide.

Ambassador To Be Summoned

LD091541 Stockholm DAGENS NYHETER in Swedish 29 Mar 80 p 6 LD

[Unattributed report: "Jewish Question in Finland a Case for Foreign Ministry"]

[Text] Helsinki--Finland's Foreign Ministry will summon Iraq's Ambassador Salih Mahdi 'Ammash to talks as soon as the ambassador returns from a visit to his home country.

He will be asked what he meant by asking for information from Finnish companies on whether they have "Zionists and Jews" in management positions.

The talks will be with Finnish civil servants and not with the minister--there is no question of more serious measures at present.

The question has drawn much embarrassed attention in the Finnish parliament. Ben Zyskowicz of the National Coalition Party, has put a simple question to the governmement.

Zyskowicz, who is himself a Jew, wonders if the actions of the ambassador are in harmony with Finnish legislation and with international practice.

POSSIBLE CP MOVES AGAINST STALINISTS VIEWED

LD090817 Stockholm SVENSKA DAGBLADET in Swedish 3 Apr 80 p 2 LD

[Cla Gummesson report: "Communist Struggle in Finland"]

[Text] "It's the final battle..." Or maybe not.

At present it is beyond any doubt that the Finnish Communist Party and its leader Aarne Saarinen are preparing measures to take in hand their obstinate "Stalinist" minority with Taisto Sinisalo as its leading name.

But how firmly does the majority intent to advance? What methods will be used? Is Saarinen actually prepared to risk a breakup of the party?

There are many unanswered questions.

The division in the Communist Party has deep historical roots. It stems from a time when the Communists operated underground.. For a long time after the war the Communists were isolated in Finland's political life. In 1966 this isolation was broken. The Communists entered the government. The "Stalinist" minority has never been able to stomach this step.

During the seventies the two wings have tried to exist side by side. There have been hopes of some kind of reconciliation, but these have come to nought.

Little by little the war of words has been intensified. The situation has seemed increasingly hopeless. At next year's party congress the majority is prepared to make the transition from words to action.

From a European standpoint Finland's Communists are a remarkable party. The party has been prepared to shoulder the responsibility of government and is, at present, part of the ruling Koivisto coalition which contains representatives of the Social Democrats and the nonsocialist parties as well as the Communists.

The fact that the Communists have come to form a part of the general political community is largely due to President Kekkonen, who has seen the breaking of the Communists' isolation as one of his goals.

Recently the majority within the Communist Party has clearly aimed at continuing along the road that it has started to follow.

But the continual obstructions of the minority are putting great stress on the party which, in recent years, has lost support among voters.

The minority--the so-called "Taistoists"--do not compromise a unified group on the extreme leftwing of the party. On the contrary, it is a remarkable constellation full of internal contradictions. It has its base in the party's old members, who are faithful to Moscow, but since the time of the student revolts it has recruited hosts of leftist-oriented young people and significant numbers of Finland's cultural elite.

It has, as it were, been "fashionable" to join the Taistoists.

Recently, however, the minority has lost a lot of its glamor and attraction. A few of its members of parliament were beaten in the last election, among them Sinisalo himself. It has had little success in union elections. Support among young people has decreased.

It is probable that the majority now considers the Taistoists to be so weakened that now is the time to strike. Now or never!

And thus we now have a situation in which the Communist Party in Finland, a neighbor of the Soviet Union, is threatening to break up.

I met Aarne Saarinen in his modest room in the grandiose parliament building of Mannerheimintie. It was agreed that the interview would not be reported, but it can be said in general terms that Saarinen is not prepared to reveal how far he is prepared to go to put an end to the dissension within his party. But there is a lasting impression that it is a time for tough measures.

The situation seems quite hopeless for the majority. Continued discord will undermine confidence in the party.

It is clear that what has been written about the confrontation that took place at the end of the winter is that the majority's absolute minimum demands are that the minority accepts the party regulations and its decisions, made in accordance with its statutes.

This does not preclude the existence of differing OPINIONS [capitalized word italicized in original], but behavior contrary to party statutes cannot be accepted.

In order to achieve "some bloody order" (to quote one party official closer to me) in the party Saarinen and his faction are probably prepared to resort to the expulsion of dissident opponents. This much is clear at least.

Whether this means that Finland's Communist Party is on its way toward a formal breakup, we shall have to wait and see.

GOVERNMENT 'UNENTHUSIASTIC' ON U.S. REQUEST FOR SUPPORT

LD091043 London THE DAILY TELEGRAPH in English 9 Apr 80 pp 1, 36 LD

[David Adamson report: "Britain Wary Over Iran Sanctions"]

[Excerpt] Britain reacted with a marked lack of enthusiasm yesterday when the United States formally asked for support for President Carter's severance of trade and diplomatic relations with Iran.

It is expected that there will be consultations with other members of the European Community before an answer is given. With the embarrassment of its Olympic boycott well to the forefront of its collective thinking, the government was clearly anxious not to find itself out on a limb once again.

The American request came when Mr Kingman Brewster, the United States ambassador in London, visited Sir Ian Gilmour, the deputy Foreign Office [as published]. He presented Sir Ian with a document on the American action which listed possible actions its allies could take in support. The United States, it was stressed, wanted as much help as possible from its friends in its attempts to free the hostages held in Tehran.

The British reaction was that the government would consider what action, if any, would be taken. Mrs Thatcher and other Western leaders have written to President Bani-Sadr, of Iran, warning him of the international repercussions if the hostages were not released. The British ambassador in Tehran, Sir John Graham, was in London last week to discuss the whole field of Anglo-Iranian relations, including the possibility of breaking diplomatic links.

There is sympathetic understanding in Britain of Mr Carter's problem, particularly amid the pressures of an election year, but there are genuine uncertainties over where snapping relations would serve the cause of either the captives or, eventually, that of a stable Iran. The most obvious action by Britain would be to break diplomatic relations. While that would dramatise British repugnance to the imprisonment of diplomats, it might make it harder to mediate their release.

As far as trade is concerned, little seems to be taking place. BP and Shell are still lifting oil from Iran, but the volume has shrunk to a trickle compared with pre-revolution days. For instance out of Shell's 4,500,000-barrels-a-day international trade only 95,000 barrels comes to Iran. Just over a year ago the figure was 500,000 barrels a day. Iranian restrictions, production difficulties and problems at the oil terminals have all contributed to the disruption of trade with a nation that was once the world's second largest exporter of oil. Nevertheless, at a time of shrinking production by members of the Organisation of Petroleum Exporting Countries even a trickle has its value. Iran has threatened to cut off supplies to any country which follows the American embargo.

'Fundamental Difference' Seen

LD101055 London THE DAILY TELEGRAPH in English 10 Apr 80 p 36 LD

[John Bulloch report: "Britain's Doubts on U.S. Call To Cut Iran Ties"]

[Text] The American ambassador in London, Mr Kingman Brewster, called at the Foreign Office for the second day running yesterday as the United States stepped up efforts to get help from allies in its confrontation with Iran.

The ambassador spent 15 minutes with Sir Ian Gilmour, the second in command at the Foreign Office, who had also met him the previous day. Lord Carrington, the foreign secretary, is attending a meeting in Lisbon.

Both the Foreign Office and the American Embassy sought to play down the second visit. But it was clear it resulted from a fundamental difference between Foreign Office and State Department. America firmly believes a show of unity by Western Europe and other democratic nations would have a considerable effect on Iran. American experts think concerted action would strengthen the hand of President Bani-Sadr of Iran, who is seen as a moderate battling against extremists.

The Foreign Office's analysis is quite different. Its experts are not at all satisfied that President Bani-Sadar would be helped by Western action. They fear he is now in such a weak position that action by outside countries might serve only to undermine what standing he has. Reports from Tehran say there is a very real possibility that Mr Bani-Sadr may shortly resign.

Secondly, British diplomats point to the national interest and to British exports which, after declining from a peak 500 hundred million a year, are now rising again. Judging by the first months of this year, they might total 300 hundred million in 1980. Imports from Iran are also on the increase, and are likely to amount to 340 hundred million this year of which about 290 hundred million will be accounted for by oil. But Iranian oil now accounts for only about five per cent of Britain's total imports, which in any case are diminishing as North Sea oil production increases.

A third British argument against falling into line with America concerns the one positive step which Mr Kingman Brewster suggested might be taken. This was that Britain, with other European countries, should break all diplomatic links with Iran. The British argument is that the British Embassy in Tehran, headed by Sir John Graham, has proved most useful in quiet negotiations on behalf of the Americans, and could do so again. It is also important in looking after the interests of some 500 Britons who remain in Iran. As Sir Nicholas Henderson, Britain's ambassador in Washington, told Americans yesterday: "Our mission in Iran has played an important role."

But it is clear the Americans now believe that that phase is over, and want all relations cut. Britain is almost openly opposed to this although the official position is that the question is "being studied."

NEUTRALITY MAINTAINED IN FINANCIAL DEALINGS WITH IRAN

LD091123 London THE DAILY TELEGRAPH in English 9 Apr 80 p 21 LD

["City Comment" feature: "City Stays Aloof From the U.S. Iranian Wrangle"]

[Text] It could cost the British Government as much as 100 million pounds sterling to recompense United Kingdom exporters on claims against Iran insured through the Export Credits Guarantee Department, [ECGD], whenthe sums are totted up for the year just ended. But the situation is not likely to be made materially worse even if Iran decides that Britain is officially an ally of the United States and a suitable subject for Iranian "revenge."

The damage was done last year after the Iranian Revolution and even before the seizure of the American hostages triggered American banks to freeze Iranian assets and declare Iran in default. ECGD stopped giving cover on new credits for Iran in February 1979, and the amount outstanding has run down continuously since. But the flow of repayments became more and more irregular and potential claims were building up well before last November.

British banks have also suffered already although the City took great pains to establish its neutrality last November and allowed the Iranians to withdraw their deposits as they matured. Most of that money has now been taken out of London and Iran is keeping only minimal working balances here.

United Kingdom banks are now counting the cost of doing nothing, although they can take some satisfaction in maintaining a reputation for playing the game in the eyes of oil exporting nations a reputation for playing the game which the American banks have lost.

But there is not much more the Iranians can do to them now. Oil is the only real weapon the Iranians have left which could hurt, and even that would be inconvenient rather than disastrous.

Our imports of oil in the first two months of the year amounted to less than 30 million pounds sterling, not much more than British motorists spend on a bank holiday trip to the seaside.

The United Kingdom Government meanwhile is handling the matter with the proverbial kid gloves. There is no great enthusiasm yet for rushing to join in with President Carter's sanctions against Iran as outlined by the United States ambassador in London yesterday.

The question of the Iranian loan to the National Water Council, of which $400 million is still outstanding is also being treated with care. It is due to be repaid in two chunks in November this year and November next year. Britain secured legally a waiver to pay the interest last December, and there is no pressure at present to try and stop the capital being repaid.

The courts are also in no hurry to bring forward the case of American claims against Iranian assets in London and Iranian counter claims. The Bank Markazi's $3,000 million claim against five United States banks will be tried on Nov. 3, and it is not yet clear whether President Carter's threat to confiscate the Iranian assets frozen in United States banks will bring the case forward.

The British official line seems to be that after having suffered for being neutral so far there is not much advantage in taking sides now, balancing the City's reputation for neutrality against a maximum $400 million compensation, especially if the issue can still be solved before the decision has to be made.

It might be a different story if Iran makes the decision for us.

DAILY TELEGRAPH EDITORIAL FAVORS BACKING CARTER

LD091045 London THE DAILY TELEGRAPH in English 9 Apr 80 p 18 LD

[Editorial: "We Should Back Carter"]

[Text] Of President Carter's new actions against Iran over the hostages, only those rupturing diplomatic relations really break fresh ground. American trade was already at such low level that the formal decision to impose economic sanctions will not have much practical immediate effect. Suspensions of visas for Iranians wishing to enter the United States will cause a nuisance for individuals but have no effect on the assortment of persons and bodies currently passing as a government in Tehran. Breaking diplomatic relations and the expulsion of Iranian representatives from America is a new step. It was long overdue. Iran broke the American end of the diplomatic link in Tehran five months ago, with its seizure of the embassy and imprisonment of the staff.

Apart from the disgusting behaviour involved in holding the hostages (including two women) caged up all this time, the Iranian action was a gross breach of the convention under which a country affords protection and immunity to representatives of foreign powers who are its guests. Every country in the world has an interest in maintaining this humane and civilized convention intact, not least, be it noted, Soviet Russia which uses its embassies and diplomatic staff all over the world for spying. One might think Russia would have expressed disapproval of the Iranian breach, but not a bit of it. TASS yesterday said Mr Carter's new package represented continuation of "a policy of plunder." Anything goes, provided it is anti-America.

When the American ambassador called on Sir Ian Gilmour at the Foreign Office yesterday, he will obviously have suggested ways in which the British Government might back its American ally. He no doubt received a murmur in reply about "consulting our EEC partners." This need not take long, for one knows in advance what the result will be. France will refuse to have anything to do with the matter, perhaps refuse even to discuss it. West Germany will have many and complicated worries. Mrs Thatcher should not hesitate too long before announcing that Britain is to break relations with Iran in solidarity with Washington. It might achieve nothing much, even be inconvenient for some Foreign Office policy makers. But there are times when lining up in public with a friend on a cardinal matter for world order is more important than convenience.

PYM INTERVIEWED ON NUCLEAR PROGRAM, NATO RELATIONS

LD090911 Paris LE MATIN in French 1 Apr 80 pp 10-11 LD

[Jean-Louis Arnaud interview with British Defense Secretary Francis Pym in London; date not given]

[Text] LE MATIN: Have you modified your assessment of Soviet military capabilities as a result of the Red Army's invasion of Afghanistan?

Francis Pym: This invasion has shown that the Soviets are able to move large contingents of troops and that they can do it very rapidly. We knew that they were able to do this but we had not seen them doing it in a situation. They have also shown that they are prepared to step out of what could be called their sphere of influence. This is a warning to neutral, nonalined and Third World countries and all other countries in general that no one can feel entirely safe. Another important consequence is the fact that the Soviets are now able to threaten Middle East energy sources more directly.

LE MATIN: Do you expect them to pull out?

Francis Pym: This seems improbable to me. The noises which they have been making in this context have been extremely ambivalent. I am inclined to think that at a given moment they will try to create the impression that they are pulling out because they have been greatly embarrassed by the reaction of all the rest of the world to their aggression.

LE MATIN: With reference to the British strike force, how do you reconcile your complete commitment to NATO with national independence?

Francis Pym: If we are committed to NATO to such an extent it is because it is impossible to defend the United Kingdom in isolation, just as it is impossible to defend any European country in isolation. In order to be able to defend one country you must also be able to defend all the countries concerned. However, our commitment does not end there because we have some other responsibilities in the world, albeit many fewer than in the past. [paragraph continues]

We still have responsibilities in Cyprus, Hong Kong and Belize (British Honduras in Central America). We also have training units in the Middle East which are helping other countries to form their own armies. Furthermore, we have control over our nuclear deterrent force, which has been assigned to NATO but cannot be used without the British prime minister's express consent. If, under the most terrible circumstances, we felt threatened and no one could come to our assistance and if pressing the nuclear button for our own protection remained the only way out, we could still do it. This would mean that the very concept of deterrence had failed, since preventing war from breaking out is the very objective of the deterrent, the very objective of the alliance. Having said this, I believe that the main reason for preserving this possibility is this: If we had no deterrent, France and the United States would be the only countries in possession of an independent nuclear capability. The fact that the United Kingdom also has nuclear power complicates the Soviet leaders' task and makes their long-range assessments more uncertain since they have to take into account an additional decisionmaking center in the nuclear sphere with the knowledge that if they make a false move both the French and British nuclear forces can inflict on them damage of a kind which they would find unacceptable.

LE MATIN: Is your deterrent force as independent as that of France?

Francis Pym: It is ours. We have practically created it on our own. It is true that we have purchased some parts in the United States but what we have purchased is completely in our possession. The only difference between us and France is that we have purchased certain things from America.

LE MATIN: Do you intend to reduce this dependence, particularly with respect to uranium production?

Francis Pym: Yes, we have decided to do this. Our own resources form the basis for our program for the modernization of the Polaris missiles which we call the "Chevaline" program and which is to insure the operativeness of missiles and nuclear warheads in the nineties.

LE MATIN: By agreeing in Brussels in December to the deployment of American cruise missiles on your territory, have you not mortgaged your independence and do you not run the risk that these launch sites could become targets for any preventive attack?

Francis Pym: Absolutely not. The deployment of cruise missiles will in no way affect the independence of our deterrent system. It will in no way affect our strategic system, submarines and bombers. After all, despite its integration with NATO, we can make use of this system independently. The only objective of the cruise missile program is to make clear what already exists. What the alliance intends to secure is a complete armory which would as a whole provide a war deterrent. The cruise missile is merely part of it. Furthermore, looking at it from any aggressor's viewpoint, the situation has not changed since not every NATO long-range nuclear weapon in Europe is in Britain. The situation will change once the NATO modernization program is completed since some missiles will also be deployed in Germany and Italy. However, as far as your--let us say--power of attraction is concerned, nothing will have changed. This country has always been and will continue to be a potential target.

LE MATIN: When will you announce your decision concerning the replacement of the Polaris system?

Francis Pym: In about 6 months' time. In any case, by the end of the year. The government has not yet reached any conclusion with respect to the kind of system which would be the most appropriate to replace the Polaris system, taking into account any foreseeable scientific development and technical progress. We have to decide on the most effective and least vulnerable. It is a difficult task.

LE MATIN: What stage has the discussion about the invulnerability of submarines reached in Britain?

Francis Pym: Everything is relative in this sphere, and this applies to both invulnerability and effectiveness. For the time being, however, there can be no doubt that the submarine is the least vulnerable of all devices. The question is whether it will remain the least vulnerable. However, you cannot be sure whether it will or not. All in all, one of the advantages of the submarine is that it will probably remain as invulnerable as any other system.

LE MATIN: Do you envisage combining a strategic system based on submarines with another ballistic system?

Francis Pym: This is improbable. In fact we now have, as it were, two systems--submarines and bombers. As far as the latter are concerned, the Tornado, which will succeed the Vulcan, will not replace the Vulcan completely since its operational range cannot be called a strategic range. This bomber can fly far enough to reach its target but cannot return. Obviously, this makes it somewhat less attractive. Be that as it may, to replace the Polaris missiles we will choose only one system and this should rule out any other possibility.

LE MATIN: What are the budget implications of the options offered to you?

Francis Pym: According to our calculations, this will cost us 4-5 billion pounds sterling. We can manage this. The Tornado program is more costly--more than 6 billion pounds.

LE MATIN: But it has been asserted here, both in the press and elsewhere, that you will be unable to meet all your commitments simultaneously and that you will have to make drastic decisions.

Francis Pym: All defense forces throughout the world--French, American, British and others--have to face increases in real costs. This is a problem which concerns us all and which will in the long run influence the way in which responsibilities within the alliance are distributed. The fact is that Britain's contribution to the alliance is perhaps the biggest. There is no reason why toward 1990, for instance, the alliance should not find a more effective way of assigning resources. It can be imagined that eventually efforts will be reoriented among the allies and that, for instance, the FRG will increase its contribution to the protection of the Atlantic, with the result that we could play a more important role in the Indian Ocean.

LE MATIN: Would you be prepared to reconsider the size of your contribution to the alliance's budget?

Francis Pym: That is not what I said. What I am saying is that if the alliance so decided, it could redistribute tasks among its members. We have promised to increase our military budget by 3 percent in real terms. We have done so this year and we will do it next year and the year after. I can see nothing in this that would indicate any drastic reduction. As for any increase in real costs, it should encourage us to increase the number of our cooperation programs relating to arms production, similar to those which we already have, especially with France.

LE MATIN: Would you envisage any nuclear cooperation?

Francis Pym: Why not? But I think that this would be difficult.

LE MATIN: Why?

Francis Pym: First, in Europe only France would be concerned and there are other spheres in which, I believe, we could cooperate more easily. Furthermore--and France is fully aware of this--as far as we are concerned, we have long been associated with the United States and this has enabled us to obtain what we needed for our independent deterrent force cheaper than we could have obtained it in any other way. Having said this, I am in favor of leaving all doors open.

LE MATIN: What do you think of the FRG as a possible nuclear partner?

Francis Pym: So far the Germans have not been keen on the idea. They have stated this quite clearly. However, this does not mean that they could not change their mind. Would the French like them as partners?

LE MATIN: And what about you British?

Francis Pym: I would not like to say that I am absolutely opposed but, in any case, II do not believe this to be a useful proposition as far as the near future is concerned. I do not believe that France is very keen on the idea. Nor do I believe that Britain thinks that it is a very good idea, and I know that the FRG is notinterested, at least for the time being.

LE MATIN: If one day Europe wants to acquire an independent military capability you will be unable to exclude the nuclear aspects of such a capability....

Francis Pym: No, but I believe that this is a most difficult problem and, from a realistic and practical viewpoint, such a development seems to me very improbable even though I would not like to rule out the possibility. However, when we refer to an independent European capability, what I have in mind is the entire alliance, on both sides of the Atlantic. It is of absolutely crucial importance that Canada and the United States remain NATO members, that we all stick together and that we do not let anything happen that could interfere with this arrangement. I can easily reconcile this concept with the idea of European nuclear power. However, I do not believe that it is likely to be implemented in the near future. Nor do I believe that it would represent any important additional contribution to the alliance's deterrent power.

LE MATIN: Do you believe that the alliance will last forever?

Francis Pym: Everything changes eventually, but I believe that it is of absolutely vital importance to preserve the alliance's cohesion.

LE MATIN: Do you never have any doubts about the way America would respond to a European request for help in the event of aggression?

Francis Pym: Many people do. And it seems reasonable to wonder about this. Many people also have doubts about some other members of the alliance and about the way in which they would react under similar circumstances.

LE MATIN: Does your government's more active and more committed foreign policy presuppose an increase in military spending?

Francis Pym: There may be some slight adjustments but nothing very big. I believe that the British have a special role to play in preserving the cohesion of the free world. Look at Rhodesia. We have sent some soldiers there. Any operation of this kind adds something to our expenses but not very much. [paragraph continues]

We now have military aid missions in some other countries, in the Gulf region, for instance. We will dispatch a naval unit to that region. However, in view of our capability to operate outside NATO, whether our units operate here or elsehwere makes no difference financially.

LE MATIN: Do you plan to create a special intervention force?

Francis Pym: Our present capabilities are adequate, and we can withdraw some troops from one place and send them to another as we have already done.

LE MATIN: And what about protecting oil sea routes?

Francis Pym: This is something all NATO countries must concern themselves with.

LE MATIN: This is true, but we are trying to convince them that they should be more active. The United States is taking a lead and this is a good thing. The question is how the problem should be approached and how other countries can help. Joint action should be taken. Neither France nor Britain can take on anything of this magnitude. We must insure that both the alliance and the other countries concerned, including Middle East countries, are persuaded to contribute and can protect themselves. Our foreign secretary, Lord Carrington, has visited the Gulf countries and so has your president. Anything that should be done can only be done in cooperation with those countries. Nothing can be done without them.

LE MATIN: Is there no one else on whom we could count apart from the intervention force which the Americans are now organizing?

Francis Pym: We can leave it neither to the United States nor to anyone else. We have referred to Europe but can we rely completely on it? The answer is that some of its members are more reliable than others. However, we are all involved and threatened by what would happen if energy sources were endangered. We all have a contribution to make. This is why it is so important to do this jointly because separately we are incapable of doing anything.

LE MATIN: Are you in favor of the European-Arab dialog proposed by Valery Giscard d'Estaing?

Francis Pym: Yes I am, but I believe that it will be rather difficult to organize such a dialog. We have excellent relations with those countries and so has France. I believe that a dialog on a smaller scale would be easier. The whole of Europe and the entire Gulf region would make things cumbersome. Some of us must serve as leaders. This is what the United Kingdom and France are doing on the European scene and I believe that it is quite a good thing.

TV FILM ON PRINCESS' EXECUTION ANGERS SAUDIS

WA101200 London REUTER in English 0106 GMT 10 Apr 80 WA

[Text] London, April 10, REUTER--Britain has expressed regret to Saudi Arabia over the screening of a television film here last night on the execution for adultery of a Saudi princess in 1977, a Foreign Office spokesman said today.

"We regret any damage that might be done to Anglo-Saudi relations" by the showing of the film, the spokesman said.

He said Foreign Secretary Lord Carrington sent a personal message to King Khalid and British Ambassador James Craig cut short a vacation and flew back to Jidda after Saudi Arabia recently expressed concern over the film.

The film, "Death of a Princess", was a dramatized version of the public execution in Jidda of 23-year-old Princess Misha'al and her lover in November, 1977, following trial under Islamic laws. The film, screened by Independent Television, was based on research by documentary producer Anthony Thomas.

The British spokesman said that while the government regretted any damage that might be caused to Anglo-Saudi relations, it had "no power to interfere with editorial content nor to ban a program of this sort." He said that he was not aware of any specific Saudi Arabian threat to cut off diplomatic relations or trade with Britain.

Britain had very close and friendly relations with Saudi Arabia, one of the world's oil exporters, he said. The two countries have a high level of annual trade and Britain is a big supplier of arms to the Arab kingdom.

The British ambassador was on his way to London for a vacation when he cut it short and returned to his post after learning the program was to be screened.

Relations Threatened

LD101030 London PRESS ASSOCIATION in English 0920 GMT 10 Apr 80 LD

[Excerpts] Strenuous efforts were being made today to try to cool the diplomatic row over a TV film about the public execution of an Arabian princess and her lover. Saudi Arabia had been expressing concern in the past few days over the dramatised documentary "Death of a Princess", screened by ITV [Independent Television] last night.

According to reports in London, the Saudis have threatened to cut off diplomatic relations with Britain, cut vital oil supplies and cancel millions of pounds worth of contracts with British firms. But the Foreign Office spokesman said he was not aware of any specific threats to Britain's "very close and friendly relations with Saudi Arabia".

A spokesman for the British Embassy in Jidda said confidential discussions had already taken place between the two governments. "I wouldn't want to discuss whether the Saudis made any threats during our discussions with them, but they were upset," he added. "The Saudi Arabians, I assume, think that the film has something to do with them and are upset. What action they might take I cannot tell, but we hope the good relations between the two countries will not be harmed".

Meanwhile, the government was today facing criticism from some MPs over apologies made to Saudi Arabia over the film. And a statement has been demanded from Sir Ian Gilmour, the lord privy seal, immediately the Commons [returns] from the Easter recess on Monday.

ATKINS, EIRE'S LENIHAN TO HOLD TALKS ON ULSTER

LD091121 London THE DAILY TELEGRAPH in English 9 Apr 80 p 2 LD

[Nicholas Confort report: "Britain Takes 'Wait and See' Attitude on Eire Demands"]

[Text] The government is taking a "wait and see" attitude toward forecasts from Dublin that Mr Atkins, Northern Ireland secretary, will be pressed to abandon Britain's "guarantee" to Ulster's protestant majority when he visits the Republic shortly for talks.

It will be the first meeting between Mr Atkins and Mr Brian Lenihan, Eire's new foreign minister.

Leaks from Dublin suggest that Mr Lenihan sees it as culmination of a diplomatic campaign to secure an Ulster settlement acceptable to Mr Haughey, his traditionally hard-line prime minister.

Were Mr Lenihan to adopt such a stance and urge Mr Atkins to end Britain's commitment to retain control over Ulster as long as the majority wants it he would be told politely, but firmly, that he was endangering the Republic's good relations with Britain.

However, it is not accepted in London that this will necessarily happen. Past experience has suggested to the government that tough political demands raised in advance of such talks are often not followed through when the meeting takes place.

Officials are encouraged in this belief by what they see as Mr Haughey's co-operative and responsible handling of security issues since he took office at the end of last year.

It is conceded that Mr Haughey has made some tough speeches on Irish unity to meetings of the governing Fianna Fails,but these are seen as designed for internal consumption and to reinforce his hold on the party leadership.

Regardless of the tone of the meeting, expected to take place any day now, it is expected that Mr Atkins and Mr Lenihan will deal with security and with the government's continuing efforts to find a system of greater self-government acceptable in Northern Ireland.

Mr Atkins is certain to outline the course taken by the so far abortive talks at Stormont on the government's constitutional proposals and to discuss with Mr Lenihan the prospects for progress.

He will not, however, be spelling out in detail the options on the future of the province being prepared for consideration by a Cabinet committee under the chairmanship of Mr Whitelaw, home secretary.

U.S. SENATORS MEET KARAMANLIS BEFORE DEPARTURE FROM ATHENS

Visit With Karamanlis

AT091247 Athens Domestic Service in Greek 1130 GMT 9 Apri 80 AT

[Excerpts] Prime Minister Konstandinos Karmanlis today received at the political office visiting U.S. Senators Biden, Baker, Zorinsky and Cochran who arrived in Athens Sunday. The prime minister's meeting with the U.S. senators was attended by Foreign Minister Yeoryios Rallis, U.S. Ambassador to Athens McCloskey and the Director General of the Prime Minister's Political Office Ambassador Moliviatis.

Earlier, the U.S. senators conferred with Coordination Minister Konstandinos Mitsotakis for 1 hour. At 1400 Foreign Minister Rallis gave a luncheon in honor of the four senators who will visit National Defense Minster Averof at 1800 today.

Further Reportage on Visit

AT091817 Athens Domestic Television Service in Greek 1800 GMT 9 Apr 80 AT [Excerpts] Prime Minister Karamanlis today received the visiting U.S. senators. During the meeting the senators discussed with Karamanlis current international developments, issues related to the immediate area in which Greece is situated, the Cyprus issue and general problems which Greek-Turkish differences have created for both Greece and the United States. Karamanlis had the opportunity to explain the Greek positions to the U.S. senators who expressed their appreciation for the analysis which was conducted by Karamanlis. They said it was extremely useful in forming their opinions.

Departing Press Conference

[Text] The four U.S. senators, Biden, Baker, Zorinsky and Cochran, left Athens at 1230 today after a 4-day visit to Athens. Prior to their departure the senators held a press conference for Greek and foreign correspondents. Among other things they said their talks in Athens with the prime minister and other members of the government were cordial. They specifically lauded Prime Minister Karamanlis for his personality and political character, stressing that the talks they had with him were held in an atmosphere of sincerity and covered a very broad spectrum of issues, from Greece's return to NATO to the Cyprus issue. On Greek relations with Turkey the senators said it is to the mutual interest of both countries to find ways for solving differences and stressed that the American side will also help in this direction.

They also said they had a cordial conversation with the leader of the majority opposition party and PASOK Chairman Papandreou with whom they discussed international issues and Greek-U.S. relations in particular, as well as the differences between Greece and Turkey. As the U.S. senators stated, Papandreou did not appear to question the expediency of their visit to Greece and Turkey. Earlier the U.S. senators conferred with Foreign Minister Yeoryios Rallis. The senators visited Papandreou at his Kastri home for 1½ hours. After this meeting Papandreou told press representatives that he clearly explained to the senators the positions of PASOK on the national issue of Cyprus and on the issues of the Aegean, NATO, U.S. bases and Turkish armaments.

I AVYI REJECTS GOVERNMENT'S 'ALTERNATE' SOLUTIONS TO NATO ISSUE

[Editorial: "The 'Give-and-Take' With NATO"]

[Text] The government is now conferring with five U.S. senators who arrived in Greece after first visiting Oman, the U.S. aircraft carrier "Coral Sea" (in the open waters of the Persian Gulf) and Turkey.

The "Who's Who" of these senators is well known: Howard Baker is the Senate minority leader and aspires to be vice presidential candidate under Reagan in the November election. Two other Republicans--Thad Cochran (Mississippi) and Malcolm Wallop (Wyoming)--are considered to belong to the extreme right--superconservative--wing of the U.S. Senate. As for the two Democrats, Edward Zorinsky (Nebraska) is considered conservative while the other, Joseph Biden, senator from Delaware, is described as having "liberal tendencies." Being "liberal," the other day he felt the need to stress that the issue of the hostages in Tehran must be solved with "action." It is not necessary, he said, to mount an Entebbe-type operation. We could, he said, strike at Iranian oil wells and at Iranian hydro-electric power stations.

This is a sketchy description of the "five." What is important, however, is this: What is the "New Democracy" government discussing with them? The progovernment press informs us that it is discussing issues related to the supply of military aid to Greece and Turkey. It is also discussing "the relations between Greece and the United States which have been in a state of limbo for 6 years, and the bases issue."

Above and beyond what the progovernment press does and does not write about, it also appears that the government has begun to believe in the U.S. blackmail: that Washington's patience has allegedly been exhausted; that in contrast to Ankara, which has rediscovered "reoccidentation," Athens insists on a narrow "parochial" policy which is far removed from the great concepts and interests of the alliance which are above national interests; that now--within the few days remaining until the election of the new president of the republic--Greece has "a last chance" to smooth its relations with NATO, otherwise, Washington will withdraw, "it will cease to be interested in the Greek-Turkish dispute" and, naturally, Athens and not Ankara will suffer most and so on.

What is the result? At the same time, Athens is hastening to grasp this "chance" since it will be much more difficult for the successor to Karamanlis--by contrast to the present prime minister--to "arrange" these matters. This is exactly what Sulzberger also believes. It has already been reported that the "New Democracy" government has three "alternative solutions" ready and that it is proposing them to Washington and NATO for negotiation purposes.

First solution: return to the Davos-Haig formula with certain alterations in "wording"--read concessions. As revealed, however, this formula already provides for a decrease in Greek airspace from 10 to 6 miles. Therefore, it is nationally unacceptable even without the alterations in "wording" which could be nothing more than basic concessions.

Second solution: adoption of the French model of relations with NATO. Washington, however, hastens to inform us that France is one thing while Greece is something entirely different: France insists on maintaining its forces under national control while you are in haste to rejoin the NATO "vice." As to the "political chief" of your armed forces, he repeats his "credo" at every opportunity: Greece belongs to the Americans, therefore, the French model is rejected.

Third solution: signing of "bipartite defense accords" both with the United States as well as with NATO (the Spanish formula). This "solution" appears to be accepted both by Brzezinski, Luns and all the other hawks within the U.S. Pentagon. Their line of thinking is simple: Give us the bases and then you can even withdraw from political NATO if you so prefer. The Turks have already given us the base at Sinop on the Black Sea and the base at (Birinklik) in Southeast Asia [as published]. If you give us similar "facilities" then we will give you the equivalent military aid in the same way that we gave it to Turkey and to Spain.

A rich and painful experience, however, should have made the "New Democracy" government much wiser. It should have already been taught that certain "minor" concessions and certain alterations in "wording" are insufficient and that as long as it insists on its give-and-take with the Haigs and the Rogers (yesterday) and with the Lunses and the Brzezinskis (tomorrow), the more it will reach a dead end, for which it must hold itself responsible as its creator. We believe it is time to put an end to delusions. The United States will not accept any of the Greek alternate "solutions" unless these "solutions" promote U.S. strategic interests which, at this moment, pass from Oman to Iran, from Saudi Arabia to Pakistan and to the Persian Gulf. Naturally they also pass through Turkey, whose restoration "of military strength"--as Admiral Shear told us--is NATO's chief interest.

Is the "New Democracy" government prepared to play these "games" with the United States--the games of cold war and playing with fire? If the answer is yes, then it can continue its chats with the various U.S. officials--generals, diplomats, senators. If it is not prepared to do so then it must cease consultations with the United States and NATO immediately by promoting a truly autonomous, multifaceted foreign policy. The trouble is that, in the first place, the political cost to "New Democracy" will be extremely heavy in addition to the fact that the people--through their struggle--will avert every blow which is directed against the country's independence and integrity.

IRAQI DELEGATION DISCUSSES ECONOMIC, TECHNICAL COOPERATION

[Excerpt] Iraqi minister of industry and minerals and member of the Iraqi Revolutionary Council, Tahir at-Tawfiq, arrived in Athens on an official 5-day visit as head of a large delegation. The visit of the Iraqi minister to Greece is being made at the invitation of the Greek Minister of Industry and Energy Miltiadhis Evert.

The establishment of a new ferry boat line between Greece and Iraq via the Suez Canal will be among the issues to be discussed by the two ministers. Cooperation in the supplying, trading and refining of oil will also be discussed together with the question of training Iraqis in Greece.

During his visit to Greece, At-Tawfiq will be accompanied by Evert on a tour of shipyards, cement factories, spinning and weaving plants, an aluminum factory, the Greek aircraft industry and a light weapons manufacturing plant. During their talks the two ministers will also examine prospects for expansion of Greek-Iraqi relations, which have always been friendly but became closer after the visit of Prime Minister Karamanlis to Baghdad.

Greek Trade Minister Yeoryios Panayiotopoulos today gave a luncheon in honor of the Iraqi minister, attended by Evert. Opinions on bilateral economic cooperation were exchanged during the luncheon. A Greek delegation under Panayiotopoulos is due to leave for Iraq this Friday to attend the second session of the Greek-Iraqi Joint Commission on Economic and Technical Cooperation. Issues to be discussed will include cooperation in trade, industry, agriculture, transportation and telecommunications.

GRAND NATIONAL ASSEMBLY AGAIN FAILS TO ELECT PRESIDENT

[Text] The 23d and 24th rounds of voting for a president in the Senate and National Assembly joint session again failed to produce any results today.

National Salvation Party Senator from Erzurum Lutfi Dogan was the only candidate during the 23d round and 458 members of the Grand National Assembly participated in the voting. Dogan received 46 votes, RPP Senator from the Presidential Quota Group Muhsin Batur received 64 votes and Justice Party Deputy from Ankara Ismail Hakki Koyluoglu received 40 votes. Another 249 ballots were blank, 52 votes were cast for various legislators and 7 votes were declared void.

The votes during the 24th round were not counted as there was no quorum. The rounds of voting for a president will continue tomorrow.

Meanwhile, Fahri Koruturk, whose term as president has ended and who has assumed his duty as a life senator, visited the Justice Party and RPP Senate groups today. It was reported that these were courtesy visits.

Erbakan's Call for Candidates

TA091720 Ankara Domestic Service in Turkish 1600 GMT 9 Apr 80 TA

[Text] National Salvation Party Leader Necmettin Erbakan has called on the Justice Party and the RPP to submit their presidential candidates or vote for the Senator from Erzurum, Lutfi Dogan.

In a written statement issued today, Erbakan criticized the two major parties for not making the necessary preparations for the presidential elections. Pointing out that his party expects the Justice Party and the RPP to submit their candidates to the Grand National Assembly by tomorrow at the latest, Erbakan said: Actually, the NSP had proposed that the Assembly not go into recess after the approval of the budget and, instead, solve the problems of our country one by one. For 3 weeks the parliament has not been able to handle the very just and important issues of our pensioners, peasants, workers, civil servants and artisan brothers. We are responsible for the suffering of millions of our citizens. Let us take action together as of tomorrow. Let us first elect a president with a national view and then try to jointly deal with the problems of our nation and rapidly solve them.

It was also announced that Erbakan has deferred his countrywide tour due to the delay in the presidential elections.

MILITARY COURT RELEASES THREE LEFTIST TEACHERS

TA091729 Ankara Domestic Service in Turkish 1600 GMT 9 Apr 80 TA

[Text] The Third Military Court of the Ankara Martial Law Command has decided to release Sehmuz Pik, Erdem Uzun and Muammer Toprakci, three TOB-DER [Turkish Teachers Unity and Solidarity Association] branch leaders who were under arrest during their trial. The military court reached this decision today after consulting with legal experts. TOB-DER Leader Gultekin Gazioglu as well as other officials are being tried for violating the associations law, for attempts to incite, for procommunist propaganda and for publicly insulting the state military and security forces.

CABINET MEETS TO DISCUSS DOMESTIC, INTERNATIONAL ISSUES

[Text] Prime Minister Suleyman Demirel has said that the state is well aware of the identity of the murder networks which create terror incidents in Turkey and that these networks will not be able to escape the clutches of the law.

In a statement preceding the Council of Ministers meeting held at 1100 today, Demirel said that all of Turkey's important problems were on the cabinet's agenda and that efforts were being exerted to solve them. Noting that significant developments were taking place in the region in which Turkey is situated, Demirel said: I am concerned about certain disturbing developments in the region. International issues will be reassessed at today's Council of Ministers meeting.

In reply to a question by a journalist about the increase in anarchic incidents, Demirel said that the state had launched a full-scale struggle against anarchy and that it would punish all those who caused so much grief and pain in the country. Demirel said:

[Begin recording] Every possible measure is being taken. There are certain murder networks, the identity of which the state is aware. Sooner or later they will surrender to the state forces and law. Terrorism is Turkey's biggest problem. We came to power claiming that Turkey needs peace and tranquillity. Maybe it is possible to measure certain things according to their dimensions and numbers. I am not against that. However, every possible measure is being taken; there is nothing else to be done. What will happen? Are we helpless? No. I have never acknowledged that we are impotent. The State of the Turkish Republic will definitely make these murder networks, which destroy another family each day, regret their deeds. No one can avoid the law. We are determined to wage this struggle through legal means--remaining on legal grounds and employing the state's legal forces. I will meet again with the martial law commanders on 16 April. Everything will be reviewed. The National Security Council will meet on 18 April to decide whether or not to extend martial law. [end recording]

In reply to a question by a journalist on whether or not the presidential election will drag on for a while, Demirel said that secret ballots were being cast and that a group decision could not be taken. Noting that a president is elected when the Turkish Grand National Assembly members agree upon a candidate to be nominated from among the Grand National Assembly members, Demirel said that the Justice Party tendency was to nominate Sadettin Bilgic [Justice Party deputy from Istanbul]. Recalling that the National Salvation Party [NSP] and the Nationalist Action Party [NAP] had earlier announced that they would vote in favor of a Justice Party candidate, Demirel said:

[Begin recording] The phrase "party candidate" exists in neither the laws nor in the Constitution. A candidate will be nominated. Deputies and senators will support that candidate. Now there is a candidate whom the NSP has proposed to us. I also met with the leader of the NAP, the honorable Turkes. What I mean is I met him earlier. He tole me that the NAP will vote in favor of a candidate from the Justice Party. Now, the issue has reached a certain point. I hope that a candidate who will win the support of parties will be nominated today. I hope that a consensus will be reached. Let me tell you that every effort will be made toward reaching a consensus. [end recording]

ISTANBUL PAPERS DISCUSS SENATORS' VISIT, U.S. FOREIGN POLICY

TERCUMAN Article

NC100740 Istanbul TERCUMAN in Turkish 8 Apr 80 p 4 NC

[Article by Fahir Armaoglu: "The Assessment of the United States"]

[Text] It would be wrong to consider the visit of the four American senators to Ankara and Athens yesterday within the narrow framework of the Turkish-Greek dispute. As these four senators were visiting Turkey and Greece, a four-member delegation of the Foreign Affairs Committee of the House of Representatives was visiting Morocco. The delegation will also visit Algeria and Tunisia.

These activities of the U.S. Congress stress two points: The first point is that the U.S. Congress carries more weight in foreign policy than the U.S. Government. Its role in foreign policy, which has gradually increased since 1975 when the Vietnam war ended, is even more assertive nowadays.

The second point is that, following the events in Iran and Afghanistan, both the U.S. Government and Congress have been engaged in an assessment of U.S. foreign policy. This applies particularly to the formation of a security system in the Middle East. The U S. Government and the U.S. Congress also wish to develop closer cooperation with friends and allies.

If we look at the matter from this angle, the elimination of differences between Turkey and Greece and the strengthening of the southeastern wing of NATO is of profound importance. But it is also observed that, when this is done, Turkey will be asked to play a more active role in Middle East policy since Turkey has now become the cornerstone in any Middle East combination.

It must be admitted that the events in Iran and Afghanistan have created a delicate situation in the region for Turkey also. Any measures to be taken will contribute to the security of Turkey as well. But certain conditions have to be met if Turkey is to be able to assume a role in any system of measures. Firstly, Turkey has to resolve its economic problems as quickly as possible. Secondly, at least some of the major Arab states south of Turkey must adopt a favorable attitude toward such a system. Thirdly, concrete steps must be taken toward the realization of a comprehensive and substantial peace between the Arabs and Israel.

GUNAYDIN Remarks

NC100836 Istanbul GUNAYDIN in Turkish 8 Apr 80 p 5 NC

["The Situation in Ankara" column by Teoman Erel: "The Terms 'To Be in Harmony With' and 'To Be Limited By' Make a Difference in the Gulf..."]

[Excerpts] There was a great deal of wrangling over certain terms during the discussion of the Turkish-U.S. defense cooperation agreement, which is to be submitted to our parliament for ratification.

The U.S. authorities wanted the use of these bases not to be confined to only watching the Soviet Union and Bulgaria, which form part of the Warsaw Pact, but also to be used for the protection of U.S. interests in the Middle East. In fact, technically speaking, it is impossible for Turkey to exercise adequate control over the use of these bases in the Middle East and the Persian Gulf.

Our negotiators maintained that "the installations on our territory can be used only within the limits of NATO objectives." But the Americans resorted to maneuvering with words to convince our men, saying: "Instead of saying 'within the limits of the NATO objectives,' say 'in harmony with' the NATO objectives. There must be some flexibility." Eventually both sides had to drop the term 'in harmony with.' It has thus been accepted, in principle at least, that Turkey does not wish to participate in any Western operation against countries such as Syria, Iraq and Iran and that it will not permit the use of bases on its territory for certain plans in the Middle East.

It is understood that the United States does not consider it in its interests for Turkey to refrain from acting as the advance guard of the West in any intervention that may be undertaken in the Middle East and the Persian Gulf and, of course, pressure results from this. This is the most important issue taken up by the visiting U.S. senators. They will either involve Turkey openly in any action that they may be taking in the Middle East or they will stretch the NATO objectives to the limit and in this way obtain results.

Our competent officials appear to be cautious for the time being. Prime Minister Suleyman Demirel is reported to have told the American senators that Turkey would try to continue its development efforts by maintaining friendly relations with its neighbors. Demirel is also quoted as saying: "We wish to remain at peace."

But the senators very politely insisted on their own views. In their contacts with both Prime Minister Demirel and Senate Foreign Relations Committee Chairman and Justice Party Member Sitki Yircalli, they repeated their demands in diplomatic style. Look at the sweet language Senator Howard Baker used to persuade Turkey to get involved in the Middle East situation: "In view of the increasing Soviet danger and in light of the latest developments in the Gulf region, we find it extremely useful to learn the views of Turkey, which is under a Soviet military threat. The purpose of our visit is not to obtain information but to seek your advice. We need your recommendations because you know the countries of the Middle East and the Persian Gulf from close quarters."

This is what Sitki Yircalli said in reply: "From time to time our American friends have considered matters one-sidedly. Because of its geopolitical position Turkey has to preserve its place in the alliances of which it is a member and also maintain friendly relations with its neighbors for the purpose of protecting its independence and its democratic regime."

Turkey has to be on friendly terms with Iraq and Iran because it needs their oil. It is, therefore, compelled to reject the task of being the advance guard of the West in the Middle East and to avoid marring its relations with the Arabs.

These American friends of ours are extraordinarily original people. On the one hand they impose an embargo on us and on the other they want us to embark on adventures by torpedoing our friendly relations with our neighbors, from whom we must obtain oil and credit. On the one hand, they attempt to make a broad interpretation of our NATO membership and push us to the Middle East and the Persian Gulf, and on the other they say that the Turkish Army cannot fulfill its mission even within the framework of NATO. So much so that the U.S. Government goes to the extent of telling the world in a nice way that 50 percent of the arms and equipment of the Turkish Army is unserviceable and unrepairable.

Looking at the vast amount of American aid flowing into Egypt and Israel, which have accepted the role of advance guards, one cannot help pondering deeply.

We wonder whether our involvement in the Middle East and the Persian Gulf is an absolute condition for getting aid from the West. If this is the case, we must insist on the principle of "we do not undertake any mission outside the objectives of NATO. We do not want to act as an advance guard in the Middle East"--a principle which all our political parties seem to embrace.

This is the least costly policy and yet both honorable and safe.

CUMHURIYET Commentary

["The World Today" column by Ali Sirmen: "It Is Up to the Parliament To Decide"]

[Excerpts] The Turkish-U.S. defense cooperation agreement was approved last week by the Council of Ministers. Now it will have to be ratified by the parliaments of both countries. It would be one of the greatest surprises of recent years if the U.S. Congress refused to ratify this agreement. It is difficult to believe that Washington would turn down such an inexpensive agreement at a time when it is looking for new watchdogs in the Middle East and new gendarmes in the Persian Gulf. This time even the Greek lobby does not seem capable of obstructing the ratification of the agreement.

As to ratification of the agreement by the Turkish parliament, we believe that there are many reasons why our parliament should be extremely careful and turn down this rent-fetching and one-sided agreement. Above all, the Turkish-U.S. defense agreement provides base facilities for the United States and, in return, it envisages playing some kind of rent to Turkey, but in no way removes the embargo on Turkey. For example, the arms and equipment, which we shall obtain from the United States against the rent envisaged by the agreement, will have to be used for roles and purposes to be indicated by the United States. Turkey will not be allowed to use them in accordance with its national policy. There is not a single provision in the agreement to prevent the United States from reimposing an arms embargo on Turkey should Turkey fail to comply with this condition.

On the other hand, the latest world developments indicate that the United States will need a new watchman in the Middle East and a new police force stretching as far as the Persian Gulf. It is already known that the United States wishes to assign this role to Turkey and that Turkey has asked too high a price. So at this moment the United States seems to have decided to settle only for bases at a much lower price.

Under these conditions it is highly probably that the Turkish-U.S. defense cooperation agreement might be used for new political purposes and targets outside the framework of NATO; this would heap more tension on our country and once again push it into isolation.

In fact, when the Demirel minority government submits the agreement, our parliament will have the task of subjecting it to a very meticulous examination and reject all the provisions in it that run counter to the interests of our country. Then again it is probable that the party in power will use the current economic situation in Turkey to pressure the parliament and argue that economic aid depends on the ratification of the agreement. As a matter of fact, Turgut Ozal, the right hand of big capital, has recently been making speeches in support of this view. He has been emphasizing that Turkey, as a fortress of NATO in the Middle East, deserves aid.

More than once we have very clearly observed that these allegations are not valid at all. There will undoubtedly be persons in the parliament to refute these allegations.

EEC COUNTRIES CALL ON IRAN TO RELEASE HOSTAGES

NC100940 Paris AFP in English 0931 GMT 10 Apr 80 NC

[Text] Lisbon, April 10 (AFP)--The nine member countries of the European Economic Community (EEC) will call on Iran immediately to release the American Embassy hostages, an official declaration said after the nine foreign ministers met here today.

The Iranian attitude in the hostages crisis was unacceptable, the Nine said in a declaration adopted at a meeting in the Italian Embassy.

The meeting was held prior to a session of the Council of Europe here today when the hostages question was expected to be discussed.

The Nine expressed their solidarity with the United States and the American people and their great concern at what they called "this serious and prolonged breach of the fundamental rules of international law".

Ambassadors of EEC member countries will contact Iranian President Abolhasan Bani-Sadr to seek the release of the hostages, and obtain from the Iranian authorities details on the timing and methods of release, the declaration said.

KING ACCEPTS RESIGNATION OF MARTENS GOVERNMENT

LD091238 Brussels Domestic Service in French 1100 GMT 9 Apr 80 LD

[Excerpts] A long morning of waiting ended with the short communique which we received from the palace at 1210, and which we gave you as a flash at 1212--a communique announcing that the king has accepted the resignation of the Martens government, which he charges with continuing its current business. Another detail: The king will start his consultations on a new government this afternoon at the palace.

The prime minister returned from Chateau de Laaken at 1220 and made the following statement:

[Begin Martens recording] Gentlemen: As you know, last week I submitted the resignation of the government to the king after it turned out that a two-thirds majority had not been attained in the Senate in the vote on article 5 of the bill on revising communities. This was in spite of the fact that the parties of the majority have a two-thirds majority in the Senate. At that time the king reserved his reply and charged the prime minister with checking on whether it was possible to find a speedy solution to the present crisis.

I delivered a report to the king on this matter last night and this morning. As the palace communique has informed you, the king has accepted the government's resignation and has charged the government with taking care of current business.

From this you can deduce that I have had numerous contacts since last Thursday, and it was not possible to find a speedy solution satisfactory for the present crisis. The minimum of reciprocal confidence which is necessary for this can apparently no longer be obtained.

The government has always made--right up to the end--efforts to implement the governmental cause. It engaged in a dialog with parliament on the bill. In this context, and respecting the necessary political balance, major modifications were made to the bill. The government had announced from the very beginning that it would link its fate to the acceptance or rejection of the bill. The normal rules of parliamentary democracy were followed. The government is still aware of the serious consequences which its resignation can have for the country in the present circumstances.

In respect of existing regulations the government will do all it can to safeguard the country's essential interests and those of the population in carrying out essential business. [end recording]

DENKTAS ACCUSES KIPRIANOU OF REJECTING AGREEMENT WITH MAKARIOS

TA091724 (Clandestine) Bayrak Radio in Turkish to Cyprus 1530 GMT 9 Apr 80 TA

[Text] President Rauf Denktas has said that Greek Cypriot administration leader Kiprianou does not want to sit at the negotiating table because he regards the principles envisaged by the Denktas-Makarios agreement to be detrimental to the Greek Cypriots' cause. The Denktas-Makarios agreement, which was signed on 27 February 1977, envisages the establishment of an independent, nonalined federal republic based on the existence of the two communities. In a statement to a London magazine, Denktas claimed that Kiprianou is trying to alter this agreement.

COUNCIL OF EUROPE MINISTERS SUPPORT MADRID CSCE

LD110236 Lisbon Domestic Service in Portuguese 2230 GMT 10 Apr 80 LD

[Text] The ministerial committee of the Council of Europe meeting in Lisbon today unanimously decided that the Madrid conference scheduled for this fall and during which the implementation of the Helsinki agreement is to be reviewed, should go ahead as planned. The desirability of the conference being held was underlined by Portuguese Foreign Minister Freitas do Amaral who said that the conference would provide, among other things, a good opportunity for the USSR to give an account of the way it has been implementing the Helsinki Final Act. The Madrid conference, Freitas do Amaral added, is a way of keeping open the doors of dialog and encouraging the strict implementation of the Helsinki Final Act.

[Begin Amaral recording] The ministerial committee holds the view that at the present moment any decision not to go to Madrid would be undesirable, above all, to the Western democracies. It is precisely at a time when such cases as the Afghanistan issue or the Sakharov affair, among others, occur, that it is necessary to go to Madrid in order to voice there our condemnation and concern, and also to ascertain whether the spirit of Helsinki is still alive and how it will be possible to achieve progress in the implementation and full observance of the Helsinki Final Act. Turkish Minister's Address

[Text] Foreign Minister Hayrettin Erkmen has said that the development of detente in East-West relations is the most important goal of Turkish foreign policy. Erkmen noted that Turkey regards detente as the main factor for security and stability in Europe and the world.

Erkmen delivered a speech on the European Security and Cooperation Conference during the Council of Europe's 66th ministerial committee meeting which began in Lisbon today. Noting that Turkey believes that it would be beneficial to insure the continuity of the European Security and Cooperation Conference, Erkmen said that the meeting to be held in Madrid on this subject is particularly important. He explained that the discussion of the military aspects of the security issue during the Madrid meeting would be useful.

BRITAIN, SPAIN AGREE TO REOPEN TALKS ON GIBRALTAR

Joint Statement Issued

LD102136 Madrid in Spanish to Europe 2000 GMT 10 Apr 80 LD

[Text] Spanish Foreign Minister Marcelino Oreja announced in Lisbon this evening that Spain and Great Britain will begin talks on the Gibraltar question before 1 July.

Spanish Foreign Minister Oreja and British Foreign Secretary Lord Carrington have signed a joint statement in Lisbon where both men were present at the meeting of the ministerial committee of the Council of Europe.

The joint statement first says that the Spanish and British governments, in their desire to strengthen their bilateral relations and to contribute in this way toward European and Western solidarity, propose to resolve the problem of Gibraltar in a spirit of friendship and in accordance with the relevant UN resolutions.

The two governments, the joint statement continues, have consequently agreed to start negotiations with a view to solving all of their differences over Gibraltar. For its part, the Spanish Government has decided to drop the application of restrictive measures which are presently in force regarding the Rock.

The Spanish Government, the statement continues, has reaffirmed its position with regard to the reestablishment of the territorial integrity of Spain, and reiterates its intention that at the conclusion of the negotiations the interests of the Gibraltarians will be fully safeguarded.

For its part, the British Government will maintain its commitment to respect the free and democratically expressed desires of the population of Gibraltar as contained in the preamble to the Gibraltarian Constitution.

The joint statement signed today by the Spanish foreign minister and the British foreign secretary concludes with the assurance that officials of both governments will meet as soon as possible to prepare the necessary practical measures which will allow the carrying out of the proposals agreed upon in this statement.

WA110340 London REUTER in English 0243 GMT 11 Apr 80 WA

[By Richard Wallis]

[Excerpts] Lisbon, April 11, REUTER--An end to the long-standing dispute over Gibraltar was in sight today after Spain said it would lift restrictions placed on the colony in 1969, and Britain agreed for the first time to negotiate the Rock's future.

The breakthrough came after a meeting here between Spanish Foreign Minister Marcelino Oreja and British Foreign Secretary Lord Carrington.

The British now hope that the land border between Gibraltar and the Spanish mainland can be reopened by the beginning of June.

The Spaniards, who are insisting on the return to them of what they consider to be Europe's last colony, say talks to work out a calendar for lifting the restrictions must start by June 1, 1980.

In declaring its readiness to negotiate, however, neither Britain nor Spain changed their traditional position on the Rock the British captured in 1704.

The Spanish say they want to restore Spain's territorial integrity, thereby staking their claim to Gibraltar. Britain has made clear the colony's sovereignty will not be transferred against the wishes of Gibraltarians, who in a referendum and successive general elections have shown a wish to stay linked to Britain.

Lord Carrington said yesterday after the Lisbon agreement was announced that sovereignty was the main issue and would take a long time to solve.

In Gibraltar, Chief Minister Sir Joshua Hassan and opposition leader Peter Isola said they were heartened by British assurances over Gibraltar's sovereignty.

Sir Joshua said he would demand that he and the opposition leader should be present at any talks over the island's future.

"We have always considered the restrictions to be bad and that they should be lifted. We have always maintained our frontier gates open," he said at a joint press conference on the Lisbon agreement.

"I realize there is a body of opinion which has developed in Gibraltar which finds safety in a closed border," he said. But he added that this was not reasonable thinking in relations to future generations.

Mr Isola said it would be for the people of Gibraltar to decide what system they wanted after the frontier was opened.

CUBA'S ROA ADDRESSES IPU MEETING IN OSLO

[Text] Raul Roa, vice president of the People's Government National Assembly, has stated in Oslo, Norway, that there is a need for the international community to adopt measures which will contribute to the financial requirements of underdeveloped countries.

In a speech before the economic and social committee of the spring meeting of the Interparliamentary Union, which began Tuesday in Oslo, Roa referred to the importance of a UN international strategy for the 1980-1990 decade aimed at contributing to the harmonic, continued and independent development of the underdeveloped world.

The Cuban leader reiterated the proposal made at the UN by the chairman of the nonalined countries' movement, Fidel Castro, that not less then $300 billion be devoted to that end from contributions made by developed states and others which have the financial ability.

IRANIAN DIPLOMAT EXPLAINS ROLE OF TRADE BUREAU

AU110926 Vienna Domestic Service in German 1600 GMT 10 Apr 80 AU

[Ferdinand Hennerbichler interview with the Iranian charge d'affaires in Vienna, Dr Abed; presumably in Vienna on 10 April--recorded]

[Summary] [Question] Dr Abed, the Iranian Embassy in Vienna has set up some sort of trade center in Vienna. Could you give us any details about this?

[Answer] "This center is now operating within the framework of the economic activities of the Iranian Embassy, and we have begun our activities with respect to various dealings with European corporations."

[Question] This means that the economic section of the Iranian Embassy in Vienna has been expanded. Do you foresee the Iranian Foreign Ministry developing this economic center into some kind of trade chamber at a later date?

[Question] "Yes, I can conceive of such an idea. There is very strong interest in developing the Vienna center to enable it to handle all activities concerning economic affairs and to further expand it. We visualize very good business in this respect, particularly with Austria."

[Question] Does this mean that you have set up the center as a response to the U.S. economic boycott of Iran?

[Answer] "The situation is as follows: We have actually had the bureau before. But now, after the U.S. step, its operation has been intensified."

[Question] Is this bureau supposed to create a new basis for economic cooperation between the European countries and Iran?

[Answer] "Yes, this is quite correct. We want to be independent of the superpowers, and first and foremost we want to work with small countries that are industrially and economically advanced."

[Question] What small countries in Europe have you chiefly in mind?

[Answer] "Naturally those countries that place emphasis on common interests with the countries of the Third World. And here Austria holds the first place."

[Question] Could East European communist countries also be considered?

[Answer] "Yes, they could be."

[Question] What has been the center's activity thus far?

[Answer] "Well, first and foremost we plan to focus on providing jobs in Iran. This involves building up small industry in Iran. We need the material for this and the bureau is primarily trying to obtain the appropriate material."

[Question] These materials are to be routed via Vienna?

[Answer] "All deals are being transacted here in Vienna. Business must not necessarily be transacted via Vienna, but we intend to work mostly with Austria."

[Question] How do you assess the chances of the Austrians? What is the present state of Austrian-Iranian economic relations?

[Answer] "Well, I may say that the chances are really good indeed, and I am very optimistic after all the steps that have now been taken by the Americans that the chances are excellent."

[Question] You believe that Austria could become a focal point in economic relations in Europe?

[Answer] "I can very well conceive of that."

[Question] Will you exclude commodities connected one way or another with the Americans and their allies?

[Answer] "I think it will be a major consideration that those countries which sympathize with the American economic sanctions will not be considered for our deals."

HEINZ FISCHER VISITS CUBA; AFGHANISTAN DISCUSSED

'Messenger' to Castro

AU101251 Vienna KURIER in German 10 Apr 80 p 3 AU

[Unattributed report: "Heinz Fischer's Mission in Cuba as 'Messenger' to Fidel Castro"]

[Text] Heinz Fischer, parliamentary floor leader of the Austrian Socialist Party, regards the repeatedly quoted figure of 10,000 Cubans who want to emigrate and who have been living under exceedingly unhygienic conditions for days on the premises of the Peruvian Embassy in Havana, as exaggerated. Fischer, who returned on Tuesday [8 April] from the sugar island to Vienna, had been given an opportunity on Sunday to inspect the 2,000 square meter premises of the embassy.

The floor leader told KURIER on Wednesday about a number of frank statements by official authorities about a numerically small group of Cubans who are dissatisfied with the present situation and with the "achievements of the Cuban revolution." According to these statements, 1 percent of the people--about 100,000 persons--are reportedly opposed to the regime.

Fischer had attended a conference of the Socialist International (SI) in the Dominican Republic, and afterwards--on orders of Chancellor Bruno Kreisky--he called on Fidel Castro as a "messenger." Fischer refused to reveal anything about the contents of the Kreisky message, but it is safe to assume that it more or less conveyed the view that has been repeatedly expressed recently by Kreisky, namely, that the nonalined countries should undertake an initiative in connection with the USSR invasion of nonalined Afghanistan. Fischer assessed the fact that Indian Prime Minister Indira Gandhi recently accepted an invitation to Cuba as "an obviously parallel idea."

LE SOIR: 'SYMBOLIC' CHANGES TO REGIONS PLAN KEY TO SOLUTION

LD101541 Brussels LE SOIR in French 6-8 Apr 80 pp 1,2 LD

["P.L." commentary: "Enveloping Tactics"]

[Text] "There are positive elements, but it is still too early to talk of solution."

That was probably the sense of what Mr Wilfried Martens said to the king on the Saturday morning before Easter.

The prime minister also gave that impression to journalists on Friday evening, after a day of talks with leaders of majority Senate groups and late that afternoon with his vice prime minister.

Mr Martens also indicated that he would devote the long weekend to various contacts and return on Tuesday to the shifting ground of the Rue de la Loi.

It was clear on Friday evening that the government was going to make a new attempt next week to avoid sinking into a crisis.

Moreover, the information we have managed to obtain gives us a clearer idea of the cards which Mr Martens still holds. In particular, it seems that an essential element of his tactics could be to "envelop" a sufficient number of those opposing his reform plan by obtaining support from their own local base. Indeed, four of them belong to the Christian People's Party's [CVP] Brussels-Hal-Vilvorde committee--a committee chaired by none other than Jean-Luc Dehaene, Mr Martens' principal private secretary. If that committee were to approve the government's new draft document, it would be difficult to imagine the senators belonging on the committee rejecting it in the vote.

As for the content of this new draft document, it is planned to change enough symbolic elements to justify an about-face by some recalcitrants.

Symbolic Modifications

The first element is that article 5 of the reform plan which was rejected in the Senate would be presented again in the form of a new bill. Moreover, for technical reasons this bill would take up articles 5, 6 and 7 of the initial plan, in other words, the section dealing with the composition of future regional councils. There will only be one modification to the original text of article 5. The phrase "on a transitional basis" will be added. That would give mental satisfaction to Mrs Staels-Dompas, one of the plan's adversaries, who wanted to amend the reform plan's provisions by adding that phrase. Furthermore, to assure the CVP hardliners that the presence of French-speaking representatives from the outskirts in the Brussels Regional Council would not be permenent, a fourth article would be added to this new plan containing a compromise clause which explicitly provides for the annulment of the transitional reform on 31 December 1984 if the definitive reform has not come into force by that date.

The second element is that Mr Martens has said that the leaders of majority groups unreservedly approved the statement he had made on the government's behalf before the vote on article 5 in the Senate, in other words, the promise he made to give guarantees to the communities in Brussels within the framework of an all-embracing agreement and before the commune elections in 1982. The leaders of these groups also took note of the prime minister's pledge not to organize new city elections [elections d'agglomeration] without modifying the law according to Flemish wishes.

A Psychological Operation

This clearly means that an attempt is being made to erase the statement made by [French-speaking] Socialist Party group leader Fernand Delmotte, which offended the Brussels members of the CVP so deeply. The prime minister's statement, which would therefore be the only valid one, does not use the term "minority" to describe the Flemings in Brussels and does not mention the notion of "balance" with regard to the guarantees to be provided. Moreover, Mr Martens specified that Mr Delmotte had not spoken of a "minority" during the meeting on Friday afternoon. By sticking to the terms "communities" and "all-embracing agreement," the initial ambiguity is restored, and this should enable the plan to pass through the Senate. In this way, any allusion, even indirect, to the outskirts is avoided.

No Help in the Chamber

In short, it is clear how Mr Martens hopes to escape the verdict which the Senate began to pronounce last Wednesday. His new attempt in fact seems very risky, although the pressure exerted by the CVP Brussels-Hal-Vilvorde District Committee is likely to bring a change of heart in the four declared opponents of the plan who belong to this district: Mr Lindemans, Mr De Kerpel, Mrs Staels-Dompas and Mrs Panneels van Baelen. That should be enough to achieve the two-thirds majority.

However, we must wait until the middle of next week to know whether this new attempt is successful. Mr Martens kept his Easter weekend for informal contacts. He is to see the majority party presidents again next Tuesday. These parties will probably also hold meetings of their respective bureaus on Tuesday too. The CVP Brussels District Committee usually meets on Thursdays. If the plan drawn up is carried out normally until then, the new bill could be sent to the Senate, which would examine it quickly in committee and then in open session around 15 or 16 April.

However, this possible solution in no way solves the problem posed by the vote on the bill in the Chamber of Representatives. As is known, the government does not, mathematically speaking, have a two-thirds majority in this assembly. In this respect, it became apparent on Friday morning, if there was still any doubt, that the French-speaking opposition parties would not help the bill's passage. The attempt at consultation started by Social Christian Party President Vanden Boeynants and PS Chairman Cools has not produced the desired results: The French-Speaking Front refuses to vote for a plan which its president, Mrs Spaak, regards as "very bad." As for the Party of Liberty and Reform (PRL) [as published], Mr Poswick has stated that his party would only vote for the plan if it were modified in keeping with its wishes, which are unacceptable to the members of the present coalition.

Furthermore, the presidents of the French-speaking parties have not even published a joint communique. They have merely said that they have made a broad investigation and examination of the situation. They have pledged to continue to follow events. "I understand the anxiety felt by Mr Cools and Mr Vanden Boeynants," a member of the opposition said. "They have taken a gamble which they are now losing."

In the final analysis two conclusions can be drawn from this political situation which is, to say the least, complex.

Repeat of the Egmont Pact

First, there is reason to wonder why Mr Martens is so desperately defending a plan which he knows cannot, mathematically speaking, get through the Chamber of Representatives. The only possible answer to this question at present lies in the interest Mr Martens might have in forcing his great rival, CVP President Tindemans, to come out openly in favor of either transitional regionalization or a political crisis.

Second, one cannot help thinking that the way in which the government plan is developing is quite clearly reminiscent of the Egmont Pact's development. The plan is constantly subjected to further negotiations, but we come no nearer to seeing imminent implementation. Has Mr Tindemans not already stated that it will have to be amended in the Chamber if the necessary two-thirds majority is to be found? Amending the plan in the Chamber means that it will have to return to the Senate for new approval. This means that the process will take several months more. In the same way the Egmont Pact survived as long as further negotiations were possible and vanished on the day it was to have been implemented.

Furthermore, it is becoming increasingly clear that the CVP is exerting pressure to give priority, if not urgent priority, to economic and financial questions. It seems that there is no hesitation in boosting efforts being made to support the franc. At the same time, there are growing attacks on the parallelism which the French-speaking parties wanted to see between the execution of the institutional program and that of the government's economic program. Moreover, the CVP Chamber of Representatives Group has openly advocated moving on immediately to seeking an agreement on definitive state reform.

CVP HARDLINE FACTION SEEN STRENGTHENING AS CRISIS DEVELOPS

LD101519 Brussels LE SOIR in French 6 - 8 Apr 80 p 2 LD

[G.Dt. commentary: "The CVP Hardens Its Position"]

[Text] The Christian People's Party [CVP] is responsible for the current crisis. That is the opinion held by the majority parties. Therefore, it should be the CVP which seeks a solution. However, is that possible? It does not seem that the problem is how to convince one or other of the senators who voted against article 5 to change his mind. Moreover, they were not contacted on Friday. There is deep opposition to the government's regionalization plan within the CVP. The CVP enjoys a great deal of support. Will the prime minister be able to convince this hardline fringe of his party, or will he merely try a technical maneuver to get through the Senate, leaving the Chamber till later?

In any case, a number of statements on Thursday evening and Friday gave the impression that the CVP hardline faction was becoming stronger.

Mr Tindemans told the Belgian Radio and Television Dutch service [BRT] that the frustration felt by some members of parliament was understandable. "The senators," he said, "voted according to their consciences; there is no rigid discipline within our party. Mr Lindemans knows the price which the Flemings have had to pay to be regarded as full-fledged citizens in Brussels. Mr Delmotte's statements shocked him deeply, but that has by no means destroyed his confidence in the prime minister."

This attitude, which is to say the least understanding toward the two rebels, can be contrasted with Mr Martens' statements to BRT: "Mr Lindemans agreed with article 5 right up until it was given a second reading in the Senate. There is a tradition of independent feeling in the CVP of which I do not approve. Acting independently is not good either for the government or for the party. I respect people's convictions, but we must work as a team."

Many Ruys' editorial in Friday's DE STANDAARD also expressed this tougher attitude. In the editorialist's view, superficial responsibility for the government's fall rests on the CVP senators who rejected article 5, but the real responsibility rests with the parties which wanted parallelism. In other words, the regionalization plan should be abandoned and attention given to economic problems. This view is widespread within the CVP. For Many Ruys, the opposition expressed by Mr Lindemans and others has strengthened the Chamber CVP Group's determination to reject the regionalization plan.

In another article, DE STANDAARD contrasts the moderation of the Senate CVP Group with the strength of the Chamber CVP Group due, the newspaper stresses, to Mr Tindemans' presence. It is difficult to be clearer than that. As the Chamber CVP Group's statement on Thursday had already shown, the plan will, it seems, never be accepted in the Chamber.

Another element is provided by the statements made by the Party of Liberty and Progress (PVV) youth section, backed by their colleagues in the CVP youth section. They condemn Mr Martens' and Mr Claes' blackmail over the franc. Martens and Claes stated on Thursday that the political crisis had forced the national bank to spend 3 billion francs to support the Belgian currency. For the PVV youth section this is a completely erroneous presentation of the facts. The national bank had to intervene for technical reasons unconnected with the crisis. They condemn the prime minister's statements as a means of exerting blackmail within the majority--a means which he would not hesitate to use if it were effective.

FOREIGN MINISTER VIEWS EC INITIATIVE ON HOSTAGES

DW110650 Mainz ZDF Television Network in German 1700 GMT 10 Apr 80 DW

[Excerpt from Otto Strobl interview with Federal Foreign Minister Hans-Dietrich Genscher; date, place not given--recorded]

[Text] [Genscher] I should first like to say that a meeting of the ministerial committee of the Council of Europe took place in Lisbon, representing 21 states. I had suggested to the Italian foreign minister, who is currently chairing the European Community, that the nine EC foreign ministers present there get together since the Federal Government deemed it necessary for us to deal with the situation in Iran that has now emerged. The meeting this morning showed that the states of the European Community are fully agreed in their objective to work toward the restoration of the rules of international law and an early release of the hostages in Tehran in solidarity with the United States. This is why our ambassadors will request appointments with the Iranian president and, after they have reported in the capitals of the nine European states, we will have to decide what additional action is indicated.

[Question] Since after their talks with the Iranian president the ambassadors will return to and report in the capitals of their countries, this may indicate a potential severance of diplomatic relations.

[Answer] You cannot anticipate decisions even before you know the outcome of this dialog. At the moment, severance of diplomatic relations is not envisaged. Yet the fact that we want to discuss the results of this demarche with our ambassadors in the capitals demonstrates how seriously the EC states are viewing the situation that has emerged.

Further Genscher Remarks

DW111047 Mainz ZDF Television Network in German 1900 GMT 10 Apr 80 DW

[Second part of excerpts from the Otto Strobl interview with Federal Foreign Minister Hans-Dietrich Genscher; date, place not given--recorded]

[Text] [Genscher] The Federal Government said yesterday that it will act as the friend and the partner of the United States now in this very serious situation that has emerged. What matters here is the restoration of international law and a test of the solidarity of the European partners with the United States. This is the reason why I had requested the convocation of this conference of the nine foreign ministers. With this step regarding Tehran we intend to underscore the urgency with which we are viewing the solution of the hostage drama. The fact that after their talks with the Iranian president the ambasadors will come to their capitals to report directly to their governments goes to show that we consider the situation to be serious.

[Question] You just mentioned that the ambassadors will come back from Iran to report to the governments. Does this possibly mean that the severance of diplomatic relations might be taken into consideration as well?

[Answer] At the moment this is not being taken into consideration because we particularly want to utilize the diplomatic relations to work in the interest of the hostages. What must be understood by further steps in the event that the information given our ambassadors is not satisfactory can be decided only when the reports have been submitted. I do not think there is any sense in speculating on the contents of possible action.

Only one thing is quite plain, namely, that the Europeans feel very closely allied with the United States in this matter as well. With this step we are also making it plain that we regard European solidarity with the United States as expressive of our common concept of values and interests and that the Europeans do not intend to dodge their responsibility--either on this issue or on any other issue.

[Question] The United States has quite definitely decided to go through with boycott measures. Is there any intention for Europe, for the EC states, to join these measures partially or completely?

[Answer] As you know, the United States has called not only upon the states of the European Community but also upon other friendly states. As I said, the question of whether such steps are necessary will have to be decided after the ambassadors' talks with the Iranian president have taken place. The effect of such steps always depends on whether they involve steps of individuals or whether they constitute concerted action. This, too, will have to be taken into consideration. In any event, we hope that the fact that we have once again very seriously explained our position to the Iranian leadership, and we really have done so repeatedly, will not fail to make an impression there, and also that other friendly states will join such an action.

[Question] Have plans been made for the European foreign ministers to discuss this subject again in the near future?

[Answer] It is quite possible indeed that we will get together again very quickly, but this, too, depends on the demarche in Tehran.

'Coordinated Course' Necessary

DW100650 Hamburg ARD Television Network in German 1800 GMT 10 Apr 80 DW

[Gerd H. Pelletier interview with Federal Foreign Minister Hans-Dietrich Genscher upon the latter's return from Lisbon at Cologne-Wahn airport--recorded]

[Text] [Question] The Americans, Mr Minister, are asking more of solidarity than just verbal and diplomatic action. Is it not a game after all, primarily aimed at gaining time?

[Answer] The United States, too, by diplomatic action is trying to alleviate the situation of the hostages and to achieve their release. I do not think that there can be any difference of opinion about this method, and any further-reaching measures, should they become necessary, will be effective only as a coordinated course of action, for example, in the economic sector, though I do not mean to say by this that this will happen. Hence, these are decisions which the United States has not rushed in the past and which we do not intend to rush, either; neither does the United States expect us to do so. But having noted that we have convened immediately after the United States has made its decisions, the United States indeed is convinced that what the Federal Government said yesterday still stands: We shall act as the friend and partner of the United States.

BOELLING SAYS FRG NOT AFFECTED BY CARTER'S CRITICISM

LD111218 Hamburg DPA in German 1112 GMT 11 Apr 80 LD

[Excerpts] Bonn--The Federal Government does not feel itself affected by President Carter's latest criticism leveled at the U.S. allies for lack of support in the Iran crisis. Government Spokesman Klaus Boelling told journalists in Bonn today: "Carter's remarks are not aimed at the Federal Republic, and could not have been directed at the Federal Republic."

Boelling explained his statement by saying that Washington has expressly welcomed the decision taken on Thursday by the EC foreign ministers in Lisbon on a joint demarche on behalf of the U.S. Embassy hostages who have now been detained for over 5 months in Tehran.

Boelling stressed that a concerted demarche by the nine EC countries to Iranian President Bani-Sadr cannot be underestimated. At the same time he pointed out that the EC ambassadors are to obtain "hard and concrete" information. Another meeting of the EC foreign ministers could then be convened at short notice.

The government spokesman left no doubt that there will be no hesitation in the nine capitals to introduce the relevant measures following their reports. Bonn continues to advocate that any possible decisions on sanctions should be taken jointly by the nine EC countries.

There is as yet no idea when the Iranian president will receive the EC ambassadors. According to the Foreign Ministry spokesman, the Federal Government expects that this will take place "in the near future," at the latest within 2 weeks. So far the EC ambassadors have had no difficulties in their contacts with the Tehran government.

Because of the "specific situation," Boelling would not comment on President Bani-Sadr's reply to the message by Federal Chancellor Helmut Schmidt. Bonn's ambassador in Tehran, Gerhard Ritzel, received the reply yesterday. Schmidt and other Western heads of government wrote to Bani-Sadr 2 weeks ago pleading for the U.S. hostages.

PRESS VOICES SKEPTICISM ABOUT LISBON EC INITIATIVE

DW110844 Cologne Deutschlandfunk Network in German to East and West Germany 0505 GMT 11 Apr 80 DW

[Press Review on the Lisbon EC foreign ministers' meeting]

[Text] NEUE OSNABRUECKER ZEITUNG points out that the EC foreign ministers were careful not to write anything about economic sanctions into their communique after their Lisbon conference: Hans-Dietrich Genscher said it was inevitable that the Europeans act as partners of the United States in the question concerning the hostages. Upon closer scrutiny this will turn out to be a perfect example of a diplomatic empathy phrase. An SPD Executive Board spokesman in Bonn was more plain about it when he quite bluntly posed the question concerning the sense of an economic boycott. What makes the Euorpeans so unwilling and hesitant also is the realization that they must not and cannot make it as easy on themselves as the Americans can with regard to an economic boycott, be it as a punitive action for the Soviet occupation of Afghanistan or the taking of hostages in Iran. Unlike the United States, which is centered on the inland market, the European economy stands and falls with a flourishing foreign trade. And in the case of the Iran boycott the Americans demand from the Europeans greater sacrifices than they themselves are prepared to make.

Under the heading "Delaying Tactics" BADISCHE ZEITUNG of Freiburg writes: President Bani-Sadr may feel honored if the representatives of nine West European states now call on him. This does not wield any significance, however, for the men who really are decisive in Tehran. If, following the events of the past few days, even the slightest chance existed that another, last attempt could defuse the crisis, then the Lisbon EC decision would have to be called honorable. But obviously it is aimed at a different end, namely, the gaining of time and the camouflage of the gross differences of opinion existing among the West Europeans.

Bonn's GENERAL-ANZEIGER does not see it this way. In contrast, its editorial has the following to say about the issue: Viewed subjectively, the impression of European and Japanese shirking may be correct indeed. Yet, objectively, it is erroneous. It is understandable enough that the United States has now lost patience after 160 days of the hostage drama, and that Carter has now resorted--veritably must resort--to sanctions also with a view to his voters in the United States who despise nothing more than an idly waiting, fearful President. Only, even in the United States people are not at all convinced of the effectiveness of the punitive measures, expecting rather on the contrary a hardening of the position of the hateful ayatollah, if this is still possible at all.

DIE WELT SCORES EUROPEANS FOR TIMIDITY

DW111026 Bonn DIE WELT in German 11 Apr 80 p 6 DW

[Commentary signed Kem.: "One Voice"]

[Text] So it is on principle now that the European Community unanimously and solidarily backs President Carter. And if the governments of the Nine take themselves and their announced demarche in Tehran seriously, the mere diplomatic demonstration for the liberation of the hostages cannot be the end of it. After this Lisbon statement, at any rate, it is inconceivable that Europe with a shrug of the shoulder would revert to business as usual in the event of a failure of its intervention.

Inconceivable? Naturally the whole thing is reminiscent of rather swiftly arranged common elements of political assessment. The experiences in the conflict over Afghanistan do not tell any encouraging tale. Europe's state chancelleries must cover a laboriously long road from the rhetorics of no cost to the perhaps costly deed, and the usual Atlantic turbulences as a rule have prevented this road from being traveled to the end at all.

Europe would be strong on the side of the United States only in common will and in agreement of deed. But this requires the elimination of Europe's weakness, of the inclination of its partners to come to terms on the smallest common denominator, if at all. The syndrome of "never the first and never alone" is haunting most of them. It paralyzes the readiness to take initiative and it fans the horror of possibly being the only one to be saddled with the costs and consequences of the step "forward."

Unless the community of interests with the United States so often conjured up is to be discredited there must be in Europe at long last the example that will set a precedent. The Federal Republic, Iran's strongest Western trade partner but also the most profoundly committed to the community of destiny with the United States, would be in the best position to provide Europe that example.

FRANKFURTER RUNDSCHAU: BONN WILL BE FORCED TO ACT

DW101015 Frankfurt FRANKFURTER RUNDSCHAU in German 10 Apr 80 p 3 DW

[Editorial by Bonn correspondent Dirk Cornelius: "Bonn Pressed To Make a Move"]

[Text] The Federal Government has been squirming for a long time since Washington asked the crucial question: What do you think of sanctions against Iran? The reasons were first, dependence on Iranian oil and German economic leaders' extremely low enthusiasm regarding trade embargoes. Second, Bonn sees the danger that economic and other retaliation measures could strengthen those forces in Iran and in the Arab camp as a whole which want a total breach with the West. [paragraph continues]

That could lead to a situation, according to the skeptics in the chancellor's office, for example, where the Soviet Union might feel "invited." After all, there are many politicians in Bonn, such as SPD Manager Egon Bahr, who do not think much of economic sanctions because they have never been successful.

On the other hand, however, the Federal Republic is particularly dependent on the United States. U.S. President Jimmy Carter, with his recent counterstrike against the affront of revenge-greedy revolution leader Khomeyni, has put the Federal Government more than the other allies under pressure to make a move. Foreign Minister Genscher, therefore, obviously prevailed with his conviction that the Federal Republic must produce some evidence of its solidarity with the Americans. The federal chancellor has not yet made a decision, but one can assume that Bonn is prepared to make economic sacrifices in order to force the rulers in Tehran to give in with regard to the hostage affair.

Genscher is also prepared to take economic retaliation measures if need be, even if not all allies cooperate, while the chancellor's office considers only a "complete" boycott of Iran as making sense and being effective. Economic sanctions, if at all, could force the fanatic angels of revenge in Tehran to their knees, if they were decided on and adhered to by many industrial states. After all, one does "not want to whip the waves," as somebody from the chancellor's entourage formulated it.

The whole world agrees that the recent retaliatory actions of the U.S. President aimed at the liberation of the hostages contribute hardly anything and are of symbolic significance if at all, because trade between the United States and Iran has decreased to almost zero. Matters could look somewhat different if the Federal Republic and other industrial states were to take part. A trade boycott by the European Community states, for example, would probably hurt the people in power in Iran--considerably. Exports from the Federal Republic to Iran have decreased considerably because of the revolutionary confusion last year. But they still amount to more than DM2 billion. Exports consist mainly of all kinds of machines which are urgently needed in Iran. Such "friends as Syria and Algeria," to whom the Iranian foreign minister has appealed can hardly supply these goods.

The marching route for the Federal Government is now: Something must happen, but if possible it should not emanate from Bonn. This is why Genscher discussed the ticklish situation and common steps to be taken as early as on Wednesday with some of his European colleagues in Lisbon. In Brussels as well the members of the "Permanent Committee" of the European Community will discuss hotly over the next days how one could provide covering fire for the great ally without involving oneself too much in the great mess and without inciting the radicals in Tehran even more.

One thing is already clear: The Federal Government is at present prepared, if at all, to take certain economic sanctions, but not to grab Iranian accounts in German banks, as has been announced by Carter with regard to the United States. Bonn also does not think much of disrupting diplomatic relations with Tehran, because that would isolate the country even more and possibly drive it into the arms of the Soviet Union.

But even an economic boycott will be "no easy matter," as one knows in Bonn. But the stubborn and hateful ayatollah has continued his sadistic cat-and-mouse game so long that now even such countries as the Federal Republic, with its good friendly relations with Iran, cannot look on passively any longer.

LIMITS TO CARTER'S OPTIONS IN IRANIAN BOYCOTT VIEWED

[Friedhelm Kemna editorial: "Khomeyni and the Neighbors"]

[Text] The old man in Qom rejoiced. It may have been the best day for months in the life of Ayatollah Khomeyni, because it tore the deteriorating revolution out of the drift of the miserable economic daily life, at least for the time being. Cautious voices in the midst of the irrationality which rules omnipotent had nearly turned the enemy image of the revolutionaries askew. The game of confusion of the hopes and disappointments gradually seemed to ridicule the frontline of Islamic fundamentalism in the eyes of the Western world.

Now the image of the enemy is shining brightly again, an enemy who sought to deprive the mullahs of pluck through patient negotiations. But what can the effect of escalation be--even a caution and circumspect escalation consisting of a break in diplomatic relations and of economic pressure--on an old man who, in his madness, refuses to acknowledge reality to the outside world?

How can you cope with revolutionary fanaticism which, apart from its "holy" declaration of war on the United States and all who help it, does not allow any reasonable, reliable communication and which does not even shrink back from military confrontation because it lightly sacrifices life for the "just" cause?
